...might not well hear me after all. But I must not worry about such things, since, as you know, necessity forces me to speak of important matters. For the miserable evil that gives rise to so much dissension, discord, and enmity, and opens doors and gates wider and wider, continues to eat away at me. I am also not allowed to expound at length in many words what is before everyone's eyes and greatly offends the minds of many godly people, lest I seem to tear open again the wounds that I really want to heal.

(2) For the Christian religion has been brought so far down by the presumption of wicked men, that from the first beginning of our salvation it has never suffered so great distress, and the little ship of Peter, in any place, has never been driven about by so many stormy sects, as we see at this most distressed and miserable time. All of which comes from nowhere else, and has come to such a pass, than because we have forgotten the commandments of Christ, and have forsaken the true way to obtain unity in the church. For he himself, when he prays fervently to his Father, includes not only those whose faith has already been proved, but also those whose still doubtful minds would afterwards believe in him, so that in this way they would all become one, as he in the Father, and the Father in him. To which commandment it is also very true that, when he wished to propitiate the eternal Father for the sin of the whole world, and to depart from this life, he last of all commands his disciples that they should love one another, and that every one would know by such love that they were his disciples. But this is not only evident from what we have already said, and which is proved by the testimonies of Scripture; but we have also other passages of Scripture, from which it may be seen and perceived that Christ had nothing more often in his mouth, and more often and more diligently urged in the ears of his disciples, than cordial love and goodwill towards one another.

003 Paul also, the chosen vessel, taught that love should be preferred to all other virtues, because it is the bond of perfection to love one's neighbor as oneself, and because it is the fulfillment of the law, and that those who do not practice love depart from the true way, and fall into vain babblings, and become as a tinkling bell unfit for all good works.

(4) If we now, dear Emperor Carl, most Christian King Ferdinand, and you other sovereign princes, remembering these commandments, keep them right

If they had had their eyes open and considered them with devotion, there would not have arisen and taken root in the church so many disputes and corruptions (errors), so terrible disorders of horrible opinions, so impudent propositions and strange doctrines, nor so dangerous errors and confusions. But as in worldly government, when some forsake the laws of authority and choose and forge new statutes for themselves, they not only disturb and destroy the common society of the world, but also introduce a terribly wild life and disorder into the commonwealth: So also reckless minds make their dreams, rather than the sayings of the divine word, which they put on the page, their rule, and therefore bring unruly and unpleasant miraculous things (crickets) on the track, and in the church of the same burden godly members and the grafters incorporated with Christ to approve and accept them. Which, unfortunately, some in our time have also been tempted to do, and have brought it about that the love of Christians and common goodness have been abandoned, and the worst enmity has been wrought over it.

005 And this change of doctrine and ceremonies hath not only remained in the church, which it hath miserably rent, but hath also attacked the temporal government, and therein hath raged horribly. For, as it has brought into the latter ungodly doctrines and mad opinions, so it has brought into the former dreadful, miserable, and grim wars and abominable defeats and bloodshed, by which both have been almost entirely reversed and brought to ruin, and the beautiful, highly praised Germany has been so ruined that scarcely a shadow of the flourishing prosperity is to be seen where it was a few years ago.

(6) Some Roman popes have endeavored to help this lamentation and decayed condition, but on no occasion, by no entreaties and entreaties, nor by any legations to the imperial diets in Germany, have they been able to bring about and obtain that these religious dissensions be abolished, the wounded church be healed, and peace and harmony be restored among her teachers. Whose fruitless and futile efforts were not hidden from Clement, of that name the seventh Roman pope and most vigilant shepherd; but he nevertheless, that he might not appear to have left anything undone, or not to have observed his duty in all things, has commanded me, his legate, this office, that with Your Majesties and Serene Highnesses, who are assembled in this magnificent assembly, I shall be present at the first session of the Holy See.

and to diligently exhort them to do everything that can promote peace and harmony, and also to restore, heal, and improve with counsel and action the state of the church, which has fallen into decay and has been almost completely shattered and shattered.

(7) For since the invincible Emperor Charles V ordered this Imperial Diet as a forerunner, so that the dangerous and outdated disease would be countered and controlled with a healing remedy, Clement VII, Pope, has also created the good hope that many would recognize the error and turn back to the dear Mother, the Roman Church, Clement VII, Pope, has also entertained the good hope that many would recognize and abandon the error and turn back to their dear mother, the Roman Church, so that in this way such grievous and dangerous disagreements would be tolerated and the old peace and harmony, which so many pious people have so long heartily desired and longed for, would be restored. For if these heresies remain in the church and continue to spread, and if the enemies of public tranquility are not eradicated, neither will the church be freed from error, nor will it be possible to administer and govern the commonwealth properly.

(8) Which, since Your Majesty and Serene Highnesses, the most invincible Emperor, the most Christian King, and the rest of you Sovereign Princes, are well aware of it, they also see at the same time what a godly and holy business and what a heavy burden we all bear, and what important things rest on our deliberations. and other sovereign princes, they also see at the same time what a godly and holy business, and what a heavy burden we all have upon us, and what important things rest on our deliberations; which, if they be not made up, that we may support the Church's tottering and decrepit state by our reputation, and severely punish the heretics and disturbers of the common tranquillity, we may boldly believe will come to nothing but the utmost confusion of the whole Church, of all wisely ordered commonwealths, complete disruption, of divine and human things, horrible confusion, and that finally the wild and cruel boys will come upon the pious members of Christ, and that nothing at all human will remain on earth. But if we strive in time to prevent such great evils, to quiet the dissension of the church, to break the course of quarrels, and to reconcile the minds; if we endeavor to restore public peace and harmony, and then also to maintain them, the salvation and prosperity of the church will remain unchanged, that we may accomplish our course of life on earth and among men without error, live quietly and honorably, and finally please all righteous people therein.

009 Therefore, since this is so, I beseech Your Majesty and Your Highness for the sake of eternal blessedness, which we have obtained through the intercession and the

If you wish to attain the mediatorial office of our Lord Jesus Christ after this mortal and miserable life, faithfully and brotherly, that you may work in that which serves for unification and common peace in such a manner as befits wise men who have been chosen for such important trade and treaty. And that this may happen the sooner, the heresies be eradicated, and the minds be united, it must be the first and foremost care and endeavor of the noble princes, princes, and other imperial estates to be obedient to the most invincible emperor and to follow him in everything that her majesty will deem good and order in the matter of religion and the articles of the Christian faith. And we believe that it is known and clear to all what great effort and care she has taken so far to restore, establish and maintain the salvation, peace, tranquility, harmony and former prosperity of the church and the common people, to such an extent that her reputation, fame and honor cannot be called into question, mocked or insulted by any man's malice or malicious gossip. For she has at most always made it her business to prefer the common good to the special or her own, to promote and extend the salvation of the church and of the commonwealth, and then to arrange all her actions and deeds not for the benefit of a few who do not understand or judge anything right, but for the benefit of all righteous and intelligent people, and especially for the benefit of the great God who examines hearts and kidneys. And that this is so, no one will doubt or deny who knows to some extent about their diligence, godliness, and efforts to put aside disagreements and to advise the common good. But it would be too long to speak of the glorious virtues of the most blessed emperor in particular, which, because they are so well known and praised everywhere that they do not need foreign words, and the most invincible emperor is so modest and chaste that he does not like to hear such things praised and extolled in his presence, so I will pass over the others, which could otherwise be heard here, with all diligence.

(10) Since now, you German princes, these benefits of Imperial Majesty come upon you, and these great services of the most invincible Emperor for you are well known, I have no doubt that such gratitude will be found in your minds. Majesty come upon you, and these great services of the most invincible Emperor to you are well known, I have no doubt that such gratitude will be found in your minds that you will not only praise and extol the benefits you have received, but also live obediently and compliantly to Imperial Majesty in everything. Majesty in everything willingly obedient and compliant. So then, noble princes, take pains that you present the person you have chosen, and the person you have chosen, and the person you have chosen, and the person you have chosen.

I promise you that you will administer and do the office commanded to you by God in such a way that you will have God alone before your eyes, so that all and everyone will recognize, as in the clear day, that you have taken the best possible care of the holy Catholic and Roman Church (which has always called you its children) and of the common peace and unity. I, in turn, promise all diligence, zeal, and due care to do and maintain everything that the pope can grant and do for the preservation of the holy church's communion and welfare, as well as common peace and tranquility, without offending his conscience.

(11) Having said this, concerning the abolition of error and the healing of the wounds of the church, I now turn to you, ye German princes, to speak also of the other and most necessary part. If I had such eloquence that your minds would be awakened and moved to believe that I have spoken nothing fictitious or false, but the truth, I would consider myself most happy, and believe completely that things would be better for Christendom in the future.

12. But here let it be far from me to think you so imprudent and heedless, or so simple-minded and ignorant, that you do not know that hitherto not once, but many times, the immortal God's temples, dwellings, houses, altars, flocks, the graves of the ancestors, laws, freedom, wives, children, friends, and the dear fatherland itself were in extreme danger, and that your and the whole empire's rights, by the cruel Turkish tyrant's victories, were violated in the corpses of Christians, so that your fields stood flooded with pious but miserably murdered people's blood, and he drove away many thousands of people into the gruesome servitude. This miserable defeat of the Christians will hopefully move, sadden, grieve, and torment you all the more, the more generous and noble-minded you are by nature, and have much more mercy and compassion than they do.

(13) Consider, therefore, you noble princes of Germany, what a miserable and sad state all the German peoples have fallen into at the hands of the cruel Turkish tyrant, and let the great danger that hangs over all our heads move you to earnestly defend the freedom and welfare of our common fatherland, and consider it better and more praiseworthy to die with glorious glory than to suffer shameful servitude and take upon yourselves all ignominy. For that the cruel despot has nothing else in mind and will, than that he overpowers all Christians, makes them miserable slaves and even destroys them, is clear enough from this: because he does not desist from the old hatred and fury which he harbors against Christians, but increases in it day by day, and usurps more territories, kingdoms, and dominions, with all Christians' harm and shame, increasing and spreading the borders of his kingdom, taking away much from us, but losing little himself, meanwhile, as we ourselves war among ourselves, and think not that so cruel, fierce, and reprobate a nation can sooner be overcome and overpowered, than when we ourselves first by dreadful wars, inward enmities, and miserable combats, are all weakened, executed, and worn out. And that this is so, no one who still has an honest heart will deny; to the extent that many do not at all shy away from the flames, fire, and destruction of the fatherland, that they also help to do this and help to increase it, so that they again arouse and inflame the evil that has already half been quenched, and consider war to be beneficial, but peace to be harmful.

(14) Thus Germany, which is torn and divided into so many disunited and hostile parts, gives the savage enemy a desired opportunity to attack us with war, and not only to clear away the necessities of life, but also to seek our lives and goods. For what violence he uses, what murder, scorching, burning, robbing, plundering, and other inhuman things he commits, has long been known and heard enough. And since your mind trembles at such tales, your ears ring, your skin shivers, and your whole body freezes: who then should not wake up, and take care of the common welfare of all Christians, repel the violence and injustice inflicted, and protect the dear fatherland from such tyranny and supreme cruelty of such a barbarian enemy, and keep above the old honor and our honest name?

Fifteen: O we indolent and slothful people! O we careless, rash, and insensible! O we hard and rock-hearted people! He does us such harm, takes away so many cities and towns, threatens us with such murder, slavery, war and misery (expulsion); but we do not allow ourselves to be challenged by such danger, sit and watch our misery idly, and, to protect our well-being, will not dare to be at one with the fierce enemy.

016 Can it not be concluded and perceived from all such circumstances, that it shall soon come to pass, that we shall all be brought under such a tyrant's yoke, our children, the dearest pawns, from our eyes be cut as it were for pleasure, and our wives and daughters be forced to surrender and submit their tender bodies to the cruelest enemy of beastly lust, as shameful dung-houses? Now that this danger is at hand, what longer shall we sleep and tarry? Who then has so blinded and hardened our minds and eyes that we cannot understand or see such great and common evils? What kind of drowsiness and dizziness has made us so deafened and taken in, that we do not wake up, even though we hear such terrible things? What unmerciful and hard heart do we have, that it cannot be moved by so great a danger and need of the fatherland and of all Christians?

17. For that we must not be lukewarm and slow, or sluggish and foolish, in our present time and in this matter, we have highly important reasons, since all the shameful and cruel misdeeds and villainies, which the same arch-enemy and scanty persecutor of Christians has perpetrated on others, will soon affect us or our descendants, which the same arch-enemy and scanty persecutor of the Christians has perpetrated on others, will also soon strike and afflict us or our descendants, and how they will not only hear from afar, as now, which is not so miserable, but will even have to see and experience with these eyes of ours. Every one who does not want to be completely blind and foolish must see and grasp the misery and misery, even the shame and dishonor, that will result for us.

(18) If, then, your minds still have something human about them; if your love for your fatherland (for which everyone must be willing to die) is not entirely extinguished; if the welfare of your wives and children and friends is dear to you, wake up, you classes, wake up! let the sad and restless quarrels go! Put an end to the dangerous disagreements, and put your minds, necks, and shoulders together, so that you may put an end to the danger and harm that is hovering over you, if you do not repel and turn it away in time with all your might, diligence, and prudence, and chase the wild and cruel enemy out of Germany, so that he may not first exterminate all Christians, lest he first exterminate all Christians, and noble and highly renowned Germany, the noblest seat of all godliness and learning, when the Christians have been slain, and all estates and orders removed, become a castle or fortress of Mahometan blasphemy, and a den of Turkish murderers (robbers); and that this delay and procrastination, in raising and waging the Turkish war, is not only a disgrace to you, but also the greatest harm and ruin. For if the cruel

If such a powerful, cruel, wicked, lecherous, avaricious, lecherous and cruel enemy is not subdued and chased out of Germany by the common council and combined power of the Germans: what will be left for us to wait for but imprisonment, flight, murder, strangulation, devastation, and all other misery and woe? With what eyes, however, will we be able to look upon such bloody victories of the defiant enemy, and where will it finally end with its insatiable lust, will and desire to devour and ruin everything?

19 For ye must not in the least think that, being already famous by so many victories, and laden with spoils, he will henceforth abate his hatred against the Christians, or be satisfied with his kingdoms; but rather, as an unhappy rumour! rather, as an all too certain rumour goes, out of an immense eagerness to extend and enlarge his empire, he will first of all invade the Pannonian (Hungarian) borders with a mighty army, and thence into Germany, and also attack and devastate other nations in fury and rage. For the way is now open to him, now that Ofen and Belgrade, the strongest cities of the same country, have been conquered and captured, and because the Christian princes are at war among themselves, there is no one who can resist his insolence, resist his fierce attack, or let himself lament for the holy church and the common fatherland's welfare. Accordingly, I ask you, German princes, for the sake of God, that you once become witty, not only through the harm of others, as wise men usually do, but through your own, and that you draw the sword, so that you may stab and strangle yourselves among yourselves for so long, against the cruelest enemies; the mighty power, that ye may destroy Germany, use it against the fiercest fury, and the counsel, that ye may rage against yourselves and your inmost parts, turn to the destruction of the Turks and the recovery of yours.

20. O iron and inhumane people, if you will not be moved here! O nefarious and wicked people, if you will not fight and wield the sword for the glory of God! O foolish and imprudent people, if you do not respect the danger ahead! O loveless and cruel ones, if you do not take the murder of children, wives and friends to heart! For what can keep you from such a necessary war and such a holy undertaking, I do not see, since the enemies, with whom you are to war and fight, are soft.

They are accustomed to dancing, but you are accustomed to arms and weapons; they are unclothed by all things and inexperienced in the art of war, but you are incomparable in the bravery of soldiers and the experience of commanders; they wage unjust wars, but you seek to defend yourselves against injustice; They wage war out of hatred against God, but you seek to save and avenge the honor of God from the shame of such a great enemy; they call upon the Mahomet, their lying prophet, for help and assistance, but you seek protection and help from the power and hand of our Savior Jesus. Now if the matter itself did not exist, whose condition was better and the cause of the war more just, I would endeavor to lay it before you with many and clear reasons and words and to prove it. But now that I think I have spoken enough about the reasons why it is necessary to take up arms and wage war, I must also say by what help it might be easier to start it and wage it better.

021 First of all, ye have on your side the invincible and most mighty commander, who can drive out the strongest army with a wave of his hand, conquer and overthrow the strongest castles without artillery, overthrow the highest towers from the foundation, and without sword and helmet fight valiantly and gain the victory. If you ask who he is, I say: God, who, being angered by so great and many disgraces of our Lord Jesus Christ, will not only save the honor of his name, but will also protect the righteous cause. And he that believeth not these things must be a beast, and not a Christian, but a Turk; not a pious man, but a denier of God.

022 Therefore lift up your minds unto him; put your trust and hope in him. With him let your salvation, welfare, honor, and triumph stand or fall! He will equip you and your peoples with the spirit of joy; he will give you good and useful counsel; he will adjust your battle orders, give you courage, send you provisions (or food) even from heaven, and provide all other necessities, if only you will bravely and joyfully save his majesty and name from the dreadful enemy's highest shame and blasphemy.

023 And if ye also look about for help of men, and ask counsel thereunto, here also am I done with the answer. For all Christian kings, even foreign ones, will help you.

and princes will not arise to their aid. The Swiss, a brave and in war well-tried and famous people, will make themselves known; the French, English, Dutch will help; the Bohemians, Hungarians, Poles will bring their power here and with united spirit and weapons break the enemy's undertakings, chase the enemy away and come back triumphant full of plunder. Even Clement, the pope and most vigilant shepherd, has decided to spare no expense for such a godly, just and necessary war; that I say nothing of so many free imperial cities, whose united power would also be almost alone capable of stopping or driving away this terrible enemy's power. Nor should you doubt that you will win the victory and the spoils, as often as you look at so many princes and heroes, all of whom are so splendid in youth and physique and strength. For their name and fame are so glorious, their stature and strength so great and important, that whoever looks at them easily calculates that the Turks are not only not to be greatly feared, but that one can also expect a certain victory.

024 For ye also have the most experienced captains of war; ye have a fresh and strong people; ye are not only superior to your enemies, but much more valiant; ye defend a more just cause than they; ye make war with authority; ye fight out of necessity, and have an abundance of the expenses of war, and of all the appurtenances thereof. What then could be the reason or cause why so useful, necessary, praiseworthy, godly, and honest a war should not be waged?

025 Why would ye open your mouths, and hear all this as it were in a deaf ear? Why should your minds not be moved by the adduction of such great things and miserable murderous games? Why would you not avenge yourselves on so fierce, ignominious, blasphemous, furious, and cruel an enemy? Ah! you German princes, a people otherwise so feared and powerful, will you now be lazy and indolent, since your virtue and bravery were before not only known to all foreign nations, but also terrible? Will you now be deaf and implacable, since your love and compassion for your fatherland have already been proved by so many trials? will you be so slow and tardy in averting your own danger and inflicted suffering, which you were otherwise so ready and swift not only to avert but also to avenge on foreign nations?

026 Wherefore now also let your courage be even from and such harmful delay be done away with. Seize the righteous weapons at once; chase the enemy out of the common fatherland, and with united minds, after the abolition of all internal wars, assemble your power; Save and defend your fatherland, cities, towns, villages, castles, houses and farms, freedom, women and children with your old courage and former zeal from the fury and rage of such a great enemy, so that you escape a wretched, miserable life, a miserable slavery, the disgrace and shame of women and children, the devastation of the fields, the desolation and destruction of the cities, yes, murder and death. For if you let the Turkish armies advance further; if you do not keep the tyrannical undertakings, nor drive back the hostile force, then it is not first to be asked how it will go for you, but only to see where any hole is left for you.

27. Now that there is such urgent and great need as has never been experienced before, and that you have been sufficiently torn apart by internal wars and pranks, and that you have come to such a pass through all too long and persistent disunity that not only the Germans but also the foreign peoples have begun to fear violence and tyranny on the part of the Turks, it is your duty, since you are the cause of such evils, to seek to restrain them: It is your duty that, since you are the cause of such evils, you also seek to dampen and avert them; that, since you have inflicted such dangerous wounds on the church and the state, you also heal and bind them up again; since you have thus divided and wrecked the condition of the common fatherland and the church, you now, through unanimous counsel and action, also straighten it out, set it right, and make it firm.

028 If ye do this, ye shall be esteemed prudent and careful; but if not, mad and foolish. If you do it, you will be praised for your care and prudence, but if not, you will be scolded for your carelessness and imprudence. If you do, you will help the common fatherland, increase the majesty and sovereignty of the Roman Empire, and restore the common harmony, but if not, you will completely destroy the rest of Germany's fortune, and shamefully lose the Roman Empire, which your bravery acquired and won, and fill everything with discord and disunity among each other.

029 Therefore, because such terrible evils of war and bloodshed and other mischiefs are hanging over your heads, and common peace and harmony have never been more necessary than now among the German princes, both the Christian religion and the Christian religion.

than to drive out the fierce enemy and restrain his violence and cruel deeds: I beg and exhort, through the death of our Saviour and Redeemer, for your and your fatherland's welfare and salvation, from the bottom of my heart, that you put away your errors, give Christ your suffering, injustice and enmity, unite your minds, and preserve and increase the common peace, the goods and ornaments of the Almighty God, and the glory of His Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, from Turkish disgrace and blasphemous filth, to defend the freedom of the common fatherland, to extend the Roman Empire, and to spread the glory of your name, to direct all your counsel, all your thoughts, thoughts and deeds, so that you adorn Germany with victory and booty, and tear and save us all from the miserable misery, murder and common danger.

(30) Which Pope Clement, successor of Peter and most vigilant shepherd, bestows and desires his apostolic greeting and blessing on all who go to this war.

May God, the author and governor of all salutary counsels and deeds, rule and guide your minds in such a way that whatever you undertake and conclude at this Diet may be to the glory of His name, to the unity of the Church, and to the peace and tranquility of the common people. Amen.

954 The answer given by the archbishop of Mainz on behalf of the estates to the speech of Cardinal Campegius.

From Cölestin, vol. I, p. 131.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

Most Reverend Sir! The unconquerable Emperor Carl, always Major of the Empire, the most noble King in Hungary and Bohemia, Ferdinandus, the most noble Princes and Princes present here, and the absent envoys, and all the estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have devoutly heard and diligently heeded your emphatic, godly, Christian and at these times especially necessary speech.

And since the unconquerable Emperor knows that he, as the supreme bailiff of the Church and the highest ruler of common Christendom on earth, is set and given by God, he also considers it his duty to try and do everything that may lead to the abolition of the disunity of the Church, to the settling of the disputes of the teachers, and to the rebuilding of the Church.

to serve and to serve for the restoration of the former peace.

And since he has experienced the devilish fury and the cruel Turkish rage of Wolsfgrimm for so many years with the greatest sorrow, he also believes that the greatest need requires that from now on all power and all wealth in gold and silver be used for war against the Turk, so that the danger that hangs over the Germans and the wounds that can affect German blood may be averted and prevented, and that the same savage enemy may be snatched from the Roman Empire, conquered again and taken from it.

To whose Majesty the most illustrious King in Hungary and Bohemia, Ferdinand, and others of the Roman Empire, the Princes, Counts and Estates, as assistants to their care and trouble, faithfully accede. princes, counts, prelates, and estates, as assistants to their care and toil, faithfully accede, willingly take upon themselves all labor and trouble, bear the costs that come to them, and, in case of need, give all the property of their kingdoms and countries, yea, to the protection and preservation of the Christian religion, and to the expulsion of the cruel despot from the borders of the empire, and will so show themselves in all things, that their counsels and deeds will first of all be acceptable to the most high God, and then also to our most holy father, Pope Clement VII., Shepherd of Christ's sheep and successor of Peter, and they will also do before men what their duty and office entails.

955 Report of the Elector John to Luther about the reading of the Confession, which was made difficult at first, but was finally approved.

See 946th Document, supra.

956 D. Luther's answer to the Elector, in which he testifies to his great joy at the reading. July 9, 1530.

As Burkhardt, p. 180 states, the original of this letter is in the Weimar archives; as De Wette says, also a simultaneous copy. The same is printed in Flacius' German collection, no. 3. In the editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 420 (wrong 402); in the Jenaer (1566), vol. V, p. 94; in the Altenburger, vol. V, p. 220; in the Leipziger, vol. XX, p. 176; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 82, and in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 169. - It is obvious that this letter cannot be the answer to the 946th document of June 25, given by Walch in the previous number, since Luther says at the very beginning of this letter that he is answering the Churfursten's letter of July 4.

I. Grace and peace in Christ. Most Serene, Most Reverend Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I received E. C. F. G.'s letter, given on July 4, today on July 9, and was pleased to hear that E. C. F. G.'s thoughts have been alleviated. For God knows that I do not write such letters to E. C. F. G. for any other reason than that I am concerned that Satan (who is a master of evil thoughts) would grieve E. C. F. G.. Otherwise I know and respect that our Lord Christ Himself comforts E. C. F. G.'s heart better than I or anyone else can.

(2) The work also exists, and bears witness to it; for the adversaries think they have almost done well, that they have forbidden preaching by imperial commandment; but the wretched people do not see that by the written confession more is preached than perhaps otherwise ten preachers might have done. On the other hand, the wretched people do not see that more has been preached through the written confession than ten preachers might otherwise have done. Is it not a fine wisdom and a great joke that M. Eisleben and others must keep silent; but instead the Elector of Saxony and other princes and lords appear with the written confession, and preach freely before the imperial majesty and the whole empire under their noses, so that they must hear it and cannot speak against it. They do not want to let their servants listen to the preachers; but they themselves must hear nuisances (as they call them) from such great lords, and fall silent. Christ is not silent at the Diet, and if they should be mad, they must hear more from the confession than they would have heard from the preachers in a year. So it is that St. Paul says that God's word wants to be unbound. If it is forbidden in the pulpit, it must be heard in the palaces. If poor preachers must not speak it, then great princes and lords speak it. When all is silent, the stones will cry out," says Christ himself.

(3) As to the other matter, however, which E. C. F. G. may request of me, I will humbly state my opinion. Firstly: If Your Imperial Majesty would request that Your Imperial Majesty be allowed to be judge in this matter because

1) So in the original according to Burkhardt. De Wette: broken; Wittenberger and Jenaer: smelled.

Her Imperial Majesty Majesty does not intend to dispute much in this matter: I think that E. C. F. G. could indicate that Imperial Majesty is bringing a letter of invitation to the court. Majesty brings with him a writ of summons to hear the matters graciously. Where this should not happen, however, such a writ would have been without necessity, and Imperial Majesty would also have been able to bring such a judgement within the limits of the law. Majesty might well have done such judging in Hispania, and E. C. F. G. should not have demanded with such heavy trouble and expense to Augsburg, and may also spare other imperial states the same. For where no more could have been obtained nor hoped for, such a reply from Imperial Majesty's postmen would have been of no avail. Majesty's postmen could have delivered such a reply. It would, however, be a great pity for His Imperial Majesty and the whole Majesty and the whole Empire a great disgrace and perhaps great annoyance and trouble, where Imperial Majesty's unheard matter is bad. Majesty wanted to take a bad approach to the matter and be the judge, and not give any other answer. For of course such wise counsel is no one's, but E. C. F. G.'s dear friend N. N.; it is certainly not the Emperor, as everyone will and must say.

4. secondly: Where Kaiserl. Majesty (that is N. N.) wanted to insist that one should let her Imperial Majesty be a judge in this matter, E. C. F. G. can say with all joy: Yes. Majesty be the judge in this matter, E. C. F. G. can say with all joy: Yes, let Imperial Majesty be the judge in this matter, and E. C. F. G. can say with all joy: Yes, let Imperial Majesty be the judge in this matter. Majesty be judge here, and E. C. F. G. will accept and suffer everything, so far and except, that his Imperial Majesty will not be against the light. Majesty does not judge against the Holy Scriptures or the Word of God. For E. C. F. G. cannot set the Emperor above God, nor accept his judgment against God's Word. With this, Imperial Majesty is honored enough. Majesty, because nothing, for only God, who should and must be above all, is preferred to His Imperial Majesty. Majesty.

(5) Thirdly, whether they would claim that one wanted to disgrace imperial majesty herewith, as one would consider her inclined to do against God. Majesty, as one would consider her inclined to do against God, but should believe that Imperial Majesty, as a Christian prince, would not conclude or judge contrary to the divine word. Majesty, as a Christian prince, would not conclude or judge contrary to the divine word 2c. (as they also reproached me at Worms, in the same way as now E. C. F. G.): to this E. C. F. G. will well know how to answer, namely, that God has harshly forbidden trusting in princes and men, as the 118th sv. 8th] and 146th Psalm sv. 3rd] says: should eoullære in prinepidus. Yea, even that

The first commandment of God suffers not, because he saith, Thou shalt not have other gods. "If the word of their own mouth is right, and if they are Christian princes, they cannot prove it better than that they judge and speak with and according to the word of Christ: Thus saith Christ 2c.

006 But if they judge without scripture, or if they would that their judgment should be accepted without scripture, their own mouth punisheth them, that they would be Christian princes without and apart from Christ: which is worse than to be a lord without land, rich without money, learned without arts: but it is called lusipientiaipsorumingniksstutit.

7) E. C. F. G. be of good cheer. Christ is here, and will again confess E. C. F. G. before his 1) Father, as E. C. F. G. now confess him before this wicked generation, as he saith, "Whoso honoureth me, him will I honour again" [1 Sam. 2, 30.]. The same Lord that began it will bring it forth, amen. I pray for E. C. F. G. with diligence and earnestness; could I do more, I owe it. God's grace be, as before, and multiply in E. C. F. G., Amen. On Saturday, July 9, 1530.

957 Letter of D. Justus Jonas to Luther. June 25, 1530.

From Cölestin, vol. I, p. 135.

Translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace from God in Christ! Her Imperial Maj. Maj. has postponed and forbidden the sermons here in both parts, since it was discussed for almost two days that against the imperial prohibition no action should be taken. The two parts of the city have been postponed, since it was discussed for almost two days that no action should be taken against the imperial ban, but that this should be borne in patience and that Her Imperial Maj. Maj.'s command, especially here in the imperial free imperial city, especially since not only we, but also the papists and sacramentarians, who have had the upper hand here up to now, have been forbidden to preach for the sake of peace, until the matter has been investigated. In the meantime, however, on Sundays

1) De Wette and the Erlanger: "for his father".

The Gospel text, without explanation, together with the epistles of Paul, is read to the people on these days; as Mr. Philip has already written to you about this matter, and I have also already done in my letters.

Yesterday [June 24] 1) the Emperor met with the princes and estates of the empire in the town hall, and heard Cardinal Campegius speak; although his speech was not very long. He exhorted the Germans to peace, and that one should fight against the Turks. Against the Lutherans he said nothing adverse or sensitive. Almost at the same time, an envoy arrived from the Austrians, or from the estates of this empire, who, because of the terrible harassment of the Turks, made pitiful complaints about how they, along with all their possessions, wives and children, were already for the fifth time in extreme danger of their lives. Their instructions were read out as King Ferdinand sat in attendance. This day was also appointed for our princes, so that they might bring in the articles of their confession on the same day, and they signed such: our Elector, the young Prince, then Margrave George, Duke Ernst of Lüneburg, the Prince of Hesse, the Prince and Lord of Anhalt, the Council of Nuremberg, and the Council of Reutlingen. The Landgrave mainly insisted that one should be able to make a statement before Her Imperial Majesty and the imperial estates. Maj. and the imperial estates that the articles be read aloud loud and clear. King Ferdinand, however, in the midst of the session, soon had this, soon that, which he brought out of the way and blew into the ears of the others, and did not rest until he hindered the reading on this day.

(3) But today at 2 o'clock, since the assembly will not be too strong, our articles shall be read out before several princes, although in the imperial chamber. Our articles are to be read out before several princes.

(4) We still hope that if her Imperial Majesty will graciously investigate the matter. I say, we still hope that you, dearest father, shall be called hither by a herald. I cannot tell how many speeches of carnal prudence will be made, as if you will not be safe from secret persecution and violence; but since God has done great wonders before, we will not let our courage sink even now. Although I myself would not like that you should be in you want to make such a heavy thing suffer and start the dangerous journey. But the Lord will govern all things. There are six cardinals here, also many theologians and Spanish bishops. The Cardinal and Bishop of Trent and Salzburg, the Cardinal of Mainz, the Bishop and Cardinal of Rossano, the Pope's envoy to King Ferdinand; they are all daily in the Emperor's palace, and besides these there is a whole swarm of priests, who stand around their Majesty like bees, and are daily taken up with a new hatred against us and you, and burn no other than the fire in the thorns.

1) After this we have given the time determination of No. 953.

(5) How has your prophetic book, which is a very holy book, been received, I have written to you? But dear God! what is the use of writing, if we poor have the misfortune with our letters that none are handed down. I would gladly see you write to Philip more often; the man is afflicted with a strange sadness, and especially because of the common cause. I have to remember that he takes the Psalm and does not speak to God in his own words but in David's words in such an important matter. But he lets himself be carried away by his affect. The Lord knows, I must confess, that I consider myself bound to you with my life for your psalm, for I have nothing at all to support me in my manifold struggle, but your catechism, of which you tell me that I can find my God at home in it. The golden psalms, thanks be to the Lord Christ! I understand, and the blind adversaries know nothing of them; that one must have more compassion for them than they hate. Ah God! who could give thanks heartily. How much richer is Argula von Staufen than all the bishops who do not know God, and of whom God does not know either.

(6) I beg and implore through Christ that you will not let any opportunity to write to me pass. My heartfelt greetings to N. Veit, as well as to your dear wife, and likewise to your sons and daughters. May the Lord Christ grant, if it be his divine will in heaven, that I may see my own healthy and well, Amen. Given in Augsburg, June 25, on the Saturday after St. John, in the year 1530.

2) In a letter of June 12, which is reported in Kolde, Analecta, p. 126 ff. - By the "truly prophetic book" Luther's admonition to the clergy assembled at Augsburg is meant.

558. D. Martin Luther's Answer to the Letter of Just. Jonas. June 30, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in Ooü. leu. b., Lol. 128, and in Aurifaber, vol. ill. bl. 27. Printed in Oo6l68tinu8, llist. VnA. Oouf., torn. I. tot. 136 k; in Chyträus, p. 141; in lluckäeus, x>. 108 and at De Wette, vol. IV, p. 45 (with the incorrect date: 20 June). German in Chyträus, p. 239, and incomplete in Cyprian's Supplements to the Hist. of the Augsb. Conf., p. 176, of which Walch has given an imprint (without date). We have corrected the time according to Köstlin, M. Luther (3), Vol. II, p. 656. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ. At last your letters have come, 1) my dear Jonas, after you have plagued us for three full weeks with your silence, although I have written twice to M. Philip, 2) that you would not be so silent. And certainly, if the nature of the time lice had not hindered me, I would have devised a revenge. But the time of prayer did not permit anger, and anger did not cease to pray. But I have taken care to make you infamous everywhere because of this silence, especially in Wittenberg. Nor is it right for you to accuse the messengers; they have delivered [the letters] faithfully, especially the one hired by you. For from the time when this one delivered your letter, I have received nothing but this last one about the arrival and the entry of the emperor 3) and yesterday the one about your complaints. But this I will avenge in due time.

4) I am very glad and rejoice exceedingly over the exceedingly great gift of God, that our prince has such a steady and calm mind. For I believe that our prayers, which are poured out for this heart, are pleasing in the realm of glory before God, and I predict (propheto) that we will be heard in other things as well. 5) This joy of mine has been increased by the fact that our prince has such a steady and calm mind. This joy of mine has been increased in that I know that

1) June 29. Köstlin I. o. p. 655.

2) On June 5 and 7; De Wette, Vol. IV, 32 and 35.

3) The letter of Jonas of June 18 (Kolde, Anatecta, p. 134) was received by Luther on June 29. See No. 980 in this volume.

4) It is only here that Walch comes in.

5) De Wette: vos; Cyprian: nos.

You are very confident in the Lord against this raging of Satan. Philip is troubled by his philosophy and nothing else, for the matter is in the hand of him who may say in the most hopeful way: No man shall pluck it out of my hand [John 10:28.]. I would not, nor would it be advisable, that it should be in our hand. "I have had many of them in my hand, and have lost them all, not keeping One 6)." But the [things] which I have hitherto been able to cast out of my hands upon Him, I have them still intact and whole. For this is the truth [Ps.46:2.], "GOD is our confidence and strength." Who hath trusted in Him, and been forsaken? says the wise man, and again [Ps. 9:11.]. "Thou trustest not them that seek Thee, O LORD."

Here I have become a new student of the holy ten commandments, since, becoming a child again, I learn them from word to word, and see that it is true that His wisdom is not a number, and have begun to judge that the ten commandments are the dialectic of the gospel, and the gospel the rhetoric of the ten commandments, and that Christ has all that is in Moses, but Moses does not have all that is in Christ, and I have called [them (the ten commandments)] by a new name. 7)... Thus they seem to me to be indefinite, but a very definite guide (ealouäarius) in all things.

With regard to the letters to be written to your wife, nothing has been omitted. For we also send all your letters immediately to Wittenberg, where they are awaited as it were by a thirsty country, and they write to us very frequently, so that I am ashamed on your account that you are surpassed by them in this service of love, whereas you ought to surpass them. The Elbe has leaked again, although there was no rain, but the greatest heat; so writes my mistress Käthe. 8)

6) So Walch after Cyprian. De Wette: "one"; in the Codices: "one".

7) Here is a gap in all sources. - It seems that the ten commandments (Ü66ulo^u8) are spoken of here (according to this our addition and the translation of the following).

8) The preceding, from the gap on, is missing in Walch. The same news of the Elbe's leaking is already in the letter of June 7 to Melanchthon, De Wette, vol. IV., P. 35, almost in the same words.

I am glad that the Pope has been given a sign with the mule in childbirth, so that he may have something to show that he despises God even more and will perish all the more quickly. I cannot wonder enough about Ferdinand that he is so oblivious of the Turk, indeed, of the plight of his own. I, if so many people had been snatched from me and killed, would die in an hour, especially if my conscience had added that I had caused it through negligence. But I have never seen an ungodly man perish, except he were hardened and sure, that the truth might stand [1 Thess. 5:3.], "When they shall say, It is peace, and there is no danger. "2c. So shall it be with our bishops. For because there is no hope that they can be changed, I like to see them become obdurate and more angry, as they deserve. Let us only be bold in Christ. He liveth, and we also shall live, though we be dead; and the children and the wives of the dead shall he provide for. He reigneth, and we shall reign, yea, we reign already. If I shall be called, 1) I shall come without doubt, if Christ wills it, though I handle the thoughts that I desire to come also uncalled and uncalled. The grace of God be with you. From the desert, June 30, 2) 1530. Martin Luther.

959. extract from a manuscript of the chancellor Brück, which has the title: Plot of the Religious matter at Augsburg, 1530.

The manuscript of this writing is in the Weimar Archives. Ue.] L., toi. 3. seckendorf, nist. Initü. , jid. II, x. 202 a already expresses the assumption that Brück is the author of this report. Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p.459, who had this writing printed in his "Archiv", p. 50, speaks of it as a certain thing. Therefore, we have changed the old superscription, as insufficient. Walch correctly notes that this writing is opposed to the report given in this volume, No. 1159. It is found in Müller's History of the Protestation of the Protestant Estates and in Cyprian's Supplements to the History of the Augsburg Confession, p. 105, from which it is included here.

1) This refers to No. 957, §4. This confirms our determination of the time of this letter, against Burkhardt, p. 177.

2) On De Wette the "20th of June".

(1) Because the five princes and sovereigns, 3) as indicated, were thus bound to deliver their opinions and articles, and in three days, as on Friday, their sovereigns and princes have ordered their preachers and scholars to do so. However, since it is feared that it will not be possible to finish and write the same in a pure and proper manner, so that they could be handed over and presented on Friday, it is intended to send to the Archchancellor of Mainz, as the Archchancellor of the Empire, and to ask his Electoral Grace to have the articles and opinions of the Archchancellor of Mainz read by the Archchancellor of Mainz. Grace that the surrender be extended by one day. However, the said of Mainz has given an answer to the skilful one of the five Electors and Princes: "If it is in the power and authority of his Electoral Grace to do so, it is in the power and authority of his Elector. If it were in his power and authority, he would gladly comply with their wishes; but since it had been presented to His Majesty, it would not be in his hands. Majesty, on the same Friday, as on the day of St. John the Baptist, had summoned the Papal Legate, Cardinal Campey. Cardinal Campegium after Vespers, and would then also await such transfer, it would be difficult to obtain a change from Her Majesty. Therefore, Her Electoral and Princely Grace have sent themselves. and princes have had to prepare themselves with the articles, as well as they could in such haste. And because the embassies of the cities, Nuremberg and Reutlingen, have indicated to their sovereigns and princes the order of their lords. And because the embassies of the cities, Nuremberg and Reutlingen, have indicated to their sovereigns and princes that they should settle the matters with their sovereigns, the same embassies have signed with and according to their sovereigns and princes. The same messages have been signed with and according to their sovereign and princely sovereigns.

2) And as the historian 4) further indicates that over certain four days, including the appointed Tuesday [June 21], the five Electors, Princes, and the two cities of the Imperial Majesty wanted to hand over their Christian articles and opinions in duplicate in Latin and German. Majesty their Christian articles and opinions in duplicate, in Latin and German, so it happened:

3) As the Imperial Majesty, the Cardinal Campegium. Majesty heard the Cardinal Campegium at three o'clock, after Vespers, after the Cardinal's ending, as Papal Legates, publicity and thereupon by Imperial Legates. Legates, advertisement, and thereupon by Imperial. Majesty's answer, after the Cardinal's departure, the five Prince Churfürst and Princes are to be removed from their

3) The "five Churfürst and Fürsten" are the five princely signers of the German Confession, which are given in the St. Louis edition of the Concordienbuch, p. 50; also in the next following number.

4) The unnamed papist author of Report No. 1159 in this volume.

They have assembled together with the two related cities in the opinion that they should present their confession and articles of faith in simplified form to the Catholic Majesty in the presence of the royal dignities of Hungary and Bohemia. Majesty, in the presence of the royal dignities of Hungary and Bohemia, and also of the other princes, princes and estates, to present their confession and articles of faith in twofold form.

4. Majesty has held talks with the King, and also with several Electors and Princes, and has ordered the Elector of Brandenburg to be their Elector and Prince. and the embassies of the cities, and have them notified: Her Majesty graciously requests that they be forgiven a little with their request. For her Majesty wished to hear the Austrian, Carniolan and Carinthian embassies, which wished to present their objections to her Majesty and Estates on account of the Turk. After that, her Majesty also wanted to hear her electoral and princely graces.

(5) The aforementioned five princes, rulers, and embassies of the two cities have allowed this to happen, and the aforementioned embassies, because of their burdensome duties, have gladly escaped.

006 Now that the same messages have been heard, and their departure therefrom obtained, the said electors, princes, and cities have caused them to be recited:

(7) After Her Imperial Majesty had appointed this Diet. 7. Since Her Imperial Majesty has appointed this Imperial Diet, among other things, because of the discord that has arisen in our holy religion, in such a way that every man's opinion, opinion, and opinion shall be graciously heard, and thereupon, at the beginning of the same Imperial Diet, in Her Majesty's lecture, has graciously agreed to submit such articles and opinions of every part, in Latin and German, in writings. And thereupon, at the beginning of the same Imperial Diet, at Her Majesty's lecture, it was graciously intended to submit such articles and opinions of each part in duplicate, in Latin and German, in writings, and it was also indicated to Her Majesty by the Committee of the Electors, Princes and Estates that the said five Electors and Princes would present and submit such their opinions, articles and opinions from today, Friday; and although the time was somewhat short for their electoral and princely graces, they would nevertheless have taken care, as much as was possible in a hurry, to bring their articles together in writing and in both languages. They have them all there in hand, and ask Imperial Majesty in all submissiveness. Majesty in all submission that they want to be free to hear them read together with royal dignitaries, princes, princes and estates. Afterwards they wanted to hand them over to their Majesty humbly, confident that the other Electors, Princes and Estates would now also present their opinions and views in the same way.

(8) It has been demanded, however, that Her Majesty hold council and discussion with several Electors, Princes, and embassies, and Her Majesty has given the five Electors, Princes, and the aforementioned! and the cities mentioned above: that Her Majesty has given her Electoral and Princely Grace and the confession of the cities. It is now almost late and in the evening, it would also be an unnecessary delay. For since the matters were written in documents, Her Majesty requested that the same documents be sent to her, as if Her Majesty wished to consider and consider them according to necessity.

(9) On the other hand, the five Electors and Princes have charged that their Majesty should graciously consider that they would so reluctantly burden their Majesty with unnecessary things as they could well consider that it would be inconvenient for their Majesty and other important business. But it would have this form, that her high and princely graces It would, however, be in such a form that her majesty's and prince's graces would have been carried out by her detractors on account of the faith, and what was pending in the matter, as they would have come to believe, with her majesty, as well as others in and outside of the realm, as also in days to come, as if they had such articles held for themselves and preached in their lands and territories, which should be contrary to God and his holy gospel. So that their majesty and all men who are present may hear that such an imposition is done to them for vain innocence:

(10) Their great and immeasurable need requires them to seek this from their Majesty humbly, and they would again ask their Majesty in all humility and for the sake of God not to be burdened to hear these articles together with the royal dignities and also the other princes, princes and estates; so it would also be the case with the writings that they would be gathered in haste and would be difficult to read, therefore the electoral and princely graces of their servants would have ordered one to read these articles as quickly as possible and not to delay their Majesty in particular. Therefore, the electoral and princely graces of their servants have ordered one to read these articles as quickly as possible and not to delay their majesty in particular.

(11) Thereupon Her Imperial Majesty again consulted with the Princes. 11. Her Imperial Majesty then spoke again with the Princes, as well as with several Princes and embassies, and almost renewed the previous opinion, and before that requested to hand over the writings to Her Majesty, who also wanted Her Majesty to read them and listen to them, as they heard Her Majesty now and this time, with the request that the same would not be meant for any disgrace to them.

012 Wherefore the five princes, sovereigns, and embassies of the cities have spoken again, saying, that out of loyalty                      they                      were                      high,                      that                      they                      would

If their Majesty should further request to hear their confession: now, however, they urge, for the above-mentioned reasons, in particular, that they could not spare their Majesty and other estates so great a burden, as they would otherwise gladly do; and if their Electoral and Princely Graces, even those of related cities, should ever have anything to ask of their Majesty, it would be just this, and that their Majesty would graciously grant them this request. And if their electoral and princely graces, also the related cities, ever had anything to petition their Majesty, it would be just this, and that their Majesty would graciously grant them in this.

(13) Thus also Her Imperial Majesty has hitherto Her Imperial Majesty has hitherto always abided by the gracious imperial will towards everyone. That her Imperial Majesty has not refused such a thing to anyone in much lesser and unimportant matters. Majesty had not refused anyone in many lesser and unimportant matters. These, however, are matters that are of concern to their sovereigns and princes. Their kinsmen's souls and oaths 1) were concerned.

(14) Their most imploring request and entreaty to Her Majesty would again be that Her Majesty would graciously hear their petition for God's sake. As they also wanted to put off this to her Majesty in all subservience without refusal. However, may it be their sovereign and princely graces and the messages of the cities. If, however, their electoral and princely graces and the embassies of the cities should not receive it from their Majesty, they would have to command it to the eternal God, but for their honor, necessity, and Christian glory, and to praise God, they would have done their part. For they could consider that it was not their intention to set their Majesty's measure further than their Majesty's gracious will; with the most humble request that their Majesty would not understand this otherwise than for their unavoidable necessity and for no disgrace.

(15) Thereupon the Imperial Majesty has again indicated. After a discussion, His Majesty again announced that His Majesty would not do such a thing to the electoral and princely graces of His Majesty. and princely graces, as well as to the related cities, to no disfavor, but that for the reasons stated, they had this time refused to do so. However, so that Her Majesty should not feel any lack, Her Majesty wished to hear their writings on the morning of Saturday after the eighth day of Corporis Christi [June 25] in the presence of the royal dignitaries, Her Majesty's brothers, and also electors, princes and estates according to length.

16 The above-mentioned Electors, Princes, and Embassies of the two cities have expressed their gratitude in all submission, and have offered to wait for the gracious decision in all submission. On the aforementioned Saturday almost at four o'clock in the evening, His Imperial Majesty, now reported. Majesty, according to the now reported departure, held audience in the presence of the King,

1) Maybe: "honor"?

Princes, princes and embassies, also estates, in their majesty's chapel. The church, from which those who are not the princes' and lords' counsellors have been ordered to escape.

(17) And after a short speech of submission, which the above-mentioned Electors, Princes and the embassies of the cities have made before the Imperial Majesty, the German Confession has been publicly and brightly read by the Chancellor of Saxony. Majesty, the German Confession was publicly and brightly published by the Chancellor of the Elector of Saxony, so that everyone could note the substance, before the Imperial Majesty, in the presence of the states affected. Majesty, in the presence of the affected estates, and thereafter both writings were handed to Her Majesty herself, and Her Majesty, through Count Palatine Frederick, after the reading and handing over of the affected writings, had this safely announced.

(18) After Her Majesty had heard the writ presented, and after it had been delivered to Her Majesty, Her Majesty wished to have this transaction, which would be great and important to Himself, moved, and to show Himself in it earnest and without reproach.

(19) And thereupon the said Count Palatine, as by command of the Imperial Majesty, immediately petitioned the five princes, lords, and embassies of the cities that they did not want the confession now read without the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, the five Electors, Princes and Embassies of the cities were persuaded that they did not want the confession now read out without Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's prior knowledge.

20th Thereupon His Princely Grace, the said Elector, Princes and Cities. Grace, the aforesaid Elector, Princes, and Cities replied that they would rely on such Imperial. Majesty. Majesty's request without reference.

21 And although it is true that at that time no more than two of the cities, Nuremberg and Reutlingen, were related to their confession, yet soon after four more cities, namely Weissenburg, Heilbrunn, Kempten, and Winheim, turned to them and asked that they be represented to their sovereign and princely graces and to other two cities in their Christian confession. and other two cities in their Christian confession. Which has thus come to pass. Thereafter, in the actions that occurred for the sake of faith, they were also consulted by their electoral and princely graces. Their messages were present at that time. Therefore the historian praises God that he has increased the lowly household even in weakness, and [not] 2) diminished it, as it will be in the end, should have reported the same also, or afterwards, when he has not done so, therefore he should have reported the same to the one, in which GOT-

2) "not" added by us. It would also like to be read: "and has reduced their number". - But the author of No. 1159 has reported in § 9 of his report in passing that "in the meantime four other cities have joined them".

W. xvi, 984-986. 829

the miraculous work of art, has written too little.

22) But he writes too much mildly soon after, since he indicates that the five electors, princes, and associated cities should have requested to have their confession publicly read out in the town hall, that they sought the chance or the listening of the people.

23 For he has heard it from those estates which the imperial majesty has at that time called in her majesty. Majesty at that time in her Majesty's Council and Conversations. Council and Conversations, it may well be inferred from this that the public reading in that place has been prevented, that is, by them, as those so partial, for these inexplicable causes, or the scribe, who must himself have invented it on the five Electors, Princes, and Cities: for although he further appends in his booklet that Imperial Majesty, when she understood such a thing, has given her Majesty the Princes and Cities the right to read it, it is not possible for him to have done so. Majesty, understanding this, did not wish to grant the petition of the princes and cities; yet other causes, namely that it was late in the evening, and not these, were brought forward by her Majesty.

(24) But since such a confession was not to be publicly read and heard, what would have been so great about it that it would have been considered harmless by the Elector of Mainz, even though their electors and princes and the cities had first delivered such a written confession on the aforementioned Saturday? and the cities would have handed over such a written confession first on the aforementioned Saturday, but his C. F. Grace would still have been angry about it. F. Gn. was still unhappy and little comforted, since the day for such a transfer had been set for Friday, as the Imperial Majesty had also ordered it to be made on Saturday. Maj. would be in the house without it, together with the fact that the other part does not even hand over their opinion and discretion. For since it was to be a mere handing over, there would have been no need for the Imperial Majesty to be present in person with it. Maj. in his own person, since the writings could have been handed over to her Majesty's Councillors by some of the Electors' Councillors on Friday or early on Saturday.

(25) Therefore it is a palliation, which has neither truth nor reason, and which the historian or his pretender has used to glorify and supposedly cover up their disgrace, which they incurred at that time with males, that they, in having the truth of God's word publicly read out, prevented Imperial Majesty the Holy Roman Emperor from believing that the five electors, princes, and related cities had, for cause, asked to hear the writings publicly, which their electors, princes, and related cities had written. Majesty had prevented them from believing that the five Electors, Princes and related cities had asked to hear the writings publicly, which their Electors and Princes and they, as in the case of the Holy Roman Emperor, had not heard. Gn. and they, as above mentioned, have pleaded, as namely, the because they would have been highly incriminated and reviled in the Imperial Majesty and other high and low estates, both within and outside the Empire. Majesty and other high and low estates, both within and outside of the empire, would be highly burdened and disparaged on account of their faith, that for this reason they would like to be heard publicly, in which 1) the matters of faith would be on their side. For that they would thereby seek favor with the common people is evident from the assumption, which they have for themselves without this, that their opinion would have been more Christian, better, and more right, since it would have been more favorable to their electoral and princely graces through history. and princely graces would have been perverted by the historian and his followers with untruth, it is to be understood sufficiently that Pimpinellus 2) shortly before in a public audience, where everyone, being of the estates and their councils, might have listened, their chur- and princely graces and their fellow kinsmen, had been able to hear that the Pimpinellus was a Christian, better, and more right opinion of theirs. and their co-relatives, only that he had not named them, had challenged them in the highest and most burdensome way for the sake of faith, and had challenged the Imperial Majesty and everyone else. Majesty, as well as everyone else, against their electoral and princely graces. He has also violently insisted on the fact that he has not named them, and that the Imperial Majesty, as well as everyone else, has violently insisted against their electoral and princely graces.

26) Besides that it is to be understood clearly from several reports indicated before, namely from the Instruction, 3) which was sent to the Elector of Saxony from Insbruck, and in addition from the trade that at the hour of Imperial Majesty's arrival at Augsburg and the following days with her electors and princes the Emperor of Saxony is to be sent to Augsburg. Majesty's arrival at Augsburg and the following days with her electoral and princely graces. All this, as well as other things that are still in progress, should have given the five Electors and Princes sufficient cause to request a public reading.

027 Consider every man what he would esteem his need to be in such a case, since it concerns much lesser things than his soul, honor, and conscience.

(28) Thus the audience at the Town Hall has not been such that males who have not been elected by Imperial Majesty, nor by royal dignitaries, princes, and estates, have been allowed to go up. Majesty, nor of the royal dignities, princes, princes and estates, were permitted to go up. For the doorkeepers and guardians have been ordered at the slams of the doors not to permit the same: with what truth then may the historian indicate that the much-vaunted elector, princes and cities sought the favor of the people, and yet were not present?

029 Wherefore every one may conclude with him with more reason this supposition, that the her-the prevention of the opposing party on such pretence as the five electors, princes, and cities sought with the public reading applause of the people, to have practiced with imperial majesty that they had such. Majesty that they had such, because they and their followers had their electoral and princely graces at the imperial Majesty's disposal. They have practiced such before the Imperial Majesty with applause of the people, that they had such, because they and their followers had disparaged their electoral and princely graces noticeably and greatly beforehand with the Imperial Majesty and other estates, should the Christian confession of the five Electors, Princes and related cities be read out publicly, it would be understood from this, that they had accused the same Electors, Princes and their relatives of untruth for unjust reasons.

(30) It is also safe to believe that they would have preferred, as much as they could, to prevent the same confession from being publicly read, either at that time or afterwards, if the affected princes, princes, and cities had not so often, in all submission and for God's sake, admonished Imperial Majesty as a noble emperor, with necessary and permanent causes. Majesty, as a laudable emperor, with indication of necessary permanent causes.

31 For the truth is, when the same confession was read on the next day in the Palatinate, many pious Christian and good-hearted people, who were not of the common people, said that the things were shown to them much differently by the aforementioned prince, princes, and cities than they understood from the public reading of the confession. Some also let themselves be heard, how much they did not want to take for it, that they should not have been at the reading.

032 For Christ, the mouth of truth, testifieth that every one that shuneth the light love not the truth; but he that shuneth not the light love the truth. Since the five princes, rulers, and related cities have requested that their confession be read publicly, let every reader know whether the people will favor them in it. For what good would it have been to them, if they had gained the favor of twenty or thirty unintelligent people for an hour or two, and yet, if they themselves had understood that the articles presented had no truth on them, they would have had to expect mockery again from the great merchants and the most intelligent of their foolishness?

033 For whether the same confession, when it was publicly read, might have been mocked or ridiculed by any, even by them, the adversaries themselves, and that it was not rather heard with great silence and earnestness, let every one that was present at that time bear witness with a fine conscience of his own.

(34) Therefore the historian should have refrained from displeasing the five electors, princes, and adhering cities with their request, which they made several times for the sake of God, which name they did not want to use uselessly for vanity, and to set themselves up as judges against the office of a historian, or he should have judged according to open and probable truth.

(35) It is also certain that the aforementioned historian must condemn himself in that in which he wanted to judge the five electors and princes, namely, to gain the common people, among whom these books were to be spread, by accident, and to roll the displeasure onto the five electors, princes, and attached cities.

036 That he hath been sufficiently overcome with these accusations, which are now heard, in hope that he hath thereby restored his folly and reproach, and that of them who peradventure have provoked him to it with gifts and promises. 1)

The Augsburg Confession

or Confession of the Faith of Several Princes and Cities, Delivered to the Imperial Majesty at Augsburg, Anno 1530 (Read on June 25, 1530).

The original of the Augsburg Confession has not yet been found, but there are a large number of manuscripts of it, namely ten Latin, fifteen German and one French, which J. T. Müller describes and discusses in detail in his historical-theological introduction to the symbolic books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, p. 4XII ff, as does Förstemann in his Urkundenbuche, Vol. I, p. 369 ff. It is not our task to report on them in detail, therefore we refer the reader to the aforementioned sources. It should only be mentioned here that both declare the so-called second Ansbach manuscript to be a collation with the original, and to be one "which gives us the text of the Confession in a form which has a high degree of conformity with the copy handed over to the Emperor". Of the Mainz manuscript Müller says I. o. S. I. XXVII f., that this, whose text the Concordienbuch is based on, has not a few errors, namely spelling mistakes, omissions, and sentences disfigured by transposition. But it cannot be denied that its text mostly agrees with that of the best manuscripts, and its errors are easily improved according to the same and according to the editio princeps.

1) As this last paragraph is senseless in Walch, we have put Deß instead of "Das"; overcome instead of "überfunden"; his instead of "his"; him instead of "them"; habe instead of "haben".

W. xvi, 988 f. 833

so that we have no reason to abandon the ecclesiastically received text and accept another one in its place, of which we also cannot prove that it is closer to the original. - The Emperor had indeed demanded of the Protestant estates that they not allow the Confession to be printed without the Emperor's prior knowledge, and they had consented to this (see the previous number, §§ 19 and 20.), but without their knowledge and will, seven different editions appeared already during the Imperial Diet and soon after its conclusion, six German and one Latin, all without indication of the place of printing, the editors, and the publishers. They are all printed from one copy, the first four of the German editions under the title: "Arpeiguug vnd bekantnus des Glaubens vnd der Iere, so die adpellierenden Stände Key. Maiestet auff yetzigen tag zu Augspurg überantwort habend. NVXXX.", in quarto, in Upper German dialect; the fifth in Lower Saxon, probably by Bugenhagen; the sixth in High German. They differ little from each other; the first four abound in misprints; the fifth is more correct, and still more so the sixth. The Latin edition has the title: Eonkessio exNiditu irr oonitiis ^uZustas ^anno NVXXX 2c., also in quarto. It approaches the Ansbach manuscript in its peculiarities and also has many printing errors. The unreliability of these prints induced Melancthon to organize an edition of the Latin and German text. This is entitled: "Eonkssio Kicker exüiklta inuotiss. Eussari XuZ. in Eormoiik. ^anno

NOXXX. Xckckita sst ^poloZia Eonkoskionis. Both, Deudsch vnd Latin. IVitsbsrgae. "At the end: „Inaprskkurn per OsorZiuni Rdau. NOXXXI. "Quart. - "Confessio odder Bekantnus des Glaubens etlicher Fürsten vnd Stedte: Vberantwort Keiserlicher Maiestat: zu Augspurg. Anno N. V.XXX. Apologia of the Confession." Quarto. At the end: "Printed at Wittenberg by Georgen Rhaw. Anno VI. v.XXXI." On this Müller remarks I.

o. p. QXVI: "From this date it must not be concluded that this edition did not appear until 1531," and gives evidence that the Augsburg Confession was completed and issued as early as 1530, but that the date refers only to the Apology. This edition was arranged in such a way that either the German or the Latin alone, or both together, could be issued, and copies of both types exist. Therefore Walch (table of contents! of the 16th volume, p. 48 b) is surprised that in the copy available to him "both German and Latin" is promised on the title page, but the German text is not included. In quick succession several editions appeared, about whose differences Bindseil has reported most completely in the 26th volume of the Oorp. Rok. has reported. The just mentioned quarto edition, as Walch states, is considered the pure, improved, and genuine one. But Melancthon made changes already in other quarto editions of 1531, and still more in the Latin octavo editions, which were followed by the German ones of 1533 and 1536. This caused no further sensation, since the alterations were confined merely to the wording and expression, and by no means in any way approached the Lutheran doctrine. Although Wigand, in his Ilist. de X. 6. Königsberg, 1574, has stated that righteous people (bonis) would have been annoyed by the changes made by Melancthon in the octavo edition of 1531, we have the sure testimony to the contrary in the main defense of the Aug.

apfels, Cap. 21, p. 336: "In the first ten years from anno 1530 to almost 1540 no change occurred in rsulibu, and in the points so concerning the articles of faith." It was not until the year 1540 that a new Latin quarto edition was published by Georg Rau in Wittenberg, the so-called variatu, in which the doctrinal content of the Augsburg Confession was impaired in the 10th article, which therefore never received ecclesiastical validity, but has been regarded as a private writing of Melancthon, even by himself (See J. T. Müller 1. c. p. bXXI). The editions of the Augsburg Confession are so numerous that even J. T. Müller refrains from giving only a somewhat complete account of it, and refers to Bindseil in 6orp. Rsk, vol. XXVI. In the collections of Luther's writings it is printed, as Walch says, after the Wittenberg octavo edition of 1531, namely, in Latin in the Jena (1570), tom. IV, lob 191, with Melancthon's preface; German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, bl. 304b; in the Jena (1561), vol. VI, bl. 362; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 29, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 9. "Most alleraccuratesten man sie an trifft (sagt Walch) in der nothwendigen Vertheidigung des Augapfels, both Latin and German." Further, in Cölestins bi8t. oorn. ^uZ, toni. II, p. 151; in des Chyträus bi8t. oonb, p. 78 according to the Latin and p. 118 of the German edition; in Müller's Historie der evangelischen Stände Protestation, Book III, Cap. 19, p. 595; in Cyprian's Beilagen zur Hist. der Augsb. Conf., p. 3, and in Pfaff's writing, "Neue nach dem in der churmainzischen Reichskanzlei befindlichen Original errichtet Edition der Augsbürgischen Confession," 2c. Walch has taken as his basis the copy found in Müller's Historie, comparing Chyträus and Cyprian. We have retained Walch's text on the whole, but have consulted Förstemann and J. T. Müller. This writing has been translated into many languages, such as Greek, Hebrew, Spanish, Dutch, Slavonic, French and others. Of course it is found more or less correctly in the editions of the Concordia formula and in the various oorporu clootrinās, as, the kbüippioo, DburinAwo, Vomerurueo, krutsnwo, Inlio, XoribrsZioo 2c. See I. T. Müller 1. o. p. 6XXII ff.

Preface.

Most noble, most powerful, most invincible emperor, most gracious lord!

When your Imperial Majesty shortly afterwards graciously announced a general Imperial Diet here in Augsburg) with notice and earnest request of matters concerning our and the Christian name's hereditary enemy, the Turks, and how the same may be resisted with persevering help, also how for the sake of the divisions in the holy faith and in the Christian religion may be acted upon, to advise, and to take diligence, all of every one's discretion, opinion, and

To hear, see, and consider the opinions between ourselves in love and kindness, and to bring them to one Christian truth and to compare them, to do away with everything that would not be rightly interpreted or acted on either side, and to accept and keep one united and true religion through all of us, and as we are all under one Christ and contend, so also to live all in one fellowship, church, and unity. And we, the below-named Electors 1) and Princes, together with our relatives, like other Electors, Princes, and Estates, are required to do so, so we have exalted ourselves to such an extent that we come here with the first ones in particular glory.

And when also Your Imperial Majesty Majesty, to most humbly comply with your Imperial Majesty's Majesty, and in accordance with the same, touching on the faith in these matters, graciously requests of Princes, Princes and Estates in general, also with the utmost diligence and earnestly, that each one, by virtue of the aforementioned Your Imperial Majesty's Letter, may express his discretion, opinion and opinion of the same. Majesty's request, that each of them should put in writing and hand over his discretion, opinion and opinion of the same errors, discords and abuses half 2c. in German and Latin. Therefore, after due consideration and advice, Your Imperial Majesty was informed last midweek [June 22], as if we wanted to present ours in German and Latin on our part, by virtue of Your Imperial Majesty's presentation. Majesty's presentation, in German and Latin for today, Friday. Therefore, and to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, we present and hand over our pastors, preachers and their teachings, as well as our confession of faith, what and how they preach, teach, hold and teach in our countries, principalities, dominions, cities and territories on the basis of divine holy scripture. And are against Your Imperial Majesty Majesty, our most gracious Lord, we are obliged in all submissiveness, if the other princes, princes and estates will now also do such simplified written transmission of their opinion and opinion in Latin and German.

1) In the St. Louis edition of the Concordienbuch erroneously "Churfürsten", because it was only Ein Churfürst, the one of Saxony; also in Latin it is Lleotori. Even the German Wittenberg edition has this error.

2) that we will gladly converse with their loved ones and with them in convenient and even ways, and unite them as much as is always possible in accordance with equality, so that our mutual, as parties, written arguments and differences between ourselves may be dealt with in love and kindness, and these differences may be led to one true religion, as we all are and contend under one Christ, and should confess Christ, all according to the oft-repeated decree of Your Imperial Majesty, and according to divine truth. Majesty's decree, and according to divine truth. Therefore, we also call upon God the Almighty with the utmost humility and ask him to grant us his divine grace, amen.

Where, however, with our lords, friends, and special ones, 3) the princes, princes, and estates of the other part, the action is such, as Your Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, Majesty's letter: "among ourselves in love and kindness convenient action", 4) does not want to be provided nor be profitable, than nevertheless at us in none, which can be or may be serviceable with God and conscience to Christian unity, erwinder 5) is to be, as Your Imperial Majesty also reported our action to the Electors, Princes and Estates of the other part. Majesty also reported our friends, the princes, princes, estates and every lover of the Christian religion, to whom these things occur, will have to graciously, kindly and sufficiently hear from the following confessions of ours and ours.

After Your Imperial Majesty has graciously given to understand, and especially by a publicly read Instruction, 6) at the Imperial Diet held at Speier in the year of the lesser number 26, that Your Imperial Majesty is to conclude in matters concerning our Holy Faith, 7) for reasons which have been mentioned at that time, that the Holy Faith is to be respected. Majesty, in matters concerning our holy faith, to conclude, 7) for reasons which thereby arose, that we are not to be held accountable.

2) "Their beloved ones" are the princes; "to them" the non-princely estates. - We have thought it necessary to note this here, because even highly learned people have not had this distinction of rank in mind, as can be seen at the beginning of the next paragraph.

3) So, as I. T. Müller p. 790 notes, in all manuscripts and prints, but which he has changed to: "especially the" 2c.

but wanted to apply to the pope for a concilium and to stop it. And a year ago, at the last Imperial Diet at Speier, by virtue of a written Instruction) to the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, by His Majesty the Governor of the Empire, the Royal Dignities of Hungary and Bohemia 2c. Maj. Governor in the Empire, Royal Dignities of Hungary and Bohemia 2c., together with E. K. Majest. Orator and decreed Commissars, have, among other things, presented this and have indicated: "that Your Imperial Majesty has granted the same State of Hungary and Bohemia. Majesty has considered the same governors, administrators and councillors of the Imperial Regiment, as well as the embassies of the absent princes, princes and estates, which were assembled at the announced Imperial Diet at Regensburg, and has also found it fruitful to establish the General Council. And because these matters have come to a head between His Majesty the Emperor and the Pope, they have been discussed. Majesty and the Pope to good Christian sense, that His Imperial Majesty would be certain that the General Council would be a success. Majesty would be certain that the Pope would not refuse to hold the General Council, it would be His Majesty's gracious command to demand and act that the Pope be the first to proclaim such a General Council, in addition to His Majesty. Majesty for the first time and that there should be no lack of it". Thus, we hereby request Your Majesty to grant us this General Council. Majesty, we hereby, in all submissiveness, and in addition in the case in question, furthermore, ask for such a common, free, Christian council, to be held at all imperial congresses held by Your Imperial Majesty in the course of her reign in the Empire. Majesty held in the course of her reign in the Empire, by Princes, Princes and Estates, made up of high and brave movements, to which also, together with Your Imperial Majesty, we commit ourselves on account of these great events. Maj. we have, on account of this most important matter, invoked and appealed to in a legal manner and form, at various times; to which<sup>1)</sup> we hereby remain pending once again, and by this or subsequent action (unless these conflicting matters are finally heard in love and kindness, in accordance with Your Imperial Majesty's letter, considered).

1) In Document No. 816 in this volume, § 2 and § 3.

2) In the old editions: "things"; this is the singular. In Latin: ounsus.

3) "the"; to be added from the foregoing: "appeal" or "appeal". "The legal manner and form" of the appeal is found in Document No. 820 in this volume. In Latin, instead of "the" it is oui uxpellationi.

and compared to a Christian unity), of which we hereby publicly testify and protest. And 4) is the confession of ours and of ours, as follows from article to article.

Articles of Faith and Doctrine.

The I. Article. 5)

First of all, it is unanimously taught and held, according to the Concilii Niceni, that there is one divine Being, which is called, and truly is, God, and yet there are three Persons in the same one divine Being, equally powerful, equally eternal, God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit, all three One divine Being, eternal, without part, without end, of immeasurable power, wisdom, and goodness, one Creator and Sustainer of all things visible and invisible. And by the word ksrsona is understood, not a part, not a quality in another, but that itself exists, as the fathers used this word in this matter.

Therefore all heresies contrary to this article are rejected, as Manichaei, who have set up two gods, one evil and one good. Item, Valentiniani, Ariani, Eunomiani, Mahometists, and all such like, also Samosateni, old and new, who place only one person, and make sophistry of these two, Word and Holy Spirit, and say that they must not be distinct persons, but that Word means bodily word or voice, and that the Holy Spirit is a created impulse in creatures.

The II Article.

Further, we are taught that after Adam's fall all men who are born naturally are conceived and born in sins.

4) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. With I. T. Müller: "seind".

5) In Walch's Hist. der evangelischen Stände Protestation, Ub. 3, eup. 19, p. 595, all articles lack the superscriptions found in the Concordienbuche, as: "Von GOTT", "Von der Erbsünde" 2c. Likewise in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 381 ff, in the copy brought home from Augsburg by Margrave George of Brandenburg, and in all old editions of Luther's works.

That is, that they are all full of evil lusts and inclinations from their mother's womb, and can have no true fear of God, no true faith in God by nature; that also this inherent pestilence and original sin is truly sin, and condemns all those under God's eternal wrath who are not born again through baptism and the Holy Spirit.

Besides these, the Pelagians are rejected, and others, who hold not original sin to be sin, that they may make nature godly by natural powers, to the dishonour of the passion and merit of Christ.

The III Article.

It is taught that God the Son became man, born of the pure virgin Mary, and that the two natures, divine and human, are thus inseparably united in one person. One Christ, who is true God and man, truly born, suffered, crucified, died, and was buried, so that he might be a sacrifice not only for original sin, but also for all other sin, and atone for God's wrath.

Item, that the same Christ descended into hell, was truly raised from the dead on the third day, ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God, that he should reign and rule over all creatures forever, that he should sanctify, cleanse, strengthen, and comfort all them that believe in him by the Holy Ghost, and should also give them life, and all manner of gifts and riches, and should protect and shield them against the devil, and against sin.

Item, that the same HErr Christ shall at last come publicly to judge the living and the dead 2c., according to the L^mdoli ^postolorum.

The IV. Article.

Further, it is taught that we may not obtain forgiveness of sins and righteousness before God by our merit, works, and sufficiency, but that we receive forgiveness of sins and are justified before God by grace, for Christ's sake, through faith, if we believe that Christ suffered for us, and that for His sake sin is forgiven us, righteousness and eternal life.

is given. For God will count this faith as righteousness before Him, as St. Paul says to the Romans, 3, v. 28, and Cap. 4,5.

The V. Article.

To obtain such faith, God has instituted the ministry of preaching, and given the gospel and sacrament, through which He gives, as a means, the Holy Spirit, who works faith wherever and whenever He wills in those who hear the gospel, teaching that it is through Christ's merit, not our own, that we have a gracious God, if we believe this.

And are condemned the Anabaptists and others who teach that without the bodily word of the gospel we obtain the Holy Spirit by our own preparation, thoughts, and works.

The VI Article.

It is also taught that such faith should bring forth good fruits and good works, and that one must do good works, all things that God has commanded, for the sake of God, but not to trust in such works to merit grace before God; for we receive forgiveness of sin and righteousness through faith in Christ, as Christ Himself says, Luc. 17:10: "If ye have done these things, ye shall say, we are unfit servants." Thus also the fathers teach; for Ambrose saith, Thus it is decreed with God, that whosoever believeth in Christ should be blessed, and not by works, but by faith alone, without merit, have forgiveness of sins.

Article VII.

It is also taught that there must always be and remain a holy Christian church, which is the assembly of all believers, where the gospel is preached purely and the holy sacraments are administered according to the gospel.

For this is enough for the true unity of the Christian church, that the gospel is preached with one accord, according to a pure understanding, and the sacraments are administered according to the divine word. And is it not necessary for the true unity of the Christian church that ceremonies of the same kind, instituted of men, are held everywhere; as Paul saith Eph. 4:4. 5. "One body, one Spirit, even as ye are called unto one hope of your profession, One Lord, One faith, One baptism."

The VIII. Article.

Item, although the Christian church is really nothing else than the assembly of all believers and saints; however, because in this life there are many false Christians and hypocrites/ even public sinners among the pious remain, the sacraments are nevertheless powerful, although the priests, through whom they are administered, are not pious; as Christ Himself indicates Matth. 23, 3.: "On the chair of Moses sit the Pharisees" 2c.

Therefore the Donatists and all others are condemned to hold so differently.

The IX Article.

It is taught of baptism that it is necessary, and that by it grace is offered, that one should also baptize the children who through such baptism are delivered to God and become pleasing.

For this reason the Anabaptists are rejected, who teach that infant baptism is not right.

The X. Article.

The Lord's Supper is taught that the true body and blood of Christ are truly present in the form of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, where they are distributed and taken. For this reason the contrary doctrine is also rejected.

The XI article.

Thus it is taught of confession that one should receive private absolution in church, and not fall, though in confession it is not necessary to tell all iniquities and sins, since such is not possible. Ps. 19:13: Who knoweth iniquity?

1) This "are" (sein) is missing in the Ansbach and Munich manuscripts, also in the Wittenberg and Jena editions; likewise in Latin.

The XII. Article.

Of repentance it is taught that those who have sinned after baptism may at all times, when they come to repentance, obtain forgiveness of sins, and that they shall not be denied absolution by the church. And true right repentance is actually. To have remorse and sorrow or terror over sin, and yet besides this to believe in the gospel and absolution, that sin is forgiven and grace obtained through Christ, which faith again comforts and satisfies the heart.

After this also repentance is to follow, and that one should cease from sins; for these are to be the fruits of repentance, as John saith Matt. 3:8, "Work righteous fruits of repentance."

Here are they rejected that teach, that they which once were godly should not fall again.

After this 2) the Novatiani are also condemned, who refused absolution to those who had sinned after baptism.

They also are rejected which teach not that sins are forgiven by faith, but by our redemption.

The XIII article.

Of the use of the sacraments it is taught that the sacraments are not instituted merely to be signs by which Christians may be outwardly known, but that they are signs and testimonies of divine will toward us, to awaken and strengthen our faith thereby; for which reason they also require faith, and are then rightly used, if one receives them3) in faith, and strengthens the faith thereby.

The XIV article.

It is taught by the church government that no one shall teach or preach publicly in the church, or minister the sacrament, without a proper profession.

2) In the Ansbach, Munich and Hesse manuscripts: "Es"; "Darnach" in Walch; "Dagegen" in I. T. Müller, in the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

3) In the Ansbach, Munich and Hesse manuscripts: "mans" - man

The XV article.

Of church ordinances made by men, those are taught which may be kept without sin, and serve for peace, for good order in the church, as certain festivals, feasts, and the like. But instruction is given that consciences should not be troubled, as if such things were necessary to salvation. It is taught that all statutes and traditions, 1) made by men to propitiate God and merit grace, are contrary to the gospel and the doctrine of faith in Christ; therefore monastic vows, and other traditions, from difference of food, days, 2c., by which one supposes to merit grace, and to be sufficient for sin, are unfit and contrary to the gospel.

The XVI article.

It is taught of the police and secular government that all authority in the world, and orderly regiments and laws, are good orders created and instituted by God. And that Christians may be without sin in the office of sovereignty, prince, and judge, pronounce judgment and justice according to imperial and other customary laws, punish evildoers with the sword, wage lawful wars, fight, buy and sell, and take oaths. To have one's own, to be married 2c.

Here are condemned the Anabaptists, who teach that none of the things denounced are Christian.

Also those are condemned who teach that Christian perfection is to leave house and home, wife and child in the flesh, and to express oneself in the pieces touched before; for this alone is right perfection, right fear of God, and right faith in God. For the gospel teaches not an outward, temporal, but an inward, eternal nature and righteousness of the heart, and does not dispute about worldly government, police, and marital status, but desires that all these things be kept as the true order of God, 2) and in such states

1) "Tradition" is plural; Latin: traditiones. The plural endings are very often repelled by the ancients, as, in the next article "regiment" for: Regiments.

2s So in the Wittenberg and in the Jena edition, also in Latin. In I. T. Müller "Gottes" is missing. Christian love and right good works, each according to his profession. Therefore, Christians are obliged to be subject to authority and obedient to its commandments in everything that may be done without sin, for if the authority's commandment may not be done without sin, one should be more obedient to God than to men. 5, 29.

The XVII article.

It is also taught that our Lord Jesus Christ will come to judge on the last day, and raise up all the dead, and give eternal life and joy to the faithful and elect, but condemn ungodly men and devils to hell and eternal punishment.

For this reason the Anabaptists are rejected, who teach that devils and damned men will not have eternal torment and torture.

Item, here are rejected some Jewish doctrines, which also now appear, 3) that before the resurrection of the dead the holy and pious will have a worldly kingdom, and will destroy all the ungodly.

The XVIII. Article.

Of free will it is taught that man has a free will to some extent, to live outwardly respectable, and to choose among the things which reason apprehends; but without grace, help, and the operation of the Holy Spirit, man is not able to become pleasing to God, to fear or believe God heartily, or to cast out of the heart the inborn evil desire; but this is done by the Holy Spirit, which is given by the word of God, for Paul saith 1 Cor. 2:14: "The natural man heareth nothing of the Spirit of God."

And that it may be seen that no novelty is taught in this, these are the clear words of Augustine on free will, as now written, from the 3rd book of the Hypognosticon: "We confess that in all men there is a free will, for they have all natural, innate understanding and Reason, not that they are able to do anything with God, but to love God with all their heart, to fear God; but only in outward works of this life they have liberty to choose good or evil. Good 1) I mean that which nature is able to do, as to work in the field or not, to eat, to drink, to go to a friend or not, to put on or take off a garment, to build, to take a wife, to do a trade, and the like, something useful and good, all of which is not, nor does it exist, without God, but is all of him and through him. On the other hand, man can also do evil of his own choice, as kneeling down before an idol, to strike a death blow 2c.

Of the cause of sins we teach that, though God Almighty created and sustains all nature, yet the wrong will works sin in all the wicked and despisers of God; as then is the will of the devil, and of all the ungodly, who, when God hath removed his hand, immediately turneth it from God to evil, as Christ saith John 8:44, "The devil speaketh lies of his own."

Of faith and good works.

It is untruthfully charged against ours that they forbid good works, for their writings of the Ten Commandments and others prove that they have given good useful report and exhortation of right Christian morals and works, of which little was taught before this time, but mostly in all sermons on childish unnecessary works, as rosaries, saintly service, becoming monks, pilgrimages, appointed fasts, celebrations, brotherhoods, etc., are practiced. Our opponents no longer praise such unnecessary works as highly as they did in former times; in addition, they have now learned to speak of faith, of which they preached nothing at all in former times; nevertheless, they now teach that we are not justified before God by works alone, but that we put our faith in God.

1) In Latin: Bonis dico == I say of good.

Faith in Christ in addition, speak: Faith and works make us righteous before God; which speech may bring more comfort, 2) than if one teaches to trust in works alone.

Since the doctrine of faith, which is the chief thing in Christianity, has not been practiced for so long a time, as must be confessed, but only the doctrine of works has been preached in all places, such instruction has been given by ours:

First of all, our works do not reconcile us to God and earn us grace, but this happens through faith alone, when we believe that our sins are forgiven for Christ's sake, who alone is the mediator to reconcile the Father. He who thinks he can accomplish this by works and earn grace despises Christ and seeks his own way to God, contrary to the gospel.

This doctrine of faith is publicly and clearly treated in Paul in many places, especially in Ephesians 2:8: "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God, not of works, lest any man should boast. And that in this no new understanding is introduced, may be proved from Augustine, who treats this matter diligently, and also teaches thus, that we obtain grace by faith in Christ, and are justified before God, and not by works; as his whole book de spiritu et littera shows.

Although this doctrine is greatly despised by untried people, it is nevertheless very comforting and salutary to the troubled and frightened conscience. For the conscience cannot come to rest and peace by works, but only by faith, if it is certain that it has a gracious God for Christ's sake, as Paul also says in Romans 5:1: "If we have been justified by faith, we have rest and peace with God."

This consolation was not preached in the past, but the poor consciences were driven to works of their own, and many works were done; for some of them have been led by the spirit of the Lord.

2) Here the Ansbach manuscript has better: "mag". Latin: atksrre xotsst.

Some have devised other works to earn grace and to do enough for sin; many have experienced that one has not come to peace through them. Therefore it was necessary to preach this doctrine of faith in Christ and to practice it diligently, so that people would know that God's grace is obtained through faith alone, without merit.

It also happens that here one does not speak of such faith, which also the devils and the ungodly have, who also believe the stories that Christ suffered and rose from the dead, but one speaks of the true faith, which believes that we obtain grace and forgiveness of sins through Christ, and who now knows that he has a gracious God through Christ; therefore knows God, calls upon him, and is not without God, as the heathen are; for the devil and the ungodly do not believe this article, forgiveness of sins, therefore they are without God, cannot call upon him, cannot hope for anything good from him. And so, as is now indicated, Scripture speaks of faith, and does not call faith such knowledge as devils and ungodly men have, for so it is taught of faith, Heb. 11:1, that to believe is not merely to know history, but to have confidence in God, to receive his promise. And Augustine also reminds us that we are to understand the word "faith" 1) in Scripture to mean confidence in God that He is gracious to us, and not only to know such histories as the devils also know.

Furthermore, it is taught that good works should and must be done, not that one trusts to earn grace with them, but for the sake of God, and to praise God. Faith alone always obtains grace and forgiveness of sin; and because the Holy Spirit is given through faith, the heart is also sent to do good works. For before this, because it is without the Holy Ghost, it is too weak; for this it is in the power of the devil, who hath too much power over poor human nature.

1) Here, instead of the brackets used in the old pressures to emphasize something, we have put the (then uncommon) speech marks. sins; as we see in the Philo

The sopranos, who took upon themselves to live honestly and blamelessly, have not done so, but have fallen into much greater public sins. Thus it is with man, when he is without the Holy Spirit, apart from the right faith, and governs himself solely by his own human powers.

For this reason, the doctrine of faith is not to be criticized for forbidding good works, but rather to be praised for teaching to do good works and for offering help on how to do good works. For apart from faith, and apart from Christ, human nature and ability are far too weak to do good works, to call upon God, to have patience in suffering, to love one's neighbor, to carry out commanded duties diligently, to be obedient, to avoid evil lusts. Such high and right works cannot be done without the help of Christ, as he himself says Joh. 15:5: "Without me you can do nothing" 2c.

The XXI article.

Of the service of the saints, ours teaches that the saints are to be remembered, so that we may strengthen our faith when we see how they were graced, and also how they were helped by faith, and that examples are to be taken of their good works, each according to his profession, just as the imperial majesty may blessedly and divinely follow the example of David in waging war against the Turks; for both are in the royal office, which requires the protection of their subjects. Maj. may blessedly and divinely follow the example of David in waging war against the Turk; for both are in the royal office, which demands protection and protection of their subjects. But it cannot be proved by Scripture that one should call upon the saints or seek help from them, for "there is only one reconciler and mediator set between God and men, Jesus Christ," 1 Timothy 2:5, who is the only Savior, the only supreme priest, the seat of grace and intercessor before God, Romans 8:34, and who alone has promised that he will hear our prayer. This is also the highest service of God according to the Scriptures, that we should seek and call upon the same Jesus Christ in all our needs and concerns with all our hearts, 1 John 2:1: "If any man sin, we have an advocate with God, who is righteous, Jesus."

This is almost the sum of the doctrine that is preached and taught in our churches for the proper Christian instruction and consolation of consciences, and also for the correction of the faithful; for how would we like to put our own souls and consciences in the highest and greatest danger before God by misusing the divine name or word, or to pass on to our children and descendants a doctrine other than that according to the pure divine word and Christian truth? If this doctrine is clearly founded in holy Scripture, and is not contrary to the common Christian, or even the Roman Church, as much as can be gathered from the Fathers' Scriptures, we also take care that our adversaries do not disagree with us in the above-mentioned articles. For this reason, those who, for this reason, separate, reject, and shun ours as heretics, act quite unkindly, quickly, and against all Christian unity and love, and do so themselves, without any consistent ground of divine commandment or Scripture. For error and strife are chiefly over certain traditions and abuses. If, then, there is no defect or deficiency in the main articles, and if this confession of ours is divine and Christian, the bishops, if there were a deficiency in our tradition, should be more lenient, even though we hope to show a consistent reason and cause why some traditions and abuses have been changed in our country.

Articles of which there is discord, being told the abuses so changed.

Since the articles of faith are not taught in our churches contrary to the Holy Scriptures or the common Christian church, but only certain abuses have been changed, some of which have been torn down over time and some of which have been forcibly erected, it is necessary for us to explain them and to explain why changes have been tolerated, so that the Emperor may recognize that we have not acted in an un-Christian or unjust manner, but that we are compelled by God's commandment, which is more important than all custom, to do so. Majesty may recognize that we have not acted in an unchristian or unjust manner, but that we are compelled by God's commandment, which is to be respected more highly than all custom, to permit such changes.

The XXII Article.

Of both forms of the sacrament.

Both forms of the sacrament are given to the laity for this reason, that this is a clear command of Christ, Matth. 26, 27: "Drink from it, all of you. There Christ gives clear words about the cup, that they should all drink from it.

And so that no one could dispute and gloss over these words as if it belonged to the priests alone, Paul indicates in I Cor. 11:25 ff. that the whole assembly of the Corinthian church used both forms, and this custom remained in the church for a long time, as can be proved by the histories and the writings of the fathers. Cyprian commemorates in many places that the chalice was the time given to the laity. St. Jerome says that the priests who administer the sacrament distribute the blood of Christ to the people. Thus Gelasius the pope himself gives that the sacrament should not be divided. Oistivot. 2. äo Conseorat. o. Ooniporimus. Nor is there any canon anywhere which commands that only one form be taken. Nor can anyone know when or by whom this custom of taking a form was instituted, though Cardinal Cusanus remembers when this manner was approved. Now it is public that such a custom, introduced against God's commandment, also against the old canons, is wrong. For this reason, it is not proper to burden and compel those consciences who have desired to use the holy sacrament after Christ's institution to act contrary to our Lord Christ's order. And because the distribution of the sacrament is contrary to the institution of Christ, the usual procession with the sacrament is also omitted in our country.

Of the married state of priests.

There has been a great and mighty lamentation in the world, among all men, of high and low estate, of great fornication and wildness, and of the life of priests, who have not been able to keep chastity, nor ever come to the utmost with such abominable vices. So much ugly, great vexation, matrimonial

In order to avoid fornication and other immorality, some of our priests have entered into the marital state. These priests show by these causes that they are urged and moved to it out of great need of their consciences, since the Scriptures clearly state that the marital state is instituted by God the Lord to avoid fornication, as Paul says in 1 Cor. 7:2: "To avoid fornication let every man have his own wife"; item [v. 9]: "It is better to marry than to burn." And after Christ says Matth. 19, 11: "They do not all grasp the word," Christ indicates (who well knew what was in man) that few people have the gift of living chastely, for, "God created man male and female," Gen. 1, 27. Whether it be in human power or ability, without the special gift and grace of God, to make or change creatures better, by one's own undertaking or vow to God, the high Majesty, experience has made it all too clear; for what good, what honorable, chaste life, what Christian, honest, or upright conduct results in many from it, how horrible, terrible trouble and anguish of their consciences many have had at their last end because of it, is in the day, and many have known it themselves. Since God's word and commandment cannot be changed by any human vow or law, priests and other clergy have taken wives for this and other causes and reasons.

So also it is to be proved from the histories and the writings of the fathers, that in the Christian church of old it was the custom that the priests and deacons had wives; wherefore Paul saith 1 Tim. 3:2, "Let a bishop be blameless. A wife's husband." In Germany, too, it is only four hundred years ago that the priests were forced by force to take the vow of chastity from the married state, and they all opposed it so earnestly and harshly that an archbishop of Mainz, who promulgated the new papal edict on the subject, was very near to an outrage by the whole church, was very nearly killed in an outrage of the whole priesthood in a crowd, and the same prohibition was soon in the beginning made so swiftly and unseemly that the pope at that time not only forbade the future marriage of the priests, but also the

This is not only contrary to all divine, natural, and secular rights, but also to the Canonidus (which the popes themselves have made) and to the most famous Concilii.

Also, many high, godly, prudent people have often heard such talk and misgivings, that such a strict celibacy and deprivation of the married state (which God Himself instituted and left free) has never done any good, but has introduced many great evil vices and much evil. One of the popes, Pius II, himself, as his history shows, has often spoken these words and had them written by himself: there may well be some reasons why marriage is forbidden to the clergy, but there are much higher, greater, and more important reasons why they should be allowed to marry freely again. There is no doubt that Pope Pius, as a wise man of understanding, spoke this word out of great concern.

For this reason, we wish to express our subservience to Imperial Majesty. Majesty that Her Majesty, as a Christian, noble Emperor, will graciously take to heart that now and in the last times and days, of which the Scriptures report, the world is getting worse and people are getting frailer and weaker.

For this reason, it is highly necessary, useful, and Christian to do this diligent institution, so that, where the marriage state is forbidden, worse and more shameful immorality and vice may not break out in German lands. For no one will ever be able to change or do these things more wisely or better than God Himself, who instituted the marriage state to help human infirmity and to ward off immorality. Thus the old Canons also say that one must at times ease and ease the severity and rigorem for the sake of human weakness, and to prevent and avoid trouble. Now in this case this would also be Christian and highly necessary. What harm can the priests' and clergymen's marriages do to the common Christian church, especially to the pastors and others who are to serve the church? In the future there would be a lack of priests and pastors if this harsh prohibition of marriage were to last longer.

Now this, that the priests and ministers may be married, is founded on the divine word and commandment, and the histories prove that the priests were married; so also the vow of chastity has caused so much ugly, unchristian trouble, so much adultery, terrible unheard fornication and abominable vices, that also some among canons, also 1) Curtisans at Rome, have often themselves confessed and miserably attracted such, as 2) such vices, in the clero too abominable and overpowering, would arouse God's wrath.

So it is pathetic that Christian marriages are not only forbidden, but that in some places they have been punished as quickly as possible, as if for a great misdemeanor. Thus the marriage state is also forbidden in imperial law and in all monarchies. In all monarchies where it has ever been law and right, marriage is highly praised. But at this time, innocent couples are beginning to be tortured for the sake of marriage alone, and priests who should be spared before others; and this is done not only against divine rights, but also against the canons. Paul, the apostle, 1 Tim. 4, 1. 3. calls the doctrine, which forbids marriage, the doctrine of the devil. Christ himself says, John 8:44, that the devil is a murderer from the beginning, which is consistent with the fact that it must be the devil's doctrine that forbids marriage, and that he must be able to maintain such doctrine by shedding blood.

But as no human law can do away with or change God's commandment, so also no vow can change God's commandment; wherefore also St. Cyprian gives counsel that women who do not keep the vowed chastity should become married, and says Exist. II. 3) Thus, if they will not or cannot keep chastity, it is better that they become married than that they fall into the fire through their lust, and they should take care that they do not cause trouble to their brothers and sisters.

In addition, all canons require greater obedience and equity toward those who have taken vows in youth, as priests and monks have more often come to such a state in youth out of ignorance.

The XXIV Article. from the fair.

It is unjustly laid to our charge that they should have abstained from Mass; for it is public that Mass, without glory, is kept with greater devotion and earnestness among us than among the adversaries. Thus also the people are often taught with the greatest diligence about the holy sacrament, what it is used for, and how it is to be used, namely, to comfort the frightened consciences with it, so that the people are drawn to communion and mass. At the same time, instruction is given against other unjust teachings about the sacrament. In the public ceremonies of the Mass, too, there has been no noticeable change, except that in some places German chants (to teach and train the people) are sung alongside Latin chants, since all ceremonies are primarily intended to help the people learn what they need to know about Christ.

But after the mass had been abused in many ways before that time, as in the day when a fair was made of it, when it was bought and sold, and when more of it was kept in all churches for the sake of money, such abuse had been punished many times, even before that time, by learned and pious men. When the preachers preached about this in our churches, and the priests were reminded of the terrible condemnation, which should move every Christian, that whoever uses the sacrament unworthily is guilty of the body and blood of Christ, then such masses for sale and corner masses (which until then had been held out of compulsion for money and for the sake of the prebends) fell in our churches.

The abominable error was also punished, in that it was taught that our Lord Christ, by his death alone, had done enough for original sin, and that he had made the mass a sacrifice for other sins, and thus made the mass a sacrifice for the living and the dead, thereby taking away sin and propitiating God. From this it further followed that it was disputed whether a mass held to be much deserved so much, as if one held a special one for each one. Hence came the great innumerable number of masses, that by this work one wanted to obtain from God all that one needed, and besides this, faith in Christ and right worship were forgotten.

Therefore instruction has been given, as no doubt necessity demanded, that it might be known how the sacrament should be rightly used. First of all, that there is no sacrifice for original sin and other sins, except the death of Christ, is shown in many places in Scripture, for it is written in Hebrews (Cap. 10:12) that Christ sacrificed himself once, and thereby made atonement for all sin. It is an outrageous novelty to teach in the church that Christ's death should have been sufficient for original sin alone, and not for other sins as well, hoping therefore that men will understand that such error is not unreasonably punished.

On the other hand, St. Paul teaches that we obtain grace before God through faith and not through works. Against this is publicly this abuse of the Mass, when one thinks to obtain grace by this work; as it is known that one uses the Mass to put away sin by it, and to obtain grace and all goods from God, not only the priest for himself, but also for the whole world, and for others: Living and dead.

Thirdly, the holy sacrament is not instituted to make a sacrifice for sin (for the sacrifice was made beforehand), but that our faith may be awakened thereby, and consciences comforted, which are reminded by the sacrament that grace and forgiveness of sin are promised them by Christ. Therefore this sacrament requires faith, and without faith it is used in vain.

Since the Mass is not a sacrifice for others, living or dead, Since Mass is not a sacrifice for others, living or dead, to take away their sins, but is to be a communion in which the priest and others receive the sacrament for themselves, we keep it this way, that on feast days (and also otherwise, if there are communicants) Mass is celebrated, and some who desire it are communicated. Thus the Mass remains with us in its proper custom, as it was held in the church of old, as may be proved from St. Paul 1 Cor. 11, and also from many of the fathers' writings. For Chrysostom The old canons also indicate that one of them held the office and communicated to the other priests and deacons. The old canons also indicate that one of them held the office and communicated with the other priests and deacons, for the words in the Canona Niceno read: "The deacons are to receive the sacrament from the bishop or priest after the priests.

Now, if no innovation has been made in this, which did not exist in the church of old, and no noticeable change has occurred in the public ceremonies of the mass, except that the other, unnecessary masses, perhaps held by abuse, have fallen next to the parish mass, this way of holding masses should not be condemned as heretical and unchristian; For in former times, even in large churches, where there were many people, Mass was not said daily, even on days when the people were gathered together, as 2ripartita üistoriL lib. 9. shows that in Alexandria the Scriptures were read and interpreted on Wednesday and Friday, and otherwise all services were held without the mass.

The XXV article.

From confession.

Confession is not dispensed with by the preachers of this part, for it is our custom not to administer the sacrament to those who have not first been interrogated and absolved. The people are diligently taught how comforting the word of absolution is, how highly and precious absolution is to be esteemed; for it is not the voice or word of the present man, but the word of God, who forgives sin, for it is spoken in God's stead and by God's command. Of this command and power of the keys, how comforting, how necessary it is to the frightened conscience, is taught with great diligence; in addition, how God demands that we believe this absolution, no less than so that God's voice from heaven may shout, and cheerfully comfort us, and know that through such faith we obtain forgiveness of sins. Of these necessary things the preachers of old, who spoke of confession

1) So the Hessian manuscript. Ansbacher: "of absolution".

The people who have been taught much have not stirred up a single word, but have only tormented their consciences with a long recital of sins, with pardon, with indulgences, with pilgrimages, and the like. And many of our opponents themselves confess that this part of right Christian repentance is more appropriately written and practiced than it has been in a long time.

And it is thus taught in confession, that no one is to be urged to tell the sin by name, for this is impossible, as the Psalm says (Ps. 19:13), "Who knoweth iniquity?" and Jeremiah says (Jer. 17:9), "The heart of man is so bad that it cannot be learned.", "The heart of man is so wicked that it cannot be unlearned." Wretched human nature is so deep in sin that it cannot see or know them all, and if we were to be absolved only by those we can count, we would be little helped. For this reason it is not necessary to urge people to tell the sin by name. So also the fathers have held, as one finds vistinst. I. äs posuit. where the words of Chrysostom are invoked: I say not that thou shalt offer thyself publicly, nor accuse thyself or plead guilty with another, but obey the prophet, which saith, Reveal thy ways unto the Lord." (Ps. 37:5.) Wherefore confess unto the Lord GOD, the true Judge, beside thy prayer; not tell thy sin with thy tongue, but in thy conscience. Here it is clearly seen that Chrysostom does not compel to tell sin by name. So also teaches the Cllossa in Ossrstis äs posnitsnt. Distinst. 5th, sap. Consiäsrst, that confession is not commanded by Scripture, but is instituted by the Church; yet it is diligently taught by the preachers of this part, that confession is to be received on account of absolution, which is the principal and most distinguished thing in it, for the consolation of frightened consciences, and for the sake of several other causes.

The XXVI Article.

Of the difference of food.

Thus it was taught, preached, and written of old, that the difference of meat, and such like traditions, instituted of men, serve to merit grace, and to be sufficient for sin.

For this reason, new fasts, new ceremonies, new orders, and the like, have been devised every day, and have been pushed fiercely and hard, as if such things were necessary divine services, by which one would earn grace if one kept them, and great sin would occur if one did not keep them; from this much harmful error has taken place in the church.

First of all, the grace of Christ and the doctrine of faith, which the gospel holds out to us with great earnestness, is obscured by this, and it drives home the point that the merit of Christ is to be esteemed high and dear, and that believing in Christ is to be placed high and far above all works. For this reason St. Paul fought fiercely against the Law of Moses and human traditions, that we should learn that we do not become godly before God by our works, but only through faith in Christ, that we obtain grace for Christ's sake. Such teaching is almost completely extinct; because it is taught that grace is earned by laws, fasting, distinction of food, clothing, and so forth.

On the other hand, such traditions have also obscured God's commandment, for one places these traditions far above God's commandment. This alone was considered Christian life, who kept the celebration thus, thus prayed, thus fasted, thus dressed; this was called spiritual, Christian life?)

Besides these, other necessary good works were regarded as worldly and unspiritual, namely, those which every man is obliged to do according to his profession, such as that the father of the house should work to feed his wife and children and bring them up in the fear of God, the mother of the house should bear children and wait on them, and a prince and ruler should govern land and people. 2c. Such works, commanded by God, had to be a worldly and imperfect being, but the Traditions had to have the splendid name that they alone were called holy, perfect works. Therefore, there was no measure nor end to making such traditions.

Thirdly, such traditions have become a great burden to the consciences; for it was not possible to keep all the traditions, and yet the people were of opinion as if such were a necessary service, and Gerson writes that many have fallen into despair, some have even killed themselves, because they have heard no comfort from the grace of Christ. For one sees how the consciences are confused in the case of the summists and theologians, who have taken upon themselves to draw together the Traditions, and sought that they might help the consciences, have had so much to do with it that, because all wholesome Christian doctrine of necessary things, as of faith, of consolation in high temptations, and the like, has lain low. Many pious people complained about this before this time, that such traditions cause much strife in the church, and that pious people are prevented from coming to the right knowledge of Christ. Gerson and others complained vehemently about this. Yes, Augustine also disliked that consciences were burdened with so many traditions. For this reason he gives instruction that they should not be considered necessary things.

Therefore ours have not taught of these things out of sacrilege or contempt of spiritual authority, but great necessity demanded that they should be taught of the above-mentioned errors, which grew out of a misunderstanding of the traditions. For the gospel compels that the doctrine of faith should and must be practiced in churches, which cannot be understood if one supposes to merit grace by one's own chosen works; and it is therefore taught that one cannot merit grace, or make atonement for God, or make atonement for sin, by keeping this human tradition, and for this reason no necessary service should be made of it. Cause for this is drawn from Scripture. Christ, Matt. 15:9, excuses the apostles for not keeping the usual traditions, saying, "They honor me in vain with the commandments of men." Now if he calls this a vain service, it must not be needful. And soon after [v. 17.], "That which entereth into the mouth defileth not a man." Item, Paul saith Rom. 14:17: "The kingdom of heaven is not in food.

1) Ansbach manuscript: "in the church". In Latin: IN 666168N8.
or drink"; Col. 2:16.: "Let no man judge you in meat, or drink, or sabbath" 2c. Apost. 15:10, 11. Peter saith, "Why tempt ye God with putting a yoke upon the necks of disciples, which neither our fathers nor we have had to bear? but we believe to be saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." Then Peter verbeut, that consciences should not be weighed down with more outward ceremonies, whether Mosis or others; and 1 Tim. 4, 1. 3. such prohibitions, as, forbid food. Forbidding marriage 2c., are called "doctrines of devils." For this is contrary to the gospel, to perform such works as to merit forgiveness of sins, or as if no man should be a Christian without such services.

But that they blame ours here, as forbidding mortification and discipline, as Jovinianus did, is much different from their writings. For they have always taught from the holy cross that Christians are guilty of suffering; and this is true, earnest, and not fictitious mortification. Besides this it is also taught that every man is bound to keep himself in bodily exercise, as fasting and other exercises, so that he may not give cause to sin, not that he may merit grace by such works. This bodily exercise is not to be practiced only for certain days, but continually; of which Christ speaks (Luc. 21:34.), "Take heed that your hearts be not weighed down with filletiness"; item (Matt. 17:21.), "The devils are not cast out, but by fasting and prayer"; and Paul speaks (1 Cor. 9:27.), "He chasteneth his heart, and his soul, and he is not cast out, but by fasting and prayer".), "He mortifieth his body, and bringeth it to obedience:" so that he signifieth that mortification is to serve, not to merit grace thereby, but to keep the body skillfully, that it hinder not what every man is commanded to accomplish according to his profession; and therefore fasting is not rejected, but that a necessary service is made of it upon certain days and meals, to the confusion of consciences.

Also in this part many ceremonies and traditions are kept, as order of the mass and others, 2) chants, festivals 2c., which serve that order be kept in the church. In addition, the people are taught that such outward worship does not make one pious in the sight of God, and that one should keep it without burdening one's conscience; so that if one fails to do it without offense, one does not sin in it. This liberty in outward ceremonies was also observed by the ancient fathers, for in the Orient the feast of Easter was kept at a different time from that at Rome. And since some would consider this inequality to be a separation in the church, they are admonished by others that it is not necessary to keep equality in such customs, and Irenaeus says thus: inequality in fasting does not separate unity of faith; as also Distinct. 12. is written of such inequality in human ordinances, that it is not contrary to the unity of Christianity; and Tripartit. Historia lib. 9. shows together many unequal church customs, and fetches a useful Christian saying: The apostle's opinion was not to institute holidays, but to teach faith and love.

The XXVII Article.

Of monastic vows.

To speak of monastic vows, it is necessary, first of all, to consider how they have been kept until now, what their nature has been in monasteries, and that very much has been done in them daily, not only contrary to God's word, but also contrary to papal rights: for in St. Augustine's time monastic buildings were free; subsequently, since the right discipline and doctrine were broken up, monastic vows were devised, and with them, just as with a devised prison, one wanted to re-establish discipline.

Above this, besides the monastic vows, one has brought up many other pieces more, and with such bonds and grievances of theirs much, even before due years, burdened.

Many people, too, have come to this monastic life out of ignorance; some of them, although they were not too young, did not sufficiently understand and appreciate their fortune. All of them, thus entangled and involved, are forced and compelled to remain in such bonds, notwithstanding that even papal law gives them much freedom. And This was more burdensome in convents of virgins than in convents of monks, when it would have been proper to spare females as the weak. The same severity and harshness displeased many pious people in ancient times, for they saw that both boys and maidens were hidden in the monasteries for the sake of the preservation of the body. They have also seen how badly this practice has turned out, what trouble it has caused, what a burden on the conscience it has brought, and many people have complained that in such a dangerous matter the canons were not respected at all. Moreover, there is such an opinion of the monastic vows, which is hidden, and which has also displeased many monks who had little understanding.

For they pretended that monastic vows were equal to baptism, and that with monastic life one earned forgiveness of sin and justification before God; yes, they added still more that with monastic life one earned not only righteousness and piety, but also that with it one kept the commandments and counsels written in the Gospel, and thus the monastic vows were more highly prized than baptism. Item, that one earned more with the monastic life than with all the other professions ordered by God, such as the priesthood, the preaching profession, the magistracy, the princes, the lords, and the like, all of whom serve according to God's commandment, word, and commandment, in their profession without fictitious clergy, as none of these things can be denied, for they are found in their own books. As for those who were caught and put into a monastery, they learned little from Christ.

For instance, schools of the Scriptures and of other arts conducive to the Christian church were held in the monasteries, and priests and bishops were taken from the monasteries; but now it has taken a much different form. For in former times they were of the opinion that in the monastic life one learned the Scriptures; now they pretend that the monastic life is such an essence that one earns God's grace and piety before God with it, yes, it is a state of perfection, and they put it far ahead of the other states that are instituted by God. All this is therefore put on without any disparagement, so that one may be all the more that they may hear and understand what and how ours preach and teach.

First of all, they teach us of those who take up marriage, that all those who are not qualified to be single have power, authority, and right to marry. They have the power, the authority and the right to marry, for vows cannot annul God's order and commandment. Now God's commandment is this, 1 Cor. 7:2: "For the sake of fornication let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband." To this end not only God's commandment, but also God's creature and order, urges, compels, and drives all those to the marriage state who, without the work of God, are not graced with the gift of virginity, according to this saying of God Himself, Genesis 2:18: "It is not good that man should be alone; we will make him a helper to be around him."

What can one do against this? Let the vow and duty be exalted as much as one wishes, let them be exalted as much as one can, yet one cannot force God's commandment to be rescinded by them. The doctors say that vows, even against the right of the pope, are not binding, so how much less should they bind? To have power and authority, contrary to God's commandment!

If the obligation 1) of the vows had no other cause that they should be taken up, the popes would not have dispensed or permitted it; for it behooves no man to break the obligation that grows out of divine rights. Therefore the popes have well considered that in this duty an equivalence should be used, and have often dispensed with it, as with a king of Arragon, and many others. Now, if one has dispensed for the preservation of temporal things, it should be dispensed much more cheaply for the need of souls.

Next, why does the opposite party press so hard that one must keep the vows, and does not first see whether the vow is of its kind? for the vow should be in possible matters, willing and unconstrained. But how perpetual chastity is in man's power and capacity is well known;

1) "Duty" = obligation, odliZatio. Here "duty" is to be taken as plural, equal to: duties.

There are also few, both male and female, who have willingly and thoughtfully taken monastic vows. Before they come to their senses, they are persuaded to take monastic vows, and sometimes they are forced and compelled to do so. For this reason it is not right that one should dispute the obligation of the vow so quickly and harshly, since they all confess that such a thing is contrary to the nature and manner of the vow, that it is not vowed willingly and with good counsel and deliberation.

Some canons and papal laws tear up vows made under fifteen years of age, for they consider that before that time one does not have so much understanding as to be able to decide the order of the whole life as to how it is to be conducted.

Another canon admits even more years to human weakness, for he forbids to take the monastic vows under the age of eighteen. From this most of them have excuse and cause to leave the monasteries, for they more often came to monasteries in childhood before these years. Finally, even if the breaking of the monastic vow were to be censured, yet it could not follow from it that the same marriage should be broken, for St. Augustine says, 27. sq. l. cap. Nuptiarum, that one ought not to rend such marriage. Now St. Augustine is not held in low esteem in the Christian church, though some afterwards held otherwise.

Although God's commandment concerning the state of marriage has made many of them free and exempt from monastic vows, ours have even more reasons for believing that monastic vows are null and void. For all divine service, instituted and chosen by men without God's command and commandment, to obtain righteousness and God's grace, is against God, and contrary to the Gospel and God's command, as Christ Himself says, Matt. 15:9: "They serve me in vain with the commandments of men." So also St. Paul teaches everywhere that one should not seek righteousness from our commandments and services, which are invented by men, but that righteousness and godliness before God comes from faith and trust, that we believe that God has saved us for the sake of His only Son Christ.

grace. - Now it has come to pass that the monks have taught and preached that the imaginary clergy should be sufficient for sin, and should obtain God's grace and righteousness. Now what is this but to diminish the glory and praise of the grace of Christ, and to deny the righteousness of faith? Therefore it follows that such common vows were unrighteous, false services. For this reason they are also covenantless; for an ungodly vow made contrary to God's commandment is covenantless and void, just as the canons teach that an oath should not be a bond for sin.

St. Paul says to Galatians 5:4: "Ye are departed from Christ, who would be justified by the law, and have fallen short of grace." Wherefore also they that would be justified by vows are departed from Christ, and fall short of the grace of God; for they rob Christ of his glory, who alone justifies, and give such glory to their vows and monastic life.

Nor can it be denied that the monks have taught and preached that they become righteous and deserve forgiveness of sins by their vows and monastic ways; indeed, they have invented even more clumsy things and said that they share their good works with others. Now, if any one were to do all this unkindly, how many pieces could he gather together, of which the monks themselves are now ashamed? The monks are ashamed of themselves now and do not want to have done it. Above all this, they have persuaded the people that the fictitious spiritual orders are Christian perfection. This is the praise of works, that by them one may become righteous. Now it is no small annoyance in the Christian church that such a worship service is presented to the people, which men, without God's command, have invented, and teach that such a worship service makes men pious and righteous before God. For the righteousness of the faith, which should be practiced most in the church, is obscured when people's eyes are shut with this strange angelic spirituality and false pretenses of poverty, humility, and chastity.

Above this, the commandments of God and the right and true worship of God are also made by it. when people hear that only the monks are supposed to be in a state of perfection. For Christian perfection is that one fears God from the heart and with earnestness, and yet also has a heartfelt confidence and faith, also trust, that we have a gracious, merciful God for Christ's sake; that we may and should ask and desire of God what is necessary for us, and certainly await help from Him in all tribulations, according to each one's profession and station; that we should also, however, outwardly do good works with diligence, and await our profession. Therein is the right perfection, and the right service of God; not in begging, or in a black or gray cap 2c. But the common people form much harmful opinion from false praise of the monastic life. When they hear that the single state is praised without measure, it follows that they are in the married state with a heavy conscience. For when the common man hears that the beggars alone are perfect, he cannot know that he may have goods and live without sin. If the people hear that it is only a counsel not to take vengeance, it follows that some think it is not sinful to take vengeance outside the office. Some think that vengeance is not at all fitting for Christians, nor for the authorities. There are also many examples that some have left their wives and children, as well as their government, and have taken refuge in monasteries. This, they said, means 1) to flee from the world and to seek such a life that pleases God more than the lives of others. They also could not know that one should serve God in the commandments which he has given, and not in the commandments which men have invented. Now this is a good and perfect state of life, which has God's commandment for itself; but this is a dangerous state of life, which does not have God's commandment for itself.

Of such things it has been necessary to give good report to the people. Gerson also punished the error of the monks about perfection in the past, and shows 2)

1) "heißet" set by us according to the Ansbach handwriting instead of: "heißt".

2) So Walch and Förstemann. J.T. Müller: "zeucht". Latin: testatur.

that in his time this had been a new speech, that the monastic life should be a state of perfection. So much ungodly opinion and error clings to the monastic vows: that they are to justify and make pious before God; that they are to be Christian perfection; that one thereby keeps both the counsels and commandments of the Gospel; that they have the excess of works which one does not owe to God.

Because all this is false, vain, and fictitious, it also makes the monastic vows null and void.

The XXVIII. Article.

Of the bishops' power.

Of the power of the bishops much and various things have been written of old, and some have unskillfully mixed the power of the bishops and the secular sword together, and out of this disorderly mixture very great wars, rebellions, and outrages have resulted, from which, that the bishops, in the appearance of their power given them by Christ, have not only instituted new divine services, and with reservation of some cases, and with violent banishment 1) have burdened the consciences, but have also refrained from setting and depriving emperors and kings of their pleasure. This crime has been punished for a long time by learned and God-fearing people in Christendom. Therefore, for the consolation of their consciences, ours have been forced to show the difference between spiritual and temporal power, sword and regiment, and have taught that, for the sake of God's command, both regiment and power should be honored and well kept with all devotion, as two of God's highest gifts on earth.

Now ours teach that the power of the keys or bishops, according to the Gospel, is a power and command of God to preach the Gospel, to forgive and retain sin, and to administer and administer the sacraments; for Christ sent the apostles with the command, "As my Father has sent me, even so I also send you. Receive ye the Holy Ghost,

1) "Ban" is plural excommunicationibus.

To whom ye shall remit sins, to them they shall be remitted; and to whom ye shall reserve them, to them they shall be reserved. "(Joh. 20, 21-23.) The same authority of the keys or bishops is exercised and carried on only by the teaching and preaching of God's word, and by the administration of the sacraments, against many or single persons, according to their profession. For thereby are given, not corporeal, but eternal things and goods, namely, eternal righteousness, the Holy Spirit, and eternal life. These goods cannot be obtained otherwise than by the ministry of preaching, and by the administration of the holy sacraments. For St. Paul says: "The Gospel is the power of God to save all who believe in it." (Rom. 1:16.) Forasmuch then as the power of the church or bishops gives eternal goods, and is exercised and wrought by the ministry of preaching alone, the police and the temporal government hinder it nothing everywhere, for the temporal government deals with many other things than the gospel; which power protects not souls, but bodies and goods against external violence with the sword and bodily blows.

Therefore the two governments, the spiritual and the temporal, are not to be mixed and thrown together. For the spiritual authority has its command to preach the gospel and to administer the sacraments; it is also not to fall into a foreign office, it is not to appoint or depose kings, it is not to abolish or destroy worldly law and the obedience of authority, it is not to make law to worldly authority and to set up worldly affairs, as Christ himself said (Joh. 18,36.), "My kingdom is not of this world;" item (Luc. 12:14.), "Who hath set me to be a judge among you?" and St. Paul to the Philippians, 3, 20: "Our citizenship is in heaven;" and in the second to the Corinthians, 10, 4: "The weapons of our knighthood are not carnal, but mighty in the sight of God, to destroy the attempts, and all exaltation, that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God."

In this way we distinguish between the two regiments and the office of authority, and call them both to be held in honor as the highest gift of God on earth. But where the bishops are secular regi

W. xvi, 1031-1034. 869

If the bishops have the sword and the ment, they have them not as bishops by divine rights, but by human imperial rights, given by emperors and kings for the temporal administration of their goods, and the office of the gospel is of no concern to them. Therefore the episcopal office is according to divine rights: to preach the gospel, to forgive sin, to judge doctrine, and to reject doctrine contrary to the gospel, and to exclude the ungodly, whose ungodly nature is evident, from the Christian community, without human authority, but only by the word of God. And in this case the pastors and churches are obliged to be obedient to the bishops, according to this saying of Christ Luc. 10:16: "He that heareth you heareth me." But where they teach, set, or establish anything contrary to the Gospel, we have God's command in such a case that we are not to be obedient, Matt. 7:15: "Beware of false prophets"; and St. Paul to the Galatians 1:8: "If we also, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed:" and in the 2nd epistle to the Corinthians 13:8, "We have no power against vanity, but for the truth:" item [v. 10], "According to the power which the Lord hath given me to amend, and not to destroy." So also spiritual law gives 2. <sup>2</sup> in eap. Laosarāotos, and in eap. Ov68; and St. Augustine, in the epistle against Petilianum, writes, that even bishops, so duly elected, ought not to be followed where they err, or teach or ordain anything contrary to the holy divine Scriptures.

The bishops, however, have power and jurisdiction in certain matters, such as marital affairs or tithes, by virtue of their human rights. But if the ordinaries are negligent in this office, the princes are obliged, whether willingly or unwillingly, to give justice to their subjects for the sake of peace, in order to prevent strife and great unrest in the countries. Further, it is debatable whether bishops also have power to establish ceremonies in the church, as well as ordinances of food, feast days, and various orders of ecclesiastics; for those who give the bishops this power are referring to this saying of Christ, Jn 16:12, 13: "I, the bishops, have power over the church.

I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now: but when the Spirit of truth shall come, he shall guide you into all truth". 15:20. in that they have forbidden blood and things choked. So also that the Sabbath was changed into Sunday, is pointed out against the ten commandments, for which they respect it; and no example is so highly exalted and pointed out, as the changing of the Sabbath, and thus want to maintain that the power of the church is great, because it has dispensed with the ten commandments, and changed something in them.

But ours teach in this matter thus: that the bishops have no power to establish and set up anything contrary to the gospel, as is shown above, and the spiritual rights teach throughout the Ninth Distinction. Now this is openly contrary to God's command and word, to make laws of opinion, or to command that one may thereby suffice for sin and obtain grace, for it is blaspheming the honor of Christ's merit, if by such statutes we refrain from earning grace. It is also evident that, for the sake of this opinion, human essays have become innumerable in Christendom, and that the doctrine of faith and the righteousness of faith have been suppressed. Alan has daily commanded new feasts, new fasts, instituted new ceremonies, and new reverences of the saints, with such works to merit grace and all good with God. Those who establish human statutes also do so contrary to God's commandment, that they sin in food, in days, and in such things, and thus burden Christianity with the bondage of the law, just as if there should be such a service among Christians to merit God's grace, which would be like the Levitical service, which God should have commanded the apostles and bishops to establish, as some write of it; it is also to be believed that some bishops have been deceived with the example of the Law of Moses, from which have come so innumerable statutes, that it is a mortal sin to do manual labor on feast days, even without the offense of others; that it is a mortal sin to slack the seventh day; that some food is injurious to the conscience; that it is a mortal sin to be a sinner.

That fasting is such a work to make atonement for God; that sin is not forgiven in a reserved case, so that one first asks the reserver of the case, regardless of the fact that the spiritual laws do not speak of the reservation of guilt, but of the reservation of church penance.

Whence then have bishops right and power to interpret such essays of Christianity, to ensnare consciences? For St. Peter, in the Acts of the Apostles, on the fifteenth [v. 10.], bids them put the yoke upon the necks of the disciples; and St. Paul tells the Corinthians that they have power to amend, and not to destroy. Why then do they increase sin with such essays? But there are clear sayings in the divine Scriptures that forbid them to set up such essays in order to merit the grace of God, or as if they were necessary for salvation. Thus St. Paul says to Colossians 2 [vv. 16, 17, 20-23]: "Let no man therefore make you conscience of meat, or of drink, or of certain days, even of feasts, or of new moons, or of sabbaths, which are the shadow of things to come, but the body itself is in Christ"; item: "If ye then be dead with Christ from worldly statutes, why do ye then let yourselves be entangled with statutes, as though ye were alive? Which say, Thou shalt not touch these things, thou shalt not eat these things, nor drink these things, thou shalt not put these things on; which are all consumed with hands, and are the commandments and doctrines of men, and have a semblance of wisdom"; 1) item. St. Paul to Tito on the 1st [v. 14.], publicly bequeathed, one should not pay attention to Jewish fables and human commandments, which turn away the truth.

So also Christ himself saith, Matt. 15:14. of them that do men's bidding, "Let them go, they are blind guides to the blind;" and rejecteth such worship, saying [v. 13.s.], "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, they are cut off." Now, if the bishops have power to weigh down the churches with innumerable essays, and to ensnare the consciences: why ver-does then the divine Scripture so often command to make and to hear the human essays? why does it call them doctrines of devils? shall then the Holy Spirit have warned all these things in vain?

1) Thus the Ansbach manuscript. J. T. Müller: "Truth."

Therefore, since such ordinances are established as necessary to propitiate God and to merit grace, they are contrary to the Gospel; so it is by no means proper for the bishops to enforce such services. For in Christendom the doctrine of Christian liberty must be maintained, namely, that the bondage of the law is not necessary to justification; as St. Paul writes to the Galatians on the 5th [v. 1.], "Stand therefore in liberty, that Christ may set us free, and be not again bound in the bondage of the yoke"; for it must ever be preserved the chief article of the gospel, that we obtain the grace of God by faith in Christ without our merit, and do not merit it by service instituted of men.

What then is to be thought of Sunday, and such other church ordinances and ceremonies? To this ours give this answer: that the bishops or pastors may make order, that things may be done properly in the church; not that they may obtain God's grace, nor that they may do enough for sin, nor that they may bind their consciences to consider such things as necessary worship, and that they may be accounted sinful if they break them without offense. St. Paul therefore commanded the Corinthians that the women in the assembly should cover their heads, and that the preachers in the assembly should not all speak at once, but one after another.

It is the duty of the Christian assembly to keep this order for the sake of love and peace, and to be obedient to the bishops and pastors in these cases, and to keep them at a distance so that one does not offend the other, so that there is no disorder or chaos in the church. But so that the consciences may not be troubled, that they may consider it necessary for salvation, and that they may consider it a sin if they break them without the annoyance of others, as says.

That the woman sin, which goeth forth with her head bare, without offence of men. Thus is the ordinance of Sunday, of the Paschal feast, of the Pentecosts, and the like solemnities and ordinances. For those who think that the ordinance of Sunday is established as necessary for the Sabbath are greatly mistaken; for the holy Scriptures have abolished the Sabbath, and teach that all the ceremonies of the old law may be abated after the opening of the Gospel; And yet, because it was necessary to ordain a certain day, that the people might know when they should come together, the Christian church ordained Sunday for this purpose, and was the more pleased and willing to make this change, that the people might have an example of Christian liberty, that it might be known that neither the keeping of the Sabbath, nor of any other day, was necessary. There are many false disputations concerning the change of the law, the ceremonies of the New Testament, and the change of the Sabbath, all of which have sprung from a false and erroneous opinion, as if there should be such a service in Christendom as was according to the Levitical or Jewish service, and as if Christ should have commanded the apostles and bishops to devise new ceremonies necessary to salvation. The same errors have been introduced into Christianity, because the righteousness of the faith has not been taught and preached purely and unadulteratedly. Some therefore argue about Sundays, that they must be kept, though not by divine right, but in form and measure, as far as one may work on a holiday. But what are such disputations but snares of conscience? For though they presume to palliate and epiicirize human essays, yet no or palliation can be effected, so

For a long time the opinion has stood and remained, as if they were necessary. Now the same opinion must remain, if one knows nothing of the righteousness of faith and of Christian liberty. The apostles said that one should abstain from blood and suffocation. But who keeps it now? But yet they do not sin who do not keep it, for the apostles themselves did not want consciences either.

We do not wish to burden ourselves with such servitude, but have forbidden it for a time for the sake of annoyance; for we must have respect in this statute for the main piece of Christian doctrine, which is not abrogated by this decree. No old canons are kept, as they read, and many of these statutes fall away every day, even among those who keep such essays most diligently. There one cannot advise nor help the consciences, where this palliation is not kept, that we know to keep such articles thus, that it is not thought that they are necessary: that also it is harmless to the consciences, although such articles fall away. But the bishops would easily receive obedience, if they did not insist on keeping those statutes which cannot be kept without sin. But now they do one thing, and forbid both forms of the holy sacrament; item, the marriage state of the clergy; they admit no one before he has taken an oath that he will not preach this doctrine, which is undoubtedly according to the holy gospel.

Our churches do not desire that the bishops, to the detriment of their honor and dignity, should again make peace and unity, even though it is the duty of the bishops to do so in times of need, but they do ask that the bishops refrain from some unjust impositions, which were not even in the church in former times, and were adopted contrary to the usage of the common Christian church, which may have had some cause in the beginning, but they do not rhyme with our times. So it is also undeniable that some statutes were adopted out of ignorance. Therefore the bishops should be kind enough to moderate these statutes, since such a change does no harm to preserve the unity of the Christian church; for many statutes that arise from men have themselves fallen with the times, and are not necessary to be kept, as the papal laws themselves testify. But if it cannot be preserved even among them, that such human statutes be tempered and put away, which cannot be kept without sin, we must follow the apostles' rule, which commands us to be more obedient to God than to men. [Acts 5:29.]

St. Peter bequeaths dominion to the bishops, as if they had power to compel the churches to do what they wished. Now they do not deal with taking away the bishops' power, but they ask and desire that they will not force consciences to sin. But if they will not do this, and despise this request, let them think how they will have to answer God for it, because with such harshness they give cause for schism and division, which they should help to prevent.

These are the most important articles that are considered controversial. For although many more abuses and inaccuracies could have been brought to light, we have, in order to avoid prolixity and length, reported only the most important ones, from which the others can easily be gauged, for in former times there were many complaints about indulgences, pilgrimages, and the abuse of the ban. The parish priests also quarreled endlessly with the monks about hearing confessions, burials, sermons, 2) and countless other things. We have passed over all of this in the best way and for the sake of glimpses, so that the most distinguished pieces in this matter may be noted all the better. Nor is it to be held that anything is said or done in this matter to hate, oppose, or discredit anyone, but we have only told the things that we thought it necessary to tell and report, so that it may be heard all the more clearly that nothing is accepted among us, either with doctrine or with ceremonies, that would be contrary either to the Holy Scriptures or to the common Christian church. For it is now in the day and public that we have prevented with all diligence, with God's help (without speaking of glory), so that no new and ungodly doctrine will ever take root, break in, and gain the upper hand in our churches.

The above articles we have desired to hand over, according to the letter, for a display of our confession, and of our doctrine; and if any man be found to be

Of secular laws and order.

That Christ would come at the last day to judge the living and the dead; to give eternal life and joy to the faithful, and to condemn the devils and the ungodly.

Of free will, that we have a free will to be outwardly pious, but not before GOD.

That sin is caused from the perverse will of devils and wicked men.

Of faith and good works, that the right faith is that one heartily devotes himself to all good, grace and help to God for Christ's sake, and that faith without good works is nothing, which God has commanded.

And of the service of the saints, that one should also provide oneself with all good to God, as the saints have done, and that one should follow their faith, and love; but only call upon God.

After that the articles in dispute followed, as, of both forms, why they are given to everyone with us.

Of the measurement, how they are kept with us, and for what causes the angle measurement falls with us.

From the priests, monks and nuns marriage.

Of the monastic vows.

Of the difference of food.

From confession.

Of the power of bishops, and the difference between the spiritual and the temporal sword.

In every article of the faith, the contrary doctrine and erroneous opinion and heresies, as sacramentalists, Anabaptists 2c., were also rejected, with the request that, if anyone wished to have further instruction, he should do the same.

At the entrance, my most gracious and gracious Elector, Princes and Lords have protested that these matters are now, in love and kindness, not to be settled according to their Imperial Majesty's request in their notice to this Diet. Maj.'s request in their invitation to this Imperial Diet, that they all be and remain subject to the previous appeal and protest at the next Imperial Diet at Speier, to the future, common, free, Christian Council, which Imperial Maj. has in some of their instructions announced in the Constitution of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. in some of her instructions to imperial congresses. Imperial Congresses, has graciously entrusted to the Empire.

Kaiserl. Maj. and King Ferdinandus, the Dukes of Bavaria, and also several bishops have listened very diligently.

Be sure that you have not heard so much of this doctrine all your lives, and that, of course, Imperial Maj. Maj., King, many princes and bishops have taken us all for mammals, who thought neither of God nor of faith.

Since the chancellor had read in the confession that about four hundred years ago, when the pope had forbidden the priests in Germany to marry, and an archbishop of Mainz had proclaimed the same commandment, and his priests had wanted to urge them to oppose it by force so hard that he had been almost strangled in an outrage, King Ferdinand had asked the archbishop of Mainz if it was true? Mainz said: Yes, it was true.

Finally, since the confession has been made, and both the Latin and German have been handed to Doctor Brück, Chancellor, Alexander Schweiß, Imperial Secretary, and through him to the Archbishop at Main. Secretaries, and through him to the Archbishop of Mainz, His Imperial Majesty himself took hold of it and took it to him. Maj. himself took hold of it, and took it to him, with gracious request to pursue the matter further through Duke Frederick, Count Palatine.

Some princes, who should rightly be our friends, have almost stood in such a way under the reading of the confession of faith and doctrine, that it is to be noted from it that they did not hear it very gladly. For indeed the adversaries have that one would be very shy about this part of the matter, and would have to do everything that could be done.

God has ever given the grace that no one has been disparaged in the confession, and that it has been kept as light as possible, so that no one would ever have to complain about a single scandal.

Therefore, we hope to God that God will continue to give us grace, so that we may earnestly seek God with diligent prayer everywhere in all churches and sermons, and also in other ways, so that God may lead these things to a blessed end, so that we may remain in God's Word and keep good peace. So we all ask with earnestness.

And let this bargain move us to act all the more in the fear of God. For if it should come to an unfortunate end, the country and its people would suffer great destruction, perhaps not only with the loss of life and property, wife and child, but also of eternal goods, since God wants to protect us from them.

One is said to have requested that one should not allow the confession touched to be printed in Latin and German.

One has also not forbidden the eating of meat on Friday 2c. until now. May God continue to help in all other main matters with all graces, amen.

The sixth section of the thirteenth chapter.

How the Augsburg Confession was handed over to some papist theologians for examination, and by them immediately a refutation was made, but by Melancthon the so-called Apology was written.

H.. What unequal judgments about the read confession have fallen among the Roman-Catholic states, and what complaints have been made from both sides.

963. Spalatin's short account of it.

About this writing Walch says in the Jnhaltsverzeichnis of the 16th volume, p. 49 b: "Steht in Spalatin's unnumb x. 140 and in the Theilen Luth. in the places mentioned immediately before." But only one part is found in the Annals, pp. 140-147, the whole being an extract from a writing which has the title: "Etlliche Historie, wohl zu merken, so sich auf diesem Reichstag zugetragen 2c. von Magistro Georgio Spalatin's verzeichnet. Anno 1530." This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 413, and in the Jena (1554), vol. V, p. 33. The separate pieces of this narrative are there widely scattered; in the Wittenberg 1st e. p. 413 u; 413 b; 414u; 414 b; 415; 416 b; 417.

Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria, when he heard the confession of my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, and of the other princes who depend on his electoral grace in the Gospel, he spoke kindly to my most gracious lord, and when he came home, he was said to have said that he had not been told about this matter and doctrine before.

The other day a prince, in the presence of many others...

1) This paragraph is not in Spalatin's Annals.

Princes and lords have said: The Lutherans have next delivered a writing, written with ink; if I were emperor, I would again give them a writing with rubrics, that is, written with red ink. Another prince would soon have to answer this: Nevertheless, the emperor would have to be careful if he wanted to write with rubrics, as your lord says, so that the presiliaries 1) do not splash under his eyes.

Some cardinals themselves confess that our cause and doctrine are right, but that it should not have been done without the help of others; they do not know how to compare, and do not want to have acted wrongly in any way.

2) The archbishop of Cologne is said to have said last year: I am a bishop, and am to govern my churches, and to preach. Now I cannot; but I only wanted to leave my diocese, so that this matter would be judged in good peace.

One says again, also some Bavarians themselves, that Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria said to O. Ecken: I have been told many other things about Luther's teaching than I have heard in their confession. You have also put me off, that their doctrine is too embarrassing. Then D. Eck spoke: With the fathers I dare to dispense, but not with the Scriptures. Then Duke Wilhelm turned away from him.

His Imperial Majesty had his Spanish masters discuss how his Majesty should show himself against the Lutheran doctrine. To this they have given Imperial Maj. Maj. in the French language this answer: where his Imperial Maj. Maj. finds in it such pieces as are contrary to the articles of faith, then his Majesty shall use all his power to eradicate the same sects. If, however, the disputed articles only concern the removal of certain ceremonies and external things, His Majesty shall not violently oppose them. But to learn this, his Majesty shall submit the matters to a few pious people who are not related to any part. This is a fine, prudent, wise council, the like of which we would hardly have found in all German lands.

3) The Cardinal Campegius said to one: "I have often thought that the innumerable great multitude of monks will one day cause great misfortune to the Church.

1) "Presilgen" == Brazil, red color. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 819.

2) The following two paragraphs are not in Spalatin's Annals.

3) The following two paragraphs are missing from Spalatin's Annals.

Doctor Paulus Ricener, King Ferdinand's physician, spoke most honestly and best of remote matters, concerning God's word, and cannot be surprised enough at the great harshness of our counterpart.

Count Felix von Werdenberg, such a great adversary of Doctor Martin Luther that he is said to have let himself be heard: if it came to war against the Lutherans, that he would allow himself to be used for it in vain, had a panket with the Abbot of Weingarten on Monday after St. Kilian's Day [July 11], and went there drunk, and was found dead in bed, and buried on Tuesday after St. Kilian's Day. God forgive him his sin. So one after the other passes away. We still act as if we wanted to push Christ out of heaven.

It is said, when Count Felix von Werdenberg was carried to his grave, that an honest citizen stood before a prince's council here in Augsburg, and when he saw the corpse, with more pomp than usual, he asked: who was the dead man? When he heard that Count Felix was the deceased, he was terrified and said, "God is a strange judge; only yesterday I heard from his mouth that he had spoken in dire tones: he did not want to live, he wanted to devour life and limb to eradicate the Lutheran doctrine; then he went away so quickly. Now it is said that he was not drunk either.

Another count experienced this, who also opposed God's word so much, also with such defiance, he is also said to have been so frightened that he became ill from it.

The suffragan bishop of Würzburg, Marius, often said in a collation: he wanted to stay with the mother, he meant the papal church. Brentius, as a pious, learned man, once said: "My dear sir, you must not forget the Father, the dear God, in addition; then the suffragan bishop wanted to fly off the handle.

964 Luther's letter to Nicolaus Hausmann, in which a certain bishop's and Duke Henry of Brunswick's speeches are particularly strange. July 6, 1530.

Handwritten in 60<l. 3en. d., col. 209, and in Aurifaber's unprinted collection, vol. III, p. 45. After the latter with obvious errors in Schütze, vol. II, p. 148. Also in Buddeus, p. 139; in Cölestin, torn. II, col. 206 6 and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 69.

To the venerable man, Mr. Nicolaus Hausmann, the faithful and very loud bishop of the church at Zwickau.

Grace and peace in Christ! This our rius 1) or "Hornung" will tell you, my dear man, everything that is happening both at Augsburg and here with me better than I am able to write it. However, after his arrival here, D. Jonas wrote to me that our confession, which our Philip had prepared, was publicly read by D. Christian, the Chancellor of our Prince, before the Emperor and the Princes and Bishops of the whole Empire (only with the exclusion of the common great crowd) in the Emperor's palace itself. The following have signed the confession: first the Elector of Saxony, then Margrave George of Brandeburg, John Frederick, the younger Prince, the Landgrave of Hesse, Ernst and Francis, Dukes of Lüneburg, Prince Wolfgang of Anhalt, the City of Nuremberg and Reutlingen. 2) Now the imperial ones are deliberating about the answer. Many bishops are inclined to peace and despise the sophists Faber and Eck. A bishop is said to have said 3) in private conversation: This is the plain truth, we cannot deny it. The bishop of Mainz is highly praised as a man of peace. Likewise Duke Henry of Brunswick, who kindly invited Philip to the banquet and testified that he indeed could not deny the articles of the two forms, the marriage of priests, and the indiscriminate nature of the food. Our people boast that in the whole Diet no one was more lenient than the emperor himself. So it is with the beginning. The emperor treats our prince not only graciously, but almost reverently. So writes Philip. It is to be marveled at how all glow with love and favor against the emperor. Perhaps, if God wills that, as the first

1) A game with "Hornung's" name.

2) Luther here gives the signers of the Latin Confession. From the report of Chancellor Brück, No. 959, it appears that only five princely persons besides the two cities signed the German Confession; in the Latin one, Duke Johann Friedrich and Duke Franz of Lüneburg were added.

3) According to the following letter, this bishop is the bishop of Augsburg.

Emperor 4) was very evil, so this last one will be very good. Let us only pray, for the power of prayer is very clearly felt. You will communicate this to the Cordatus and to all the brothers, for it is true. I believe that by now you have received my letter to you and your brother. The Lord be with thee, amen. Greetings to all our brethren. From the desert, July 6, 1530.

Your Martin Luther.

965 Letter of D. Justus Jonas to D. Martin Luther, in which among other things the above statement of a bishop is confirmed, and another equally strange one of the bishop of Salzburg is mentioned. About June 27, 1530.

This letter is found in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 205; in Oorp. Lei., vol. II, 154 and a detailed regest in Burkhardt, p. 179. The latter has the date "June 29", but Köstlin, M. Luther, vol. II, p. 656 proves that it must have left Augsburg already on June 27.

Translated into German.

(1) Faber is quite mad, and Eck not much wiser; they are doing it with all zeal and earnestness, one must use force, and not first make much interrogation. On account of the confession delivered before the Emperor on the Saturday after St. John's Day (which would have been delivered the day before, had it not been for the piteous and moving speech of the Austrians by Sigismund von Dietrichstein, which would have presented the pitiful state of the siege of Vienna the year before), our princes were heard in the Emperor's palace, in a not very spacious place; there could have been about 200 people inside. The Emperor sat down, and the Electors, together with the absent Electors' envoys, took their seats on both sides. Afterwards, the other princes and estates of the empire sat on one side. Our Chancellor, D. Christian, read our confession from article to article, clearly, loudly and audibly, so that it was heard by all. He read it all in two hours. The Emperor was very attentive. The Bishop of Augsburg is said to have said in conversations among good friends: What has been read out is true; it is the plain truth, we cannot deny it. I have seen the face of the emperor and face now more closely and better than ten years ago at the Diet of Worms. In all things, this prince seems to radiate that which indicates a mild, honest, gracious, and quite royal heart, and a kind, as it were, innate cheerfulness.

4) This will probably refer to the Diet of Worms.

(2) I have heard from a great man who was also in the council and assembly that whenever King Ferdinand speaks something harsh and unkind, the emperor is wont to punish him and to say that moderation and kindness befit kings, with which, however, he shows that he is repulsed by all heated and hasty proposals, and that anger and sudden zeal in princes is a very bad counselor. The Emperor had our confession translated into Italian and French by Alphonsus Waldez and Alexander Schweiß. Only Nuremberg and Reutlingen signed the confession. The people of Strasbourg asked several times that it be accepted, with the exception of the article on the Sacrament, but the princes did not want to do so. The Landgrave has signed it with us, but says that ours do not satisfy him in the matter of the Sacrament. The Bishop of Augsburg is to expressly contradict all suggestions of violence and cruelty in the Council. The Salzburg bishop is said to have said among good friends: I wanted both forms and marriage to be free; I wanted the Mass to be better established; I wanted freedom in food and other statutes, and thus good order in everything; but that a few monks should reform us all, that is a disturbance of the peace, one must not suffer that!

(3) The chancellor and the rest of us have advised the princes to go to the emperor and briefly present (and show) the sum of the doctrine, in which they may or may not yield. Philip is writing articles here, which we want to consider together, and which are also to be sent to you, so that you may translate them and see for yourselves. As for my conscience, I beseech you through Jesus Christ, my most worthy Father, that ye take good care of it, because it is a matter of great importance. For ye are the chariot of Israel, and the charioteer thereof: the Lord hath endued you before others with glorious gifts. The Lord Philip, out of good intentions, is walking in this matter very carefully and cautiously, and wants to give way to the common peace in many things. And in the end we have quarreled a little about the rule and power of the bishops, which I report to you so secretly. But Here may ye give good counsel, that it be not a calamity to all our posterity, and that it torment us in our conscience hereafter. I also would that all these things were left undone, whereby nothing is taken away from Christ. But I have no doubt that Christ will reveal to us what is to be done through your mouth, through which he has been presented and preached to us in a holy way. 1) The other day the Cardinal of Salzburg summoned the Lord Philip to him for an intimate conversation, through Wolfgang Stromer of Nuremberg. And as he had returned from it rather heated, he told us, as it was already 2 o'clock at night towards morning, what they had spoken to each other. I heard (he says) the utmost threats, and not a death sentence at all. The man from Salzburg, when he was told of his conscience, said: "Conscience! the Emperor will not suffer the disturbance of common peace. They are safe, as if there were no God. It is astonishing how much they rely on human power, and how we are nothing but ants in their eyes.

(4) I and Philip have been with Cornelius Schopper, who was formerly in the service of the exiled King of Denmark, but is now the imperial secretary. He said (as he likes to joke wittily and finely): if we had money, we would soon buy a religion from the Italians, as we only wanted to. But if we had no gold, our cause would be a very meagre and dry one. He also says that it is not possible that the emperor, whom the cardinals and bishops now surround so much, should accept or put up with any other religion than the papist one; so much has the old one been put into his head.

(5) My gracious young lord will have your rose 2) cut into a pretty stone and set in gold; it will be a very beautiful pitter-patter, which his princely grace will give to you himself.

006 I would that ye would write unto Philip very often. For there is very great sadness in him, and the common matter is very grievous to his heart. We are always telling him to take the Psalms of David and to speak to God with foreign words, but not with his own words, in such an important matter; but his excessive sadness keeps the upper hand.

1) The following two accounts of Melancthon's meeting with the Cardinal of Salzburg and the imperial secretary Cornelius Schopper are also found, almost word for word, in the letter of Jonas of June 25, 1530, which Kolde, p. 138 ff. communicates.

2) which Luther had in his coat of arms.

966th Letter of Melanchthon to Luther, in which he reports about the attacks of the opposing party after the delivery of the Confession.

July 8, 1530.

This letter is found in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 208 and in the 6orx. Röt., vol. II, 175.

Translated into German.

We thank you very much that you have answered us without any worries. Of other things orally. I will only briefly tell you what is going on here. After the delivery of our confession, three different opinions came to the fore in the assembly of princes. The first was the most stringent, that the Emperor should urge all princes and nations to comply with the Edict of Worms. The other was somewhat less severe, and was to the effect that our Confession should be handed over to honest, learned, and impartial men for examination, and that afterwards the Emperor should make a pronouncement. King Ferdinand also put up with this. The third, as it seems, is that the refutation of our confession should be read to us, whereby the Emperor reserves that we leave the matter to his judgment, otherwise we should bring everything back to the old state until a council is called. This latter opinion has not yet been made public, we have not yet received an answer; but I hope it will be proclaimed on Monday. I wait for it with great desire. For I have from experience how the Legate Campegius is minded. Since the archbishop of Mainz saw that he could not achieve anything by much arguing, he did not come to the assembly the following day. Since the princes agreed with this opinion, the princely councillors were also excluded, from whom it was assumed that they would have a more lenient opinion. Among them is the Chancellor of Dresden. Herewith I have told you not only the actions so far, but also what is still to be expected without any addition. For I foresee what movements, what a distressing spectacle the opinion of our opponents will cause. The peasant, 1) whom you know, is at the top of the game, and is being incited by some hypocrites among the theologians. That is all I can write. Fare well, and pray for us. The 8th of July.

1) Duke George.

967 Directory of the Papal Theologians who were present at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg.

From Müller's Hist., p. 653, Walch has printed this directory under the title: "Directory of the Papal Theologians who were to refute the Augsburg Confession." But according to Spalatin's Annals, p. 141, the Wittenberg edition, vol. IX, p. 413 d, and the Jena edition, vol. V, p. 34, this is the "Directory of the twenty Doctores, so wider die Lutherischen hie zu Augsburg sind," which the preacher of Queen Mary had sent to the Protestants. In the various editions, the order of the names is different.

1. doctor Johann Eck.
2. D. Johann Faber, provost at Ofen, coadjutor.
3. D. Augustin Marius, Bishop of Salon.
4. D. Conrad Wimpina, Oräirmrius knrtsusis.
5. D. Johann Cochlaeus, with Duke Georgen at Saxony.

6. D. Paul Haug, 2) of the Order of Preachers Provincial.
7. D. Andreas Stoß, the Carthaeus Provincial.
8. D. Conrad Colli, 3) Prior with the preachers at Kölln.
9. D. Bartholomew Using, 4) Augustinian at the Bishop of Würzburg.
10. D. Johann Mensing, preacher monk with the Elector of Brandenburg.
11. D. Johann Dittenberger?) Prior at Coblenz.
12. D. Johann Burkard, Vicarius of the Order of Preachers.
13. D. Hieronymus Montinus, 6) of the Bishop of Passau Vicarius.
14. D. Matthias Kretz, 7) Preacher at Augsburg.
15. D. Peter Speiser, 8) Vicarius of the Bishop of Costnitz.
16. D. Arnold von Wesel, Oolonisusis.
17. brother Medardus, of King Ferdinand: preacher, monk of the Barefoot.
18. D. Conrad Thoman, preacher at Regensburg.
19. D. Augustin Tottelin 9) of Bremen.
20. D. Wolfgang Redörffer, provost at Stendal.

2) With Walch: Hugo.

3) Walch: Collin.

4> Walch: Usinger.

5) Wittenberg and Jena: "Dietenberger". - Because this name is missing in Spalatin's annals, only nineteen doctors are listed there.

6) Jn Spalatin's Annals: Monting.

7) With Spalatin: Gretz.

8) Walch: Speisser.

9) In Walch: "Thomä, Prediger zu Regensburg". - Spalatin writes: "Tottelin", the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers: "Cottelin".

968 Spalatin's report how the emperor had asked the Protestants whether they wanted to leave it with the articles handed over or whether they were willing to hand over more.

In Spalatin's Annals, p. 142; in the Wittenberg, vol. IX, bl. 416b, and in the Jena, vol.v, bl.37.

On Saturday after St. Kilian's Day, July 9, early in the morning 1) at the City Hall, Duke Frederick of Bavaria, in addition to Count Hoyer of Mansfeld and Count von Helfenstein, requested my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, and the other princes who are adherents of the Gospel, to indicate whether they wanted to leave it at the articles presented or to bring in more articles, so that, where one will take up the matter, there will be no hindrance. There has not been a request for a back door in view of the fact that the cities are dependent on them, namely Nuremberg and Reutlingen.

The answer, 2) given to it, was Christian, and thus put, praise God that one has not given anything to the cause, presented in writings on Sundays after Kiliani, with diligent request to promote the things. God grant that it may prosper, amen.

969: The writing of D. Justus Jonas, Joh. Rurk, Erhard Schnepf and Heinrich Bock handed over to their masters, in which they advise the princes to consult with their scholars, in which matters one can give in to the papists. June 28, 1530.

, From Spalatin's Annals, p. 220.

Grace and peace of God through Christ. Most Serene, Most Illustrious, Most Reverend Prince and Princes, Most Gracious and Most Merciful Lords! After the articles of faith and doctrine recently published in Ew. churfürstl. und fürstl. Gn. lands have been preached hitherto, Roman Imperial Maj. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Electors, Princes and Estates of the Empire, and it is to be hoped that some will receive a clearer report from [the] opponents than they had before, it is nevertheless to be feared that this high, great matter, concerning the Christian religion and faith, will not be so regarded by some of the opposing party,

1) at seven o'clock. See No. 973.

2) Document No. 973.

And if it came to the ways of seeking means and measures of union and concord, perhaps the adversaries or negotiators, as in worldly affairs. And if it were possible to find a means and measure of unification and concord, perhaps the adversaries or negotiators would want to take these matters into consideration, as in other worldly affairs, by means of disputes and arguments, which would only waste a great deal of time, since the main matter is based on a number of certain articles, since a Christian (if negotiated for a long time) cannot give in or give way. Again, the adversaries would hold some articles in high esteem, since one may well yield and give way without danger to conscience. For this reason, it would be our humble concern, where Your Royal and Princely Highnesses are in consultation. and finally had decided in which parts Your Highness and Princely Grace would hold to something, in which to something else. and Princely Grace to give way to something, in which also nothing at all was considered; thus that Ew. chur- und prinstl. Gn. themselves would have gone to the Imperial Majesty on their occasion. Majesty on their occasion, and reported such sum of the whole business to their Majesty humbly and confidentially, with humbly indication of what their souls and consciences are and what their souls and consciences are and what their souls and consciences are. Their Majesties' souls and consciences' salvation in these matters, which, in our opinion, should be almost beneficial and serviceable for the speedy and also otherwise good furtherance of the matters. For Imperial Majesty Majesty would like to take the more certain and easier summary report of these matters, to read, respect and move the delivered articles the more actually with gracious attention, also to give the less place and faith to many burdensome speeches of the opposing party. But if there should be a doubt here again, as if it should not be good to give oneself up to the adversary so far in the day and so completely naked, it is not the opinion of this high trade, touching the faith. For those who want to be Christian must be sure and certain of the articles that have divine command and cannot be traded. Therefore, as the holy Scriptures report, as in the Proverbs of King Solomon, that God guides and leads the hearts of kings and princes, as he guides the rivers of water, 2c., and for many reasons it is very important that this trade of the imperial majesty should be carried out by considerable men. Majesty by respectable persons, as your chur- and princely graces. We have considered it good that Your Royal and Princely Grace will take care of it. will see to it that Your Royal and Princely Grace, Imperial Maj. Maj. make such a request in person. This we have done, after we have acknowledged ourselves guilty of having asked Your Electoral and Princely Grace in these matters, on our part. Majesty in these matters, on our souls and consciences.

Hail, what we deem good to indicate, E. chur. and princ. We do not know how to behave in our submissive opinion. However, we place all of this in all submissiveness in the high princely mind and concern of Your Highness and Princely Grace. Gn. high princely mind and concern. May the almighty God grant His grace and spirit to His Highness and Princely Grace. His grace and spirit to do what His divine will and the honor of His holy name may be. 971 Letter of the Elector John to Luther in Coburg. 15 July 1530.

From Cyprian's Supplements to the History of the Augsb. Conf., p. 191. - This is the answer to No. 956.

John 2c.

Our greetings first. Venerable, reverend, dear devotee! We have heard your next letter to your gracious comfort and pleasure, and would be well inclined to report to you the state of our affairs sooner. However, we do not know how to behave in your gracious opinion that, when we handed over our articles, they were still pending with us some other princes, of these matters, of which nothing further has been done, and are therefore waiting for a decision until this hour; however, they are also reported as being somewhat mistaken about their part of the matters among themselves, and thus we have been delayed for a long time. But what will happen later in this matter and what we will be pleased to answer, that shall remain undisclosed to you.

And herewith, in response to the notice given to us by our personal physician and dear faithful friend, Caspar Lindemann, Doctor, we resend to you copies of the letter of consolation which you once sent to us before. All of which we graciously do not want to behave. Date Augsburg, on Friday after Margaret [15 July], Anno Domini 30sten.

[Dear] Faithful]. We request that you place the 1) letter in safekeeping in the hands of D. M. Luther for our sake, and that you do so that it is given to him and not to anyone else. This is our opinion. Date. Coburg to Schösser.

972. the theologians indicated reasons why it would not be advisable to hand over more articles.

In Cölestin, vol. II, p. 21, and in Chyträus, according to the Latin edition, p. 123, according to the German, p. 196. German also in the "Oorx". Rsk., vol. II, 182 with the superscription: ^lsuutlioujs suüieium.

(1) First, because the princes have made their confession of the necessary doctrinal articles which are preached publicly to the people in their countries, and do not need to burden them with useless disputations, such as whether women can also consecrate? whether everything must be done as it is done? and the like, which belong more to the school than to the sermons in the church.

(2) In the confession that has been handed down, all the necessary articles have been written. Therefore, all abuses that are contrary to this doctrine will be punished at the same time, as everyone can understand the contradiction.

(3) If the hateful articles were now handed over, the adversaries could misinterpret us as if we had previously handed over the seemly articles that were pleasing to everyone, and now the Imperial Majesty sees that we are concealing much and harmful error, and if her Imperial Majesty sees that we are not in the right. Majesty sees that we are hiding much and harmful error, and if Her Imperial Majesty continues, we will be in danger. Majesty continued, more error would be produced.

(4) Because we are not to prevent the action of these religious matters themselves, it is by no means advisable that the hateful and unnecessary articles, of which they are in the habit of discussing in the schools, should be regulated at this time:

Whether everything must therefore happen as it happens?

Whether free will is nothing?

Whether God also do evil?

I wonder if all Christians are priests.

Whether the pope by divine right be the supreme

Bishop?

Whether to allow the indulgence?

Whether every good work is a mortal sin?

Whether a layman could eonsecrate the sacrament?

Whether matrimonial matters alone belong before the bishops?

Whether there were more or less than seven sacraments?

Whether the bishops can at the same time wield the secular sword and preside over the churches?

Whether the pope is a lord of all spiritual goods by divine right?

Whether the divine election is partly due to our merit or not?

Whether ordination to the priesthood imprints an everlasting characterem?

Could a woman eonsecrate?

Whether the confession of the ears is necessary for salvation? 2c.

In Cölestin, vol. II, p. 118; in Chytráus Latin p. 123, German p. 196; from this in Müller's Hist. lib. III, vap. 21st, p. 667, and in the Oorx. Uek., vol. II, 184. This letter is addressed to the princes and counts mentioned in no. 968. Also in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 17 from the Margraval Brandenburg Reichstagsacten, pp. 135 f. This letter is addressed to the imperial commissioners, Count Palatine Frederick, Count Wolf of Montfort, Count Hoyer of Mansfeld, and the Lord of Helfenstein.

I. Highborn Prince, friendly dear Oheim, 1) well-born Counts, dear Special and Faithful! When yesterday at seven o'clock our dear and you Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, gave us the order that we wanted to let ourselves be heard. Majesty, our most gracious Lord's order, that we wanted to be heard as to whether we would be willing to report and hand over more articles, or whether it would be better for us to do so with those to whom Imperial Majesty we are next subject. Majesty's Majesty we had sent to you in writings: so E. L. and you we indicate our friendly and favourable opinion together with our fellow relatives. Although it is public that many great and grievous abuses, concerning doctrine and the government of the clergy, are in the church, which have first given cause, not only to our own, but also to many others, to preach and write against them for the instruction of consciences, which have been driven with unrighteous doctrine, to the prejudice of their salvation, and which have caused no harm to the church.

1) So Förstemann; 6orp. Hek.: "Cousin".

consolation from the Holy Gospel; meanwhile, however, Kais. Majesty. has graciously indicated in her letter that these matters concerning religion are to be dealt with among ourselves in love and kindness, and are to be compared with the truth (which alone is the pure Word of God), as is done in a Christian and fair manner; so in the next document not all abuses are specified and referred to by name, but a common confession and confession is handed over, in which all the doctrine, which is especially useful for the salvation of souls, is preached among us, so that Imperial Majesty would be thoroughly informed that no unchristian doctrine is accepted among us. Maj. may be thoroughly informed that no unchristian doctrine is accepted here. Thus we have also deemed it necessary to bring forward the abuses in which our and our consciences have been troubled, rather than other abuses concerning the conduct of the clergy, for which they will have to give account to God in their own time, if such abuses are not stopped or led to Christian correction.

(2) Therefore, in order that this matter may be dealt with the more lovingly and compared with God's word from the truth, and that the most important parts in which changes have occurred, as well as the causes for which such things have occurred and been tolerated, may be seen and recognized the more clearly, the broadness, especially the telling of all abuses, has been avoided in our Scriptures.

(3) With these Articles, so delivered, all uncertain and unjust doctrines and abuses, which are contrary to the same Articles delivered, and their causes, are thereby also opposed, and therefore consider without necessity to bring in more Articles.

(4) If, however, the counterpart uses the same abuses for his opinion and opinion, by virtue of Imperial Majesty, he shall be entitled to the same. Majesty. If, however, the opposing party should raise the same abuses for his opinion and opinion by virtue of the Imperial Proclamation and the presentation that has taken place, or should challenge our Confession, or should attempt to advance something new, then it is hereby requested to make further report of this from God's Word, as it has also been requested to do at the end of the written confession that has been submitted next.

5 And therefore to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, is our most humble request. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, our most humble request, because we have decreed ourselves most humble obedience to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's most humble obedience, and have now been here for a long time at great expense, that Her Imperial Majesty may graciously request that we be allowed to continue our work. Majesty may graciously decree and encourage that Her Majesty's request be complied with and lived without further delay, as we also put ourselves off in all submission, and there has been no lack of us, nor, God willing, should there be. For the sake of
 Her Imperial Majesty

Our most gracious Lord, we deserve in all submissiveness. Actum Augsburg, on the 10th day of July, 1530.

By the Grace of God, John, Duke of Saxony, and Elector.

George, Margrave of Brandenburg.

Ernst, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg.

Philip, Landgrave of Hesse.

Olfgang, Prince of Anhalt, together with our kinsmen.

974 Luther's Letter of Consolation to Melanchthon. June 27, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in the Ooä. len. d., tot. 110, and in Aurifaber, vol. iii. p. 33. According to the Jena manuscript in Buddeus, p. iii.; in the Latin collection of letters of Flacius, Magdeburg, 1549. 8th; in Cölestin, vol. German in Spalatin's Annals, p. 217; in Chyträus p. 93 incomplete; in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 425b; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 39b; in the Altenburg, vol. V., p. 163, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 184. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! in Christ, I say, not in the world, amen. About the excuse for your silence another time, my dear Philip. This messenger showed himself by chance and suddenly, and as he was going away, he could hardly wait for these letters which we had received from Wittenberg, which were to be brought [by him] as far as Nuremberg, that they might come to you from thence, until we could write more widely by another messenger. 1)

1) Flacius omitted the preceding clause, and in all German editions it has remained untranslated; probably with reason. For, in order to be able to translate it, we have conjicir aä vos venirsnt (so. bttterao) instead of aä nos vsnirst. In the manuscript the latter may appear thus: a<l uos venirst. That our translation is correct can be seen from the letter to Link of the same date, De Wette, vol. IV, p. 50 f.

I hate very much your very great sorrows, by which, as you write, you are consumed; that they so rule in your heart is not due to the greatness of the matter, but to the greatness of our unbelief. For this same thing was greater in the days of John Hus and many others than it is now with us. Then, though it may be great, he who undertook it and began it is also great, for it is not our cause. Why then dost thou torment thyself thus without ceasing and without cessation? If the thing be false, let us revoke it; but if it be true, why do we, in so great promises, make a liar of him who commands us to have a heart that is confident and undaunted? He says [Ps. 55:23.], "Cast thy concern upon the LORD." The LORD is near to all them that are of a broken heart [Ps. 34:19.] that call upon him. Does he then speak this to the wind, or cast this to the beasts? I am often broken-hearted too, but not always. Your philosophy torments you so, not theology, as well as your Joachim, 2) who seems to me to be gnawed by the same worry. As if, indeed, you could do anything by this useless worry of yours. "What more can the devil do, but to strangle us?" What more? I beseech you, who are valiant in all other things, fight also against yourself, your greatest enemy, since you present so many weapons against yourself to Satan. Christ died once for sins, but for righteousness and truth he will not die, but lives and reigns. If this be true, what is there for truth to fear when he reigns? But, you will say, it will be struck down by the wrath of GOD. May we, after all, also be struck down at the same time, but not by ourselves. He who has become our father will also be so for our children. I certainly pray diligently for you, and I am sorry that you, as a very persistent worrier, 3) make my prayers so futile. I at least, as far as the matter is concerned (whether it be dullness or the spirit, Christus), not very worried, indeed better hope than I had expected. God is mighty to raise up the dead, he is mighty also to preserve his cause when it falters, to raise it up again when it has fallen, to promote it when it stands. If we shall not be worthy to do this, let it be done by others. For if we be not established by his promises, I pray thee, who are the rest of the people in the whole world, to whom they ought to refer? But more of this another time; I am but carrying water into the sea.

Know thou that your letters, written before the emperor's coming, and after his coming, went yesterday to Wittenberg. For even there they have been miserably afflicted by your silence, as you will perceive from the letters of Pomeranus. It is not the fault of the messenger, as Jonas complains, but thoroughly yours, and yours alone. Christ comfort you all by his Spirit, and strengthen and instruct you, Amen. If I hear that the matter shall be evil with you, and in danger, I shall hardly refrain from coming thither in haste, to see the terrible teeth of Satan standing about, as the Scripture [Job 41:5.] saith. From our desert, on Monday after John [27 June] 1530.

Greetings meanwhile to all, next we will send other letters. Martin Luther.

975 Philipp Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. June 26, 1530.

This letter is found in Melanchthon's epist. lib. I., x>. 21; in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 196; in Cyprian's Supplements, p. 181, and in the Oorp. kiel. vol. II, 140.

Translated from the Latin.

We are here in the greatest misery, and must constantly shed tears. Today, the extreme consternation of our minds has been added to, after we had read N. Vitus' letters, in which he indicates that you are so angry with us that you may not even read our letters. Now, my dear father, I do not want to increase my pain with words, but ask you to consider in what place and in how great danger we are.

since we can have no refreshment at all except your comfort. The sophists and the monks run to us every day, and endeavour that they may set the emperor against us. The bishops hate us cruelly from their own impulse. Those who were on our side before are not there now, and we float all abandoned and despised in infinite danger. I therefore ask you to look either to us, who follow your reputation in such important matters, or to the common good, and to read and answer our letters, so that on the one hand you may help us with good counsel, and on the other hand you may give us strong consolation. We have submitted our defence 1) to the Emperor, which I hereby send you to read. According to my insight, it is sharp enough. For you will see that in it I have painted the monks with vivid colors. But now, as I think, it depends on a resolution before the adversaries answer what we want to concede to them on the point of both forms, of the married state, of private mass; the whole trial will revolve around these things. About this answer, and especially about the private mass, which they will hardly drop. This messenger I have sent at my own expense, and the other day already sent a special one, but it came back empty. The adversaries are already taking counsel as to what they want to answer. Therefore all is still in suspense. Farewell. Sunday after John 26 June 1530). Philip.

976 Philipp Melanchthon's Letter to Camerarius. June 26, 1530.

This letter is found in Melanchthon's epist. all Oara "rariurn, p. 139; in Cyprian's Supplements, p. 180, and in the 6orp. Het. vol. II, 140.

Translated into German.

Yesterday, by the grace of God, our confession was presented to the Emperor and publicly read out, and it is said that the princes were uncompromisingly silent and attentive. I changed and improved much of it every day, and would have changed even more if our councils had allowed it; and there is so much missing that I should think it was written too leniently, that I rather fear that some might take offense at our freedom. For before we the imperial secretary Valdesius saw it and judged it to be far too bitter and acrid for the adversaries to bear. You will encounter a horrible mishmash if you read the Apology of my Aristarchus, 1) of whom you write. I cannot be very angry with such judges of words. My mind worries and grieves miserably, not because of our cause, but because of the carelessness of our people. You need not worry on my account, for I command myself to God. Only something special troubles me a lot, but I can only speak of it verbally. Farewell and write to me again. If God would have you read our Apology there, but the Emperor forbids that it be printed. Again, God commands. Philip.

Although we sent a messenger of our own to you yesterday that we apologized to you for our silence, but because Hornung wanted to travel today, we wrote again that we did not miss any opportunity to send letters to you. I cannot say how much we have been saddened by N. Vitus' letter, which tells us how you are so vehemently angry that we have not written often enough so far. Now at no time have we been more in need of your counsel and comfort than now, since in the most dangerous matters we have followed you, as our head, to this place. Therefore, for the sake of the honor of the gospel, I ask you to take care of us, if only for the sake of the common good, which, when you are not at the helm, seems to suffer very heavy storms. Christ allowed himself to be raised up in the little ship that was in trouble. Now we are truly in much greater danger here, in which nothing worse could happen to us as a whole than if you left us. I must not complain of this against D. Brück, that I do not deceive him more. Hitherto we have been so that we have spent much time in weeping. Therefore you must not think that we, as your friends.

1) Aristarchus, a critic of Alexandria; then also in general: a critic.

Our confession has been handed over to the emperor; we have also sent a copy to you, which you will keep with you so that it does not get out. For the emperor has forbidden its publication. I have written to you before that you should inform me, if it will be necessary, how much we can yield to the adversaries. The matters are, as you know, discussed before, but when it comes to the meeting, it will be different from what was thought before. Of the private mass, I think the greatest controversy will be. But I know nothing certain yet. Faber, Eck, even some princes, seek only violence and war. May God disperse the thoughts of the peoples who are eager for war. Hereby God commands and prays for us. Newly translated from the Latin.

M. Philip Melanchthon, the faithful confessor of Christ and true witness, his dearest brother, Martin Luther. 2) Grace and peace in our Lord! I had nothing to write, my dear Philip, only I did not want to let the messenger, or rather this cartload of game, go away without letters. But I think that this week you have been struggling sharply with the evil spirits, and I suppose that this is the cause why Weller and the Schoesser's messenger have not yet returned. I am with you in faith and spirit as much as I can. But I believe that the weak Christ is more with you, as I ask him with sighs and words, which he himself has commanded and given 3) [Matth. 18, 19. f.].

2) This inscription is found after Cölestin and Bud deus in Walch, but missing in De Wette.

3) In Latin: "zuidus i'86 fussit st äöait. Instead of yuidus we have assumed.

28,20.] May the Lord grant that you stand firm in the matter (in statu causae) and do not engage in mutual accusations, for I believe that the adversaries will come out of this by not trusting their cause. But what will be the end if you begin to cover up the abominations of the pope against God and the worldly government? But by the grace of God you will know how to avoid this best.

You should not be concerned about my health. It is indeed unsteady, but because I realize that it is not a natural illness, I bear it all the more steadfastly and despise the blows of Satan's angel against my flesh. If I cannot read and write, yet I can think and pray, and even so make a strong stand against him, then sleep, be idle, play, and sing. Only, my dear Philip, see that you do not labor so in this matter, which is not in your hand, but in the hand of him who is greater than he who is in the world, and out of whose hand no one will snatch it. Let us not let him say in vain [Ps. 127:2.], "To his friends he giveth it sleeping," and [Ps. 55:23.], "Cast thy cause upon the LORD," who quickeneth the dead, and is a comforter of the humble, and a physician of the brokenhearted, the GOD of all comfort, into whose bosom and arms I commend you all, even as he himself hath called you and received you unto the confession of his glory. Greet all and every one in the Lord. From the castle which is full of devils, but in which Christ reigns in the midst of his enemies, on the last day of July, Anno 1530.

Your Martin Luther.

979 Philipp Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. June 27, 1530.

In Cölestin, vol. II, p. 197, and in the 6orx. Hei., vol. II, 144.

Translated into German.

Our confession was handed over last Saturday. Now the adversaries are discussing what they want to do in response: run together, work with united forces, and stir up the princes, who have already had enough.

are taken against us. Eck is making every effort with the Archbishop of Mainz not to investigate the matter, because it is already condemned. Our party is very weak; the number of those against us, on the other hand, is incomparably greater. The Archbishop of Mainz, the Bishop of Augsburg, and the Duke of Brunswick help us, although they do not fight bravely enough. Of the dukes of Bavaria, it was said that they had become more lenient after their confession; nevertheless, they are not inferior to Duke 1) George and Margrave Joachim. These are the fiercest leaders of the other party.

The emperor hath written to Erasmus, summoning him to the Diet. I cannot see what good we can expect from the bitter hatred of our enemies. In the face of so much ignorance on the part of the mob, to whose wrong judgment we are subject, we must take refuge in God alone and expect help from him; only pray to him on our behalf that he may guide our cause and grant us peace. There has been a terrible thunderstorm in Altenburg for three days: the lightning has struck two towers, the castle tower and the church tower, whereupon a great flood has occurred. I was very frightened by this. King Ferdinand has regained the city of Ofen in Hungary, which in my opinion will be a new cause for Turkish war. For the Turks will now be forced to reinstate their ally, to whom they gave the royal title. From Augsburg, June 27, 1530.

XX, p. 185, and (incomplete, with the wrong date "July 9") in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 175. Only in Aurifaber, Chyträus, Walch, and De Wette is the postscript found.

Newly translated from the Latin.

1) "Duke" put by us instead of "Margrave". Because Margrave George is a fellow confessor of the Augsburg Confession.

Grace and peace in Christ! I have read, my dear Philip, your oratorical writing, which washes itself clean because of your silence. But in the meantime I have twice written letters to you, in which I have sufficiently explained the reason for my silence (at least in the last one, which is brought by the messenger who was sent to the prince by our castle). Today your last letters have been delivered to me, in which you remind me of your labors, dangers, and tears in such a way that I seem to be unfairly inflicting suffering upon suffering on you through my silence, as if I did not know this, or if I were sitting here among roses and shared nothing of the sorrows with you. And yet God would that my affairs were such as would permit tears to flow. Yes, even I, if those earlier letters of the Emperor's arrival had not come here in the evening, had decided to send a messenger to you the next day at my own expense, so that I might find out whether you were alive or dead. Magister Veit will testify to this, and yet I believe that all your letters have been delivered to us. For the letters which came late at last of the Emperor's arrival and entry came almost at the same time. But it may have been the ate or some satan, "and have him what he shall have."

I have received your confession (Apologetics), and wonder what you want, since you ask what and how much the papists are to be conceded. With reference to the prince, that is another question, what he might concede if danger threatened him. For my own person, more than enough has been yielded in this confession; if they reject the same, I see nothing more that I can yield, unless I see their reasons and clearer passages of Scripture than I have yet seen. I occupy myself day and night with this matter: I consider it, ponder it, discuss it, and search the whole Scripture, and the complete certainty of faith (ΛΥ-ο^ο/--") in this doctrine of ours continues to grow in me, and I am more and more fortified, "that I will now (whether God wills) let nothing be taken from me, let it be over, as it may."

To the younger prince I had written, as you desire, but I tore up the letter again, fearing I should make this! I am quite well here, for that spirit seems to be abating (that is, broken by the brothers' and the sisters'). I am quite well here, for that spirit seems to have subsided (broken by the brethren and your prayers) which has hitherto beaten me with fists, though I suspect that instead of him another has followed, who wants to weaken my body. But I would rather suffer this tormentor of the flesh than that tormentor of the spirit. And I hope that he who overcame in me the father of lies will also overcome the murderer. "He has sworn death to me, I feel it well; he has no rest, for he has eaten me. If he eats me, he shall eat a purgation, which shall make his belly and ars tight. What is the matter? He that will have Christ will have suffered." It would also be easy for us to rule if we would deny and revile Him [Christ]. It is said [Apost. 14, 22.], "[We must] go through many tribulations [into the kingdom of GOD]." 1) "Now these things are no more words, but are come into work, we may judge ourselves according to them." But He is He who works the end of tribulation for believers with it [1 Cor. 10:13.].

In your letter 2) I dislike that you write that you followed my reputation in this matter. I do not want to be an author in this matter or to be called such, although this could be interpreted correctly, but I do not want this word sautoritas. If it is not at the same time and in the same way your business, I do not want it to be said that it is mine and laid on you. I will conduct it myself, if it is mine alone.

I comforted you in the last letter; grant that God may not be a killer, but a life-giver. What more can I do? You are tormented by the end and the outcome of the matter, because you cannot grasp it with your hands. But if you could grasp it, I would not want to have a part in this thing, much less the original one.

1) The bracketed is put by us instead of "ste. "

2) No. 975, to which this letter is the reply.

Heber sein. God has put this matter into a certain general doctrine (loeuw quevåura Lorarounem), which you do not have in your rhetoric, nor in your philosophy: that is called faith. In this doctrine is all that is not seen, and is not before the eyes [Heb. 11:1, 3]; if any man undertake to make this visible, evident, and comprehensible, as thou dost, let him bear sorrows and tears as the reward of his labour, as thou bearest them away, while we all set ourselves in vain against it. "The LORD hath said that he will dwell in darkness" [1 Kings 8:12.], and "he hath made darkness his tent" [2 Sam. 22:12. Vulg.]. "Whosoever will, let him do otherwise." If Moses had determined to grasp the end, how he might yet escape Pharaoh's host, Israel might have been in Egypt to this day. May the Lord grant you and all of us faith. If we have faith, what can Satan and the whole world do? If then we have not faith, why do we not at least comfort ourselves with the faith of others? For there must be others who believe in our stead, unless there is no longer a church in the world, and Christ has ceased to be with us before the end of the world. For if he be not with us, I pray thee, where is he in the whole race? If we are not the church, or at least a part of the church, where is the church? Or are the Dukes of Bavaria, Ferdinand, the Pope, the Turk, and the like of you the Church? If we do not have the Word of God, who are the people who have it? Therefore, if God is for us, who can be against us? We are sinners and ungrateful, but for that sake He will not become a liar. But we cannot be sinners in this holy and divine thing, though we are wicked in ways far from it. But thou hearest not this, so despondent and weak doth Satan make thee. May Christ heal thee, I pray earnestly and without ceasing, Amen. Greetings to all, for I also cannot write anew to all. I desire that opportunity be given me to come to you, though I have great desire to come even without command and calling. Grace

May God be with you and with all of you, Amen. On the day of St. Peter and Paul [June 29] Anno 1530. Martin Luther.

Postscript.

After I had closed the letter, the thought occurred to me that it might seem to you that I had answered too little to your question 1) how much and how far one could yield to the adversaries; but you also asked too little, you did not indicate what and what kind you think will be demanded of us. I am ready, as I have always written, to grant them all things, if only the gospel alone is left free to us. But that which contends with the gospel I cannot admit. What can I answer otherwise?

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ I do not know at all what I ought to write to you, my dear Philip, for I am troubled by thoughts of your very evil and trivial sorrows, since I know that I am telling a story to a deaf man. This is because you believe yourself alone, but do not believe me or others, to your great misfortune. I will confess the truth: I have been in greater anguish than I hope thou wilt ever be, and I wish no man, not even a man

To those who now rage against us, however wicked and unworthy they may be, that they may become like me. And yet I have often been raised up in these troubles by the word of a brother, sometimes of Pomeranus, sometimes by your word, sometimes by that of Jonas and others. Why then, again, do you not also hear us, who certainly speak nothing according to the flesh or the world, but according to God without doubt through the Holy Spirit? Though we be little, beloved, let not him be little who speaks through us. "If it be a lie that God gave His Son for us, let the devil be a man instead of me, or one of his creatures. But if it be true, what shall we do with our grievous fears, trembling, sorrows, and mourning 2c.? "As if he would not assist us in lesser things, who gave his Son, or as if Satan were mightier than he.

In private battles I am weaker, and thou stronger; but in public ones thou art as I am in private ones, and I in public ones as thou art in private ones (if that which passes between me and Satan can otherwise be called private). For thou despisest thy life, and fearest for the common cause; but I, as for the common cause, am of a very great and unconcerned mind, knowing assuredly that it is just and true, yea, even the cause of Christ and of God himself, which paleth not as one that would be guilty of sin, as I a single bad saint (privatus sanctulus) paleth and trembleth. Therefore 1) I am almost a sure spectator, and respect the threatening and raging Papists for nothing (uon üujus == not so much). If we fall, Christ will fall at the same time, namely, the great ruler of the whole world. And, if he should fall, I would rather fall with Christ than stand with the emperor.

Nor do you alone have this matter upon you. Surely I am faithful with you with sighs and prayers, if God would that I could also be so according to the flesh. For it is also my cause, and even more mine than yours. Nor is it out of

1) Instead of turn at De Wette is to read sinn.

I ask thee, for Christ's sake, that thou mayest not so set aside those divine promises and consolations which it is said [Ps. 55:55], "We will not be moved by the desire of the Lord, but we will be moved by the desire of the Lord," and that thou mayest not be moved by the desire of the Lord. Therefore I beseech thee for Christ's sake, that thou mayest not so set aside those divine promises and consolations, as it is said [Ps. 55:23], "Cast thy concern upon the Lord." [Ps. 27:14.:] "Harp on the LORD, be of good cheer, and undaunted;" and such [promises and consolations] is the book of Psalms and the gospel 2) full [John 16:33.] "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." "It shall not be false, verily I know" that Christ is the overcomer of the world. Why then do we fear the overcoming world as if it were the victor? "Let one bring such a saying upon his knees from Rome and Jerusalem!" But because they abound, are in constant use, and are well known to us, they are held in low esteem among us. "But this is not good." I know this is weakness of faith, but let us pray with the apostles [Luc. 17:5.], "Strengthen us, O Lord, in the faith."

God will also repay the Salzburg tyrant according to his works, who has martyred you so. 3) But he would have deserved a different answer from you, such an answer as I might have given him. "Well, let them do it; they have not yet made it up." They seek (that I fear) to hear the word of Julius Caesar: This they have willed!

But this I write in vain, because you continue, according to your philosophy, to govern these things by reason; that is, you continue, as he says, to be senseless with reason, and kill yourself, and do not at all see that the matter is out of your hand and counsel, nor will it be conducted without your care. And Christ would prevent it from coming into thy hand or counsel, which thou wouldst so stubbornly desire: then would we truly be ruined, and perish suddenly. But "it is said," Seek not after things that are too high for thee [Ps. 131:1. Rom. 12:16.], and [Proverbs 25:27. Vulg.], "A forscher of majesty shall be pressed to the ground by glory," or, as the Hebrew text has it, "He that searcheth hard things." This is on you. The Lord Jesus keep thee, that thy faith fall not away, but increase and overcome, Amen. I pray for thee, have prayed, and will pray, and I doubt not that I am heard, for I feel the Amen in my heart. If what we want will not come to pass, yet something will come to pass that is better. For we wait for a future kingdom, when all things in the world shall have failed us. To Georg Spalatin, his brother in Christ.

Grace and peace in the Lord! You say, my dear Spalatin, that I will not suffer to be called a slacker in writing; but you will also have to suffer it against your will. For from the messenger of Doctor Jonas, by whom you vowed that you would write abundantly both to us and to the Wittenbergers, by the messenger of Doctor Apel, so that we expected forests of letters, and feared that you would become more noisy than our jackdaws [ we have received no letter]. 1) When this messenger of Apel's 2) came, and alone brought the letters of Jonas to Wittenberg, he was asked, "Dost thou not bring letters?" He answered, "No." "How are the gentlemen?" He answered, "Well." About this one thing I immediately brought a complaint against Philip. Afterwards there came a messenger on horseback who had been sent to Torgau, who brought me a letter 3) from the prince himself, and was asked, "Do you bring letters?" He answered, "No." "How are the gentlemen?" He answered, "Well." Next, as a wagon of venison departed from here, I wrote again to Philip; who returned alike empty. Here I began to have sad thoughts, and suspected that you were trying to conceal something evil from me. Fourth, Jobst Nymphen came. To the question, "Do you bring letters?" he answered, "No." "How are the gentlemen?" He answered, "Well." I pass over how often here our Schösser received letters from his brother, the Marshal of Falkenstein, while meanwhile we thirsted and starved for more than three weeks through your kind silence; from whose letters we had to obtain intelligence if we wished to learn anything. Therefore I ask whether you would not say that I was an underachiever if such had happened to you from me? I confess that I was moved with anger and fear, knowing the sorrows of Philip and the plagues of the prince. But I was freed from fear when I heard that it was well with you, but I could not quite believe it. But enough of this, only may you not continue to dispute or think of disputing. Farewell. 1530.

That there the kings, princes, and people rage and rage against the Lord's anointed, I think is a happy omen, and much better than if they flattered. For it follows [in the 2nd Psalm, v. 4.], "He that dwelleth in heaven laugheth at them." But since this our Prince laugheth, I see not why we should weep before them. For he laugheth not at them, but at us, that we may rather laugh at their vain counsels. Only faith is necessary, so that the cause of faith may not be without faith. But

He who began this work certainly began it without our counsel and authority. He has also protected and governed it up to now above and without our council and nobility. It is he also who will complete it and lead it forth without and above our counsel and authority, of that I have no doubt. I know and am sure whom I have believed, for he is mighty to do what we ask and understand, though Philip thinks and desires that he should do it under and according to his counsel, that he may boast, Surely so it must be done, so I would have done it. "Nay, it MUST not be called": so I, Philip. "The 'I' is too small. It is called": So I; I become fine, who I become fine. That's a fine name: "I that become fine." "He is not seen, but he shall be, and we shall see." That's enough of words. Thou fei strong in the Lord, and exhort Philip continually in my name, that he become not God, but fight against the inborn desire for godliness, which was implanted in us by the devil in paradise, for that is not good for us. It thrust Adam out of Paradise, and this alone troubles us also, and deprives us of peace. "We are to be men, and not GOD. This is the summa; it will not be otherwise, or eternal unrest and heartache will be our reward." Farewell in Christ. The last of June, 1530.

983 Luther's Letter to John Brenz. June 30, 1530.

Handwritten in 606. Cstoss.; in 606. len. d. lol. 138 and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 40. Printed in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 201; in Buddeus, p. 123 and dem Jenaer Manuscript; in des Flacius lateinischer Briefsammlung; from the collection of Caspar Sagittarius in Schütze, vol. III, p. 167 and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 55. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 427; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 41; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 167; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 194, and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 172, with the wrong date, July 9, 1530. We have translated according to De Wette.

Grace and peace in Christ! From your letter and that of Philip and the others I recognize, my dear Brenz, that you are also plagued by sorrow in that assembly of idols. But to this you are moved by the example of Philip. For though he is godly concerned about the public peace and the descendants, 1) he does not zeal wisely. As if indeed our forefathers by their care and sorrow had brought it about that we are what we are, and not rather God's wisdom alone, who will also be God and Creator after us, as he was before us, and is now with us. For he will not die with us, or cease to be GOOD fine, who also rules the thoughts. It seemed unto Eli the priest, that the kingdom of Israel was fallen away, after that the ark of the covenant was taken from the Philistines; and so he rather fell away himself: but the kingdom of Israel began then to flourish most [1 Sam. 4]. And when Saul was slain, what could a man think but that the kingdom of Israel was ended? [And when the papists had burned John Hus at Costnitz, nothing was more certain than that the pope would become fine with God, whereas he had never before been so despised as from that time. This I write to you and to the others, so that by the word of Gregory Brück or of anyone among you Philip may cease to be the ruler of the world, that is, to martyr himself. I at least, when I shall be dead or killed by the Papists, will bravely defend our descendants, and take revenge on these cruel beasts righteously and more than I would. For I know that there shall be one that shall say, Where is thy brother Abel?" [Gen. 4:9.] And he shall make them iniquitous and fugitives upon the earth. And what need of many words? Let the emperor, after all, have a dominion shared with GOD. If no [avenger] becomes fine, then we may extinguish the first commandment with the whole gospel. For what need is there to have a God only for this life, which is best for those who have no God? But if there be a God, we shall not have live here alone, but we shall live where he himself lives. If this be true, what, I pray thee, are these angry threats of idols after all, which are now almost not merely dying, but wholly dead? He that made me shall be the father of my son, and the husband of my wife, and the ruler of the commonwealth, and the preacher in my parish, and better than I myself am. Yea, he himself will rule it better, 1) When I am dead, than when I am alive, because I hinder him by my life. For it is written [Ps. 112:2.], "His seed shall be mighty in the earth." And truly, the first commandment has also placed uufere descendants in God's protection, since it says s2 Mos. 20, 6.): "I do mercy to many thousands who love me." These words I believe; though faith is weak, yet I believe. But why do I speak these things to you, who are greater than I in all things by the gift of God? only that I have tried in many ways to see whether Philip, who believes that I am a man and that my words are the words of men, and so is less moved by them, can at least be moved by you, whom he must believe to be men of God. For I do not believe that he is so wrong-headed that if God himself, by an angel sent from heaven, commanded him to be of good cheer, he would despise this command: how much less must he despise us if we all admonish him to do so? And if we are worthy of contempt, yet the Psalms, the Apostles, Christ himself, must not be despised, who shower us with so many sermons, with consolations, with teachings, with admonitions, "Be of good courage, fear not, hope, be ye manly, and be ye strong." If we did not believe these, we would not believe them if all the angels came. This I have written to thee, my dear Brenz, in many words. Be well in Christ, and pray for me.

I have made many words (verdo8atu8 8uin that I say so) about the 118th Psalm, and have called it "the beautiful Confitemini"?)

now it is to Wittenberg under the press. I have used up fifteen sheets of paper in this great quantity of words. I have touched on several lies about Purgatory 3) against the papists, in that I am, as it were, again beginning a new battle against them. 4) The grace of God be with you. This letter is found in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 204; in Buddeus, p. 27; and in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 67. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! This man, Franciscus, who is sent to us from Breslau by Doctor Hess, I commend to you, my dearest Philip. He desires nothing but to see you and speak with you. With me he could not be admitted.

Yesterday I read your confession very carefully, and I like it very much. But it errs and lacks in one thing, that it goes against the Scriptures, since Christ says of himself [Luc. 19:14.], "We would not that this should reign over us;" and it offends against the sentence [Ps. 118:22.], "The stone which the ball-men rejected." What else can you expect, with so great blindness and obstinacy, but that he should be rejected? For they will not grant us the name of "builders," which they arrogate to themselves, and justly, 5) but we must be glorified with the name of those who destroy, scatter, and stir up trouble, that we may be reckoned among the malefactors, since the stone itself was reckoned among the murderers, and condemned. Therefore we have no hope of salvation, but in the Lord alone; he must work miracles, and he will not leave this stone, because it follows: "He is become the corner stone." But this was done by the Lord, not by us; therefore it is a miracle.

985. Luther's Letter to Melanchthon. July 5, 1530.

This letter is found in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 206; in Buddeus, p. 128; and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 68. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! There was nothing to write, my dear Philip, for I have written four times, and believe that the letters have reached thee by and by, but I have not wished to let this messenger go away empty. But all that I wanted, thou hast read in the last letters. I expect my psalm, the Confitemini, from Wittenberg. Now I go about with a sermon exhorting to the schools, or rather that one should keep the children to school ;-). Let me wonder if I have been as verbose before as I seem to be becoming now; unless this verbosity comes from age, as Cicero admits. Otherwise, thank God, we are quite well, and have good hope, not because of your Diet or your counsels, but because of Christ's power and presence, to use Peter's word. They write from Wittenberg that they are praying so diligently in the churches there that I am convinced that something good will be accomplished at this Diet. Greetings to Jonas, Agricola, Spalatin, Brück, the physician Caspar, and all those of us. On July 5, 1530, your Martin Luther.

er's Letter to Conrad Cordatus. July 6, 1530.

Newly translated from the Latin.

1) Namely, in the Confitemini, St. Louis edition, vol. V, 1238 ff.

2) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 416.

Grace and peace in Christ! Here you have, dearest Cordatus, One living, and One not living! Letter, that is, the Hornung (Lebruariura) itself, and my letter to the Bishop sHausmann, from which you can learn all that I now know about this Diet. Therefore I have nothing more to write to you. Jonas writes that he was among the audience when the Confession of ours was read out by Doctor Christian for two whole hours, and he saw the expressions of all, about which he has promised me an oral account. I have here a copy of this confession, but must keep it by order. It was certainly made by the adversaries and extraordinary efforts were made that the Emperor should not admit it and should not hear it; however, it could not be read out publicly before the empire as a whole, so that is where they took it. Then it was handed over by order of the emperor and read out before the whole empire, that is, before the princes and estates of the empire. I am exceedingly glad that I have lived until this hour, in which Christ has been publicly preached by his so great confessors in such a large assembly by this really exceedingly beautiful confession. And the word [Ps. 119:46. Vulg.] shall be fulfilled, "I spake of thy testimonies before kings"; it shall also be fulfilled, "I was not put to shame." For [Matt. 10:32.], "Whoso confesseth me before men, (so saith he that speaketh no lies,) him will I confess before my heavenly Father."

About the other things (I think) you will have learned everything from others. For the splendor of the imperial entry has gone out in print. I am compelled to see, and to grasp with my hands, that GOD is in truth called in the 65th 3) Psalm [v. 3.] a hearer of prayers; this name is rightly and justly attached to Him in all the world. Therefore, continue to pray and to incite all to prayer, especially for the very good emperor, the young man who is worthy of the love of God and of men; then for our no less good prince,

3) De Wette: "78n1. 82." Cölestin: "I> 8. 62."

And he that beareth more crosses, and for Philip, who mourneth with sorrows. If I be called, I will call thee also, doubt it not. The Lord be with thee, amen. From the desert, July 6, 1530.

Your Martin Luther.

987. D. Martin Luther's letter to Cardinal Albrecht, Elector of Mainz, that he wants to advise peace, along with an interpretation of the second Psalm. July 6, 1530.

This letter first appeared in a single edition at Nuremberg (then also at Wittenberg) in 1530, and again in 1546 in quarto under the title: "Ein Brief an den Cardinal Erzbischof zu Menz mit dem andern Psalm. 1530." Then in the German collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 434d; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 72d; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 198; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 142; in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 159; and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 72. Translated into Latin in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 211, and in Buddeus, p. 129. That the first edition came out at Nuremberg, and not, as Walch states, at Wittenberg, we see from the documents no. 989 and 990 in this volume. D. Johann Rühel delivered this letter to the Cardinal; delayed in printing, the same reached Augsburg only on July 22.

To the most reverend in GOD Father, most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Albert, Tit. St. Chrysogen's Cardinal Priest, Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, Primate in Germania, and Administrator of Halberstadt 2c., Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord. Most Reverend, Most Serene, Most Reverend Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I would have preferred to write this letter to E. C. F. G. secretly and in my own handwriting; in this way I was worried that it might come out crazy and then be interpreted to me in some other way, and perhaps lead E. C. F. G. himself into suspicion. That is why I want to make it public by printing it, so that the poisonous, suspicious interpreters can avoid the causes of their interpretation. Humbly request E. C. F. G. to graciously grant me such letter.

2. for since E. C. F. G. is the most distinguished and highest prelate in German lands, the Since I may do more in these matters than anyone else, I have let my thoughts be able to petition E. C. F. G. in particular with this writing, so that I may do my part abundantly in every way, and keep my conscience against God and the world, if perhaps a misfortune and God's wrath would follow (as I truly fear evil), I am hereby excused, as I have sought and offered to help peace in all ways.

3. E. C. F. G. have heard the confession and doctrine of ours, without doubt, together with all others; and I am quite comforted, that she has come forward in such a manner, that she may say with a glad mouth, 1) with Christ her Lord [John 18:23], "If I have spoken evil, prove that it is unjust; but if I have spoken right, why dost thou smite me?" She that shuneth not the light, and knoweth to sing from Ps. 119:46: "I speak of thy testimonies before kings, and pass not with shame." For he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest: for they are done in God.

004 On the other hand, I can well believe that our opponents will not accept such a doctrine, much less dare to change it; neither do I have any hope that we will become one with the doctrine, for their thing cannot stand the light so well, and they are so embittered and inflamed with it that they would rather lead us into the eternal fires of hell, if it were open to them right there, before they give way to us and leave their wisdom. We must let this happen, for we are innocent of their blood.

(5) But I have the thoughts, which is why I am also writing to E. C. F. G.. because our opponents cannot blame our doctrine, and with this confession we clearly testify and prove that we have not taught wrongly nor falsely, and therefore have not deserved that we should be so shamefully condemned, so horribly persecuted, as hitherto, and still happen, if so much could be obtained that our opponents would keep peace, and not so blaspheme and kill the innocent, for the sake of this blameless doctrine, which they themselves have taught.

1) The old editions: "thar"; De Wette: "dar".

must praise, least of all that they stifle against it, and have nothing to say against it; for that they will not be taught by us, nor accept our doctrine, we must let happen; we compel no man, not even to the truth, as they compel to falsehood.

6th Here I ask most humbly, because there is no hope that we (as has been said) will become one in the doctrine, that E. C. F. G. together with others will work to keep that part at peace, and believe what it may, and also let us believe this truth, which is now known before their eyes, and is invented without blame. It is well known that no one should nor can be forced to believe, nor is it within the power of either the emperor or the pope; for even God himself, who is above all power, has never wanted to force a man to believe by force; what then do his wretched poor creatures dare to force, not only to believe, but also to that which they themselves must consider false lies?

(7) But if such peace is not to be obtained, then we shall have the glory of God, and the disgrace of all the world, that we have freely confessed our doctrine in public, and have sought and offered peace, and yet have not obtained it, if we have not been found guilty in our doctrine, nor have we been found culpable. What God and our descendants will say about this will be known, and we must take comfort in the example of the dear apostles, since even the chief priests and princes of the people of Israel (as Lucas says, Acts 4:14, 21) were unable to raise anything against the apostles' deed and word, nor did they have anything to say against them; nor did they keep peace, but because they did not accept the truth, in order that they might be convinced and overcome, they also pushed and persecuted the apostles.

Eight. Yea, how is it with them of late? Where are they now? Where is Jerusalem? Gamaliel arose among them, and gave them counsel that they should keep the peace, and let the apostles do it, if they would not accept it: but it was of no avail. Would that God, E. C. F. G., or whoever he was, were now also a Gamaliel, who proposed such counsel of peace to the others, and he asked them if perhaps God would grant them mercy, so that they would cease their raving and not fight so stubbornly against their conscience and against God. It is the best counsel that one can have in this matter, and Lucas did not want to write such examples so diligently for nothing. It is certainly a sin in the Holy Spirit to dispute the truth we have recognized. Otherwise we would have sin enough, but we should not also have the sin of the Holy Spirit upon us.

009 But they hearken not unto this, neither do they hearken: they will go, when the Jews are gone. But if perhaps some could be saved, that they would not lead with them, but would accept and follow the faithful counsel of Gamalieli, then E. C. F. G. would do no small service here. Dear God, such teaching does not harm you; it keeps peace and teaches peace, lets you remain what you are, also teaches that everything should be left to you and nothing should be taken from you; this alone should sufficiently move you to peace, although otherwise the truth itself would not do so. Yes, she truly helps to preserve you all, and has done so up to now. Let her then sing: gui rotriduoduvt inilli rvala pro donis, aävorsavtur nülli, then it is not fine, and not good for you all, that she must sing it of you clergymen, and complain about you.

010 But if neither peace nor concord follow, neither Gamalieli's counsel, nor the apostles', nor the Jews' examples, help: then let that depart which will not abide, and be angry with him that will not leave it: he shall find wrath and strife enough left for him to wrestle after. In the meantime let us sing with the apostles and disciples, which I know they will not refuse us.

V. i-3. Why do the nations rage, and the peoples make up vain poems? The kings of the earth are rebellious, and the princes contend with one another against the Lord and his anointed, saying: Let us break their bands, and cast away their cords from us.

1) This superscription is found in the Wittenberg edition and in the Jena edition.

How kings and princes now rage against the Lord and against his known truth, and seek to break his bands, and to be caught and taught by him, you all see for yourselves; but that such raging is in vain is not to be seen now, but by and by, for it follows hereafter:

(v. 4, 5) He that dwelleth in heaven mocketh them, and the LORD mocketh them. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and shall terrify them in his fury.

Such things are not seen, neither are they believed; but they shall feel them, and it shall come to pass. So it will be seen how vain their raging has been, how finely they have broken the bonds of the Lord and suppressed his word. But to us, who believe these things, and know that they must come to pass, it is comforting and pleasant. For when kings and rulers have long raged, and have poured out, and have torn, and have cast down, they will make our king sit down, as follows:

(v. 6, 7) But I have set my king upon my holy mountain Sion. I will preach of the sentence, The Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.

Let kings rage here, let princes rage, let pagans throw themselves, the king sits there, and is a son at home. Dear angry nobles, let him sit a while longer. If you will not let us have peace, I pray you, for God's sake, let this king sit, and not pull him down so soon as you think. Or, if he must come down, my dear, send him a letter of feud first, that he may know your cruel anger and wrath; perhaps he will arm himself with debris and fortifications, that he may remain before you, at least until this Diet is over, or your anger and displeasure are abated.

This king of ours also wills to be a priest, preaching a new proposition, that he is the Son of God, and that he is to be believed. But if I were kings and princes, we would forbid him to preach, lest he should put us out of our guns, 1) and with his

1) "Tie rifle" [Gewähr] == the legal possession. (Dietz.)

...and in one sentence destroyed our own doctrine and ancient custom. Huh, to him, quickly! let him be silent, as a heretic. But see otherwise with that ye offend not a priest, and the 8i suaäsnts give you the thunder and lightning; for there is a great bishop who hath ordained him and commanded him to preach, who is called HErr, and hath given him a format, which is called Noli ms tanZsrs, and thus reads:

V. 8, 9: Cry unto me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the end of the world for thine own possession. Thou shalt smite them with the scepter of iron; thou shalt break them as pots.

Who ever heard a greater lie in his life? The heathen are the inheritance of angry kings, and the world is the possession of fierce princes, and it is evident that they do with it as they please, but with their own. All their thoughts and actions, especially against this king and priest, are as if they had learned to walk from crabs, or wanted to teach crabs to walk, even though this king does not have a stick in the whole world. But be ashamed, and hear what follows:

V. 10. And now, ye kings, be wise; be ye chastened, ye judges of the earth.

Thus shall kings and princes be addressed; what shall that become? Such a shameful, blasphemous thing is never spoken from the earth: shall kings be wise? Thinkest thou then that they are fools? Shall judges be chastened? Thinkest thou then that they are children at school? Well, kings are wise beforehand; they have laws, and laws of the land, and lawyers, and counsellors, and know what they ought to do. Judges, too, have laws, customs, manners, and measures, and know well what they ought to judge, to judge, and to keep. This psalm is certainly a heretic, reviling kings, blaspheming judges, and acting as a rebel against the authorities and all their rights and customs, wanting to drive them out of the old rule. To this end, she scornfully says, "You kings, you judges," as a lord does to his servant, you Hans, you Peter, as if he thought them nothing at all, and were all his own, like a cow or a goose.

Yes, my dear fellow, he confesses that kings and judges have reason, rights, and wisdom, for there cannot be a king or a judge who does not have law and justice in the land. But with this verse he throws them all under this king, together with their rights, customs, reason, and whatever wisdom and authority they have, and says: "It is not enough for them to have what they have; no matter how beautiful the law or customs may be, they should become fools and children against this king and priest, listen to him, and let themselves be taught, take his word for master, go over everything, and rule.

Forasmuch then as the pope, as well as the emperor, and the king, are not over this king, but must abide among the judges of the earth: so his decree and doctrine also shall be fool and child against this king's word and doctrine, and shall not judge by it, but be judged and taught by it.

But now at Augsburg they will master and pattern this verse differently, so that it will read: And now, thou king of Sion, be wise, thou judge of heaven, be thou chastened. For thou art a fool and a child against us: we must judge and establish what thou shalt hold to be true, or not. And what we do not judge, or set in judgment, or confirm, let it be commanded thee that thou hold it to be true, or else be cast down, and burned with the heretics. This will certainly be the fate of this king, for they truly do not want to be deprived of the assurance that they have been masters and judges of God's word until now. But what will this king say to this, who also sits in judgment, and will be unmastered and unjudged, but only master and judge? Let him take care of them, and he will do so, as follows:

Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son, that he be not angry, and that ye perish not in the way: for his wrath shall soon come on. Blessed are they that put their trust in him.

There it is, that whosoever will not hear the word of Christ, but shall master it, shall perish in wrath, and that same very soon, that he will not

...hemmed in. Let us serve him, and not force his word to serve our heads. Let us kiss him, let us owe him, let us not subject Christ or his word to our pride; he will not suffer it, and that is all very well.

(11) I will humbly inform C.F.G. of this, whether God will grant grace through your diligence and work, so that the blasphemy will be less; if not, that peace will be established. For the fact that the pope boasts with his own, in a note that is printed, that the emperor will restore and supplement everything to him, I know that he will miss that; For what would that be but that we should recant all that we have ever taught, even this present delivered confession, which you yourselves must hold to be right, and praise against it all the former lies, which you all yourselves much confess, and charge upon us all the innocent blood shed by your part. Yes, dear pope and papists, give us Leonhard Kaiser again, and all whom you have innocently strangled, all the souls whom you have seduced with lies, all the money and goods that you have stolen by cheating, all the honor that you have stolen from God by blaspheming, then we will act of restitution. It shall be written in a history that the pope and his papists may insolently and publicly desire such blasphemous things, as if they were vain lumps in the German land, and in the imperial diet vain monkeys, and all the princes who do it with them, that they should be an eternal stench among our descendants, for which one must spit and lick.

(12) But the devil seeks something else with it. Would to God that our masters would all pay attention to this. We Germans will not stop believing the Pabst and his whales until they bring us, not into a sweat bath, but into a blood bath. If German princes fell one into another, that would make the Pabst, the Florentine fruit, merry, that he might laugh in his fist, and say, There, you German beasts, would not have me for Pabst, so have that. O great love and loyalty he has to the emperor, as he proved before Pavia, when he went against the emperor. He prefers Germany still more, that he demands the emperor from Hispania (for who could have such prac-tik?), and then crown him without the presence of the German princes, according to the Bull. 1) I am not a prophet, but I beg all of you gentlemen to be careful, and do not let yourselves think that you are dealing with men when you deal with the pope and his people, but with vain devils; for there are also vain devils behind them, that I know. May God Almighty help you that all may be at peace, amen.

13. hereby I will have commanded E. C. F. G. in God's grace, and what I can do with prayers, serve him faithfully, and E. C. F. G. in God's grace. C. F. F. G. will graciously grant me this letter. I cannot leave it alone, I must also care for poor, miserable, abandoned, despised, betrayed and sold Germany, to which I do not wish any harm, but all the good that I owe to my dear fatherland. ### 988 Luther's Letter to Melanchthon. July 19, 1530.

This letter is found in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 231 d; in Buddeus, p. 157; in Chyträus in the Latin edition, p. 149, and in the German, p.244; in DeWette, vol. IV, p. 99, and incompletely and with a wrong date (July 9) in Walch. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! Although you do not write to us, my dear Philip, I write so that I may surpass you in favor and burden you with envy by preceding you in a superfluous good work (opere supererogationis). But thou seest that the matter is going to a similar end as it was at Worms, namely, that it shall suffer the emperor to be the judge. Thus Satan always fiddles on one string, and this artist of a thousand has only this one powerless strength against Christ. Dar-

1) Document No. 893.

I have written more extensively to all the princes, and you will be better advised in this matter. I see, thank God, nothing yet in the adversaries but mere threats, but threats against the LORD and his anointed, which David calls vain, who was not only a mighty despiser of threats, but also the conqueror of Goliath's strength. Now if the proverbs be true, then this also is true: He that dieth for fear shall be buried with farts. 2) Although it is German, it is still valid. But with what kind of bells (combos) will one have to ring to thee, who is overcome not merely by others, but by thyself? We may hear threats, and nothing else but threats, but they are threats of stubble and reed, whose thoughts the Lord knows, and behold, they are void. But if war and violence should indeed ensue, it has not yet begun, and in the meantime something may happen; and if it should indeed begin, it has not yet progressed; and if it should progress, it has not yet conquered. That a war should be stirred up by them at this time, I cannot even conceive by human reason, unless they want to perish altogether. 3) The other day, about sixty peasants began to gather here anew, and also attempted to take Hohenstein Castle by night (so our captains tell us ^praolooti), so that you can see that it is necessary, even in the presence of the Emperor, to take all precautions against rebellion: what would happen if they aroused a war? But the messenger is already hastening at the Prince's command, and you have not written. I will write to the others at another time. Be strong in the Lord. Amen. Grace and peace! I am sending you the letter to the Bishop of Mainz, 1) my dear Wenceslaus, and would like you to give this copy, if you can, to Georg Rotmeyer for printing, for whom you once wrote to me. If he should not undertake it, then you may give it to the printer Wolfgang at St. Lorenz; but I would like the publication to be accelerated. As soon as the copy is finished, you may send it immediately with this enclosed letter by an occasional messenger to O. Johann Rühel, for to him I write that he should take this letter and the copy and hand them over to the Mainzer. I beseech thee, do not take it amiss that thou art thus weighted by me. I hear that the adversaries are pressing (p0886880rium) for the right of possession (which we have always suspected), but in vain. Greet the D. Abbot, Spengler and all those of us, greet also your vine with its lovely grapes. From Coburg, on the day of Margaret [July 13], Anno 1530, Yours, M. Luther.

Dear dear brother-in-law! I have sent out a letter to your Lord, the Cardinal at Mainz, through the printer at Nuremberg, and have asked Doctor Wenceslaum to send you the copy. When it arrives, I ask you to hand it over to your master for my sake, with my request that S. C. F. G. will accept it with grace, and to indicate my heartfelt good opinion, as you know well how to do. I also ask E. A. (as I am sure you do diligently) to admonish S. C. F. G. faithfully that S. C. F. This letter is found handwritten in the Ooü. Olo88th; in the Ooä. Jen. b, lob 130 and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 55. Printed in Buddeus, p. 144 and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 85. Incomplete in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 210b. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! In these days we have received many letters from you, dearest Jonas, and since that time of silence we have written again four times, even five times; this is the sixth time we are writing. Your letters have been extremely pleasant to me. I see indeed that now, after the statement of the contents (arZuinentuni), the preface (proloZum) of the Diet will be recited; then follows the meeting and what matters (6pitu8i8), or the crisis; but those have a sad, we a happy outcome (comieucam catatroxlion) to expect. Not, of course, that a concord in doctrine will ever be established; for who can hope that Belial will be united with Christ? unless, perhaps, the

(But here, too, this adverb must be "perhaps," and perhaps too much "perhaps"), but that I wish and almost hope that the discord in doctrine may be set aside and a political harmony made. If this comes about through Christ's blessing, then enough has been done and directed at this Diet. For first of all, what is greatest, Christ is loudly proclaimed by the public and glorious confession, and is known in the light and in their faces, so that they cannot boast that we have fled, that we have feared, or that we have concealed our faith. I only regret that I was not able to be present at this beautiful confession, and it has happened to me quite the same fate as it did to the highest warlords before Vienna a year ago, that no cooperation or victory could be attributed to them in the resistance and defense of the city against the Turks. But it fills me and comforts me that in the meantime my Vienna has been defended by others. The second is that it is certain that we have always sought peace, and, as the Psalm [Ps. 34:15] says, we have said after it, that we have offered it, asked for it, while those have sought nothing but war, murder, and destruction, but to a very certain testimony that we are children of God, since we are peaceable. If we now attain the third thing, that we part in worldly peace, then we have clearly overcome Satan in this year. This is not my predestination about this kingdom day, but it is my thoughts. For how can I hope that the adversaries will do any good? What can I hope from Caesar, however good he may be, since he is possessed? Christ lives 1) and sits at the right hand, not of Caesar (for then we would have perished long ago), but at the right hand of God. This is something incredibly great. But I have a desire for this unbelievable thing, and I am completely willing to die on it. And why should I not live on it? If only God wanted Philip to do this with me, at least, he would have done it.

What matter if David lie?" Unless Augsburg alone began to reign in this month, or to escape from the right hand of GOD, so that it must be believed that Christ was cast down there by the Sacramentirans, and David was corrupted by the Papists. If that happened, we do not know it here at Gruboc. Therefore write this to us, my dear Jonas, and I will seek another Christ and invent another David for myself, who will not so deceive and mock me with empty words. But away with this jest, which is blasphemous, but not blasphemous in earnest. Thou art well pleased in Christ, and believe with us, as thou doest, that Christ is the King of kings, and the Lord the sovereign. To the venerable man in Christ, Mr. Justus Jonas, the confessor of Christ at Augsburg, his superior in the Lord.

Grace and peace in the Lord! I am sitting here, my dear Jonas, thinking and caring for you, and I suspect that our cause has already come to a meeting, and at the same time I hope that it has the prospect of a very good end; only your courage must not sink, and the more hopeful they are, the less you must give way. For I believe that they are firmly under the delusion that you, bowed down, will yield everything if they order or propose anything through the Emperor. For who does not see that the emperor himself does nothing here, but is driven and guided? If you now stand firm, and yield nothing, you will compel them to change their minds, and turn their deliberations into wrath. When this is done, our cause will more easily suffer violence and threats than those satanic wiles which I have hitherto feared most. You may after all urge the right of possession (po88688orium): 1) we too want to urge that they restore to us Leonhard Kaiser (Ls^sr) and many others whom they have killed in the most shameful way; let them restore so many souls whom they have ruined with their godless teaching; they shall restore the so many goods which they have robbed with fraudulent indulgences and other deceptions; they shall restore the glory of God which is defiled by so many blasphemies; they shall restore the purity of the Church which is abominably defiled in persons and customs. And who can enumerate all? Let us then also deal with the right of possession. But it has pleased me exceedingly that after God's decree they have begun to be so nonsensical that they are not ashamed to advance this ground. The one who so afflicts and disgraces them, that they think these shameful and unrighteous things are beautiful and reliable, continues still further. This shall be the beginning and the portent of the hand of GOD which will assist us. Thus I comfort Grace and true peace of Christ! I believe, my dear Philip, that you now see from experience that Belial can in no way be united with Christ, nor can there be any hope of harmony as far as doctrine is concerned. I have written to the prince about this, 3) that our cause could not suffer the emperor to be a judge. And now we see what the letter containing the so gracious citation 4) intended. But perhaps the matter had long since advanced before my letter came, which I also thought of at the time I wrote it. But at least for my own person, I will not give in a hair's breadth, or allow the matter to be brought back to the old state (i-Wtitui); I would rather expect all extreme danger, since they continue so stubbornly. The Emperor may do what he can. But I wish to know what you have done...

...you have. I have asked the Lord, who has helped me infinitely better than I have. But since those deceitful devils are thus playing their game with the promise of a concilium, I too would like to play my game with them at the same time, by appealing from their threats to the concilium, which is nothing and will never be held, so that we may have peace in the meantime. As yet I fear nothing of violence or their violent hand. Christ tempteth us yet thus, who is mighty in us weak; and in this way is he glorified in the assembly of the saints, and in no other way; "there shall be no other way out." I have nothing else to write in this solitude. I would that thou wouldest not be troubled by this victory and glorification of the enemy, but wouldest fortify thyself against it by the power of the strength and might of him who raised up Christ from the dead, and will make us alive and raise us up with him. For the wicked must be made green as the grass [Ps. 92, 3.], and the enemies of the Lord honored and exalted, that they may perish and wither for ever, as the Psalms [Ps. 37, 2. 129, 6.] testify. If the duke George were not so wanton, how could he be our enemy? But you are intent on other things, for this reason you do not allow what is mine; therefore you have no peace, and to the future and indeed imaginary evils you add at the same time the present futile cross. Christ (I pray) strengthen and sustain thee, amen. From the desert, on the day of St. Margaret 13. July 1530.

C. How the Elector of Saxony was denied the imperial feud out of hatred for the Lutheran religion.

994 The Emperor's notice to the Electorate of Saxony by Count Palatine Frederick and Count Henry of Nassau, July 16, 1530, that the Emperor had misgivings about granting the fiefs to the Elector.

From Müller's History of the Protestation of the Protestant Estates, lib. III, cax. 22, p. 671.

Saturday after Margarethä kais. Maj.'s deputies, named Count Palatine Frederick, Count Henry of Nassau, Rogendorf, King's Maj. Court Master, and Mr. Jörg Truchsess, Captain, have notified our most gracious lord of the following opinion by order of Imperial Maj. Maj., concerning the three articles, namely: the fiefs over the chur of Saxony, confirmation of the marriage ordinance over the lands of Jülich and Cleve, and the market in the city, as it is called, would have fallen to them. After having been excused the great business which in the meantime has occurred to Caif. Maj. had happened, therefore Her Maj. could not have given an answer sooner to His Electoral Grace for the sake of the above-mentioned articles: His Imperial Maj. would have remembered that the market in the city had been lost. Maj. would have remembered how graciously her ancestors showed themselves towards the House of Saxony and His Lordship's Grace. ancestors, that her Maj. would also be inclined to act in such a manner towards his Elector. Grace. But since it has come to pass that his Elector's Grace has been rejected by the faith and by her. His Grace has renounced the faith of Her Imperial Majesty and others. Majesty and others, as then the signature of the delivered writings, in which his Electoral Grace confesses to such doctrine. to such doctrine; moreover, that also his Elector Palatine's Gn. relatives in the next handed over writing to take an alliance from it, though one would not know the same. Thus it also reaches the Emperor's Majesty. Maj. that his Electoral. The same is also reported to His Imperial Majesty that His Electorate should have entered into an understanding with the Confederates, and that this, as usual, should have broken out sooner than it might have been carried out; as a thing would not be so small if it were to come to light; that Her Majesty found it a grievance that such a thing should have been carried out in her absence, and that it should have been attached to those 1) who were objectionable to His Imperial Majesty and new to him. Maj. repugnant, and to innovate in faith. Also it would have been contrary to her Imperial Maj. Maj. edict. For even though there were grievances in matters of faith, it should nevertheless, if it were wrong, have been done by the whole of Christendom, and at their discretion. But since Imperial Maj. Maj. finds that my most gracious lord wishes to insist on the articles handed over and the doctrine contained therein, and does not intend to deviate, and her Imperial Maj. Maj. also have a soul and conscience, and would not gladly fight against the Holy Scriptures, since their Imperial Maj. Maj. is the protector and handler of the church, therefore our most gracious lord should not allow himself to be separated from the faith and her Maj. in such a way, and have sought an alliance: then her Maj. will not be pleased to reject the Fief of His Elector. Gn., because they do not know what should be provided for his churfürstl. His Elector's Grace. Where, however, his elector. and do not give cause for this, then the Imperial Majesty wants to take action against his electors. Majesty would graciously hold against his electoral... Graciously with it. If, however, my most gracious lord should wish to persist in this, and remain in the faith as it was before his age and for more than 20 or 30 years, then his electoral graces will also give cause not to grant the regalia. Cause not to lend the regalia, could also not consider that they would do it with conscience. Whereupon his Electorate. His Electors would like to be heard, on which their minds would finally rest. But the other articles, although they may be done out of his Majesty's good will, his Electors have given cause for this. ...have given cause to induce their Imperial Majesty... Maj. to it. But without this, Imperial Maj. Maj. would be in no other mood to behave towards his Electoral Grace. His Elector's Grace, as his Imperial Maj. Maj.'s ancestors have done and kept.

Most Sublime, Most Great Emperor, Most Gracious Lord! To the remonstrance, so your Imperial Maj. Maj. by the high and well-born and noble 2c., your kais. Maj. decreed to me on Saturday last after Margaret, concerning three articles, namely 1) the fiefs over the Church of Saxony; 2) confirmation of the marriage ordinance over the lands of Jülich, Eleve and Berg; 3) and concerning the market at Gotha, I have asked for your consideration. And do Your Imperial Maj. Maj. this most humbly distant report.

Crster article, concerning the enfeoffment of the empire.

First of all, for the sake of the aforementioned fief, so that Your Imperial Majesty may graciously hear the reason and cause. Maj. may graciously hear the reason and cause thereof. Maj. know that the bull in gold, on account of the Electors' descendants, which Your Imperial Maj. Maj. graciously confirmed and confirmed, clearly decreed that if a secular prince dies without male heirs, the same dignity shall then pass to his eldest brother; for which reason, after the death of my dear brother, Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony, the Electorate of Saxony has been bequeathed to me. Moreover, Your Imperial Majesty Maj. has granted me, together with the said my brother, the fiefs of Saxony, together with all their regalia, in accordance with the contents of your Imperial Maj. Maj. fief letter, and according to the enclosed article, signed by your imperial maj. Maj. gave to my brother at the Diet of Worms, in accordance with the aforementioned Bull, and has graciously entrusted me with his love, on her death, without heirs of a corporeal fief. If, after my brother's death, it had been my duty to continue the feud, I had no lack of it, for almost in the first six months after my brother's departure, I had been in the regiment ordered by Your Imperial Majesty. Maj.'s regiment, for the sake of such fiefs and regalia, in accordance with the imperial order. And since I, by virtue of an over-sent Muthzeddul, have referred the matter to Your Imperial Maj. Maj. with this, and for this reason I have sent two of my counsellors to your Imperial Maj. in Hispania for your most humbly submission. Maj. in Hispania: so your Imperial Maj. Maj. have given me a gracious indult for two years. Maj. graciously and specially to go to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's arrival in the Empire, graciously granted me such fiefs and regalia, according to the copies hereof, signed B. The same indult has been granted to me by His Imperial Majesty. Majesty has granted me the same indult by the encouragement of E. kais. Maj. Vice-Chancellor, my friend, the Bishop of Costnitz and Hildesheim, has given me the same indulgence for another year, with the same gracious and imperial promises to grant me the said fiefs on the occasion of His Majesty's arrival in the Empire of the German Nation. M. arrival into the Empire of the German Nation, contents of the enclosed copy, signed 0. Thus I have also, for the sake of my most humble diligence, sent, in addition to the most reverend ones, my grandparents and special ones, Count Wilhelm of Nassau and Count Wilhelm of Neuenar, my councilor and servant, Hansen von Dolzigk, next to E. kais. Majesty to Insbruck, to whom E. kais. M. has given this gracious and imperial answer for the sake of such fiefs. Imperial answer that E. kais. Maj. would also do the same to me and hand them over if Her Majesty would come here to Augsburg. After all this, I will next allhie with E. kais. M. for this purpose, I would not have received a prompt answer, much less that some speech or explanation would have been necessary because of this fief.

Disputation should have been proposed, with E. kais. Maj.; but since I can well state that with E. K. Majest. I am badly supported by my unfavourables, which I (whether I am to blame for them) place in God's hands: so to my great need E. K. M. I have not refrained from making such a most humble reminder, whereby E. K. Maj. Maj. 'has already enfeoffed me with my brother, on the death of my beloved, by her Maj.'s sealed letter of feoffment, has also given me written sealed consent for further enfeoffment after the death that has occurred, and next to Insbruck has given final permission to graciously grant me the fiefs here again. And I ask again, in all humility, and most humbly, that His Imperial Majesty will grant me, together with my heirs and co-beneficiaries, on the clear and bright, also completely undisputable, prescriptions and pardons of His Imperial Majesty. Maj. and most gracious promises, graciously and without delay lend me the fiefs and regalia of the Electorate of Saxony, and also register them with my deprecators, because my dear brother, most blessed, by such justice and dignity of the Electorate of Saxony, E. Kais. M., special glory, indeed not least to this her kaiserl. And to the same my disfavored joy, that now, as my brother's heir, I shall encounter such entry for the sake of the Saxon churl, I neither move nor let it be deterred. That I also ask Your Imperial Majesty most humbly... M. most humbly request and application to confirm the above marriage vow, but male to his presumed rights without damage, has happened before and also now for the causes which my sister-in-law and sister-in-law of Jülich and Eleve, and I, E. Imperial. Maj. by my envoys in Hispania, by virtue of our mutually sealed Instruction, have at length indicated and humbly reminded; and especially on account of the most gracious promise, which H.R.M. has given to my brother, and subsequently to me, by her secretary, Johann Hannarten, on H.R.M.'s Credence and Instruction. Maj. credence and instruction among others in this form. As namely: because E. kais. Maj. has decreed the marriage between her Majesty's sister, now Royal Wife of Portugal, and my son, Johann Friedrichen, by virtue of and according to the contents of the written and sealed marriage contract, of which His Imperial Majesty is undoubtedly aware. Maj. know without a doubt, previously established, do not wish to execute, for the reasons stated, that E. kais. M., if my brother or I were to marry my son elsewhere myself, will take care of it with gracious advice,

I have a sealed letter, which I still have with me, together with the sealed instructions for his courtship. Since now, according to the will of the Almighty, a marriage has taken place, with such a marriage ceremony as has been reported to E. K. M., between my son, Duke Johann Friedrichen, and my wife Sibyllen, my first-born daughter of Eleve and Jülich, and his love, together with the same husband, and I, E. Kais. Maj. confirmation and acknowledgement no other, nor further, than male to his supposed rights without detriment, as before and recently at Insbruck at E. Majesty's arrival by my council and servant. and servant, Hansen von Dolzigk, and handed over in writing: so I ask Your Imperial Highness once again in all subjection. M. again with all humility and request that E. kais. Maj. will, in consideration of the aforementioned most gracious and imperial promise, also graciously consider the manifold faithful services of the Houses of Saxony, Jülich and Eleven, and on the other hand, at their aforementioned gracious request, with such requested confirmation, the same with confirmation of the requested fairs in my city of Gotha, after no one may complain of any due disadvantage therein; as then Your Imperial Majesty has previously decreed at Insignia. Majesty has also handed over the causes of such a defeat in writings, as my most gracious Lord and Emperor, and as my Imperial ancestors have done. M. ancestors have done, and in all this to E. kais. M. again my most submissive confidence, also graciously show.

The other article, concerning faith.

As also Your Imperial Majesty Majesty had me make a number of burdensome announcements on account of my faith, Your Imperial Majesty knows that they have required me, as well as other estates, to make such disputes at this Imperial Diet. Maj. know that they have required me, and as far as the faith is concerned, with such a letter, as well as other estates, that at this Imperial Diet, in order to put an end to such disputes, to refrain from unwillingness, and to surrender the previous insanity to Christ our Saviour, it should be acted in such a way that only each one's discretion, opinion and opinion between ourselves should be heard, understood and considered in love and kindness, and that these should be brought to a unified Christian truth and compared. Wherefore I, and several princes and cities, owe obedience to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, in obedience to their Imperial. Majesty. and the presentation that has been made, our most humble submission to your Imperial Majesty.

I have handed over to you, in Latin and German, by means of simplified scripture, the order and confession as taught and preached in my lands and in your own, and by your superiors, and have signed the same to us, as was proper. I have also, together with the aforementioned signatories, offered in the preface to the delivered document that we would gladly converse with other princes, rulers, and estates in convenient and uniform ways, and that we would unite them as much as is always possible for equality, so that our mutual arguments and afflictions may be dealt with between ourselves in love and kindness, and that we may be led to one true religion, as we all are and contend under one Christ. Nor shall there be anything in any of us that could or would serve Christian unity with God and conscience. The same, and that I want to compare myself Christianly in everything that may always happen with God and conscience, I hereby offer to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, I hereby humbly and abundantly submit to a common and willingly free Christian concilium, and I hope to God Almighty that in such a conversation in love and kindness, or in the indicated concilium, I shall never again find myself in disagreement with divine holy Scripture, that I, by my and my co-religionists' signed articles and instruction of the doctrine among us, have convinced myself of the truth of God, and of Your Imperial Majesty as supreme protector of the Church. Majesty, as the supreme protector and protector of the Church. If I can also be informed by divine holy Scripture that I or my princes should hold or teach that which is contrary to God and to fine divine Scripture and order, I will (whether God will it), as no doubt the others of my kinsmen will also do, hold and show myself in such a way that no one shall be noted by His Imperial Majesty as yet as being against God. as if, solely on account of my own obstinacy and outside the compulsion of my conscience, I had the desire and will to disassociate myself from the truth and order of God and the holy Christian Church in some way, and should no longer be willing to unanimously believe according to God's word, order, and command, and to adhere to the holy Christian Church. Therefore, it is above all necessary to know and hear which articles the others intend to contest, and to hear against them with a Christian and urgent report, as we have offered to do at the end of these articles, also to hear whether, by the help of the Almighty, such articles, which have been disputed or wanted to be disputed, can be brought to a unified Christian truth, according to their content.

Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Christian and praiseworthy decree, according to divine holy scripture. Scripture, now be conducted at this Imperial Diet. 1) For although in everything that can always be with God and conscience (so that Ew. K. Majest. (that I may be held to the most humble service, honor, and favor), I am most humbly willing and obliging in everything that can always be with God and God's will (that I may be held to the most humble service, honor, and favor), unselfishly willing and obliging in life, limb, and property; but since these are matters that concern God's word and honor, and my conscience and soul's salvation, and I have read the doctrine that is preached in my lands, and as I, together with the others of my kinsmen, have read the same in Latin and German writings before E. K. Majesty and the Estates, I am not willing and obliging to be held before this Imperial Diet. I, together with the others of my kinsmen, have confessed the same in Latin and German writings before His Majesty and the Estates of the Realm, and hereby confess once again, together with all that adheres to the [Confession] by virtue of the divine Scriptures, that I consider and believe it to be Christian, right, and of God's pure and true word, order, and command, and that no one has proved the contradiction from the holy divine Scriptures, that the same confession we have handed over is not founded in the divine holy Scriptures, and in God's word, order, and command: therefore, His Majesty the Emperor, as a most noble Emperor, has declared that the confession we have handed over is not founded in the divine holy Scriptures, and in God's word, order, and command, as a most praiseworthy Emperor, graciously accept how it would be possible for me and my kinsmen before God, Your Majesty and the whole world, to refrain from such a well-known doctrine as God's word, order and command, without a frightening and damning violation of my conscience, and without the greatest blasphemy, that I should not consider God's word, order and command, as the eternal and imperishable truth, to be God's word, order and truth, as Your Majesty, and without a doubt, Your Majesty, would have me do. Majesty, and no doubt have been moved to desire me by too much zealous persistence on the part of those who oppose me. Since we then hold that this doctrine and order is God's word and command: then all opponents must judge for themselves and confess on behalf of me and my fellow relatives that it is not our duty to refrain from it with such a conscience; that it is also our duty and duty before God and all men, and that we have been and are guilty of accepting and recognizing God's word, doctrine, command and order, and of permitting it in our lands and territories, unhindered by what has been introduced or broken in against it by human order or long repugnant use. For, as in my confession and in the confessions of my kinsmen, in more than one place, it is also indicated, that in matters concerning His word, order, and commandment (in which case we are now) God gives us the right to accept the word, order, and commandment of God.

He is to be obeyed more than men. To this end, the sayings of the Fathers, which are found in many places in spiritual law, and in part in our confession, testify that God's word and God's law and order may not be changed or altered by the ordinances of men or by unpleasant customs, no matter how long they have been in force and have stood. To this end, all the rights described above, where anyone mandates and orders against the holy and natural rights of God, decree and allow that such rescripts, ordinances and mandates are to be considered invalid and unconstitutional. From this, Your Majesty may assume how justly my kinsmen and I are complained of to Your Majesty, as if we had disobeyed Your Majesty in this matter. Moreover, Your Majesty knows that my dear brother, Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector, Blessed, has reported his complaint to Your Majesty at Worms on account of the Edict, which has also been presented to Your Majesty at Imperial Conventions, especially at Worms. Imperial Congresses, especially at Nuremberg and at Speier the first, for reasons which have been unanimously drawn up in an Instruction by Princes, Princes and Estates, and which have agreed to send to His Majesty in Hispania for this purpose. Therefore His Majesty..., as the head, who is set before Christendom as a temporal governor and authority by God the Almighty, will not be moved to do so by anyone, as His Majesty has graciously informed me, and has pleased me not a little in this most important matter, that His Majesty does not like to go against the Holy Scriptures. would not willingly act contrary to the Holy Scriptures, that His Majesty should disrupt, change, and bring about that which God, as the supreme Commander and the eternal Wisdom, surpassing all men's wit and wisdom, has decreed, ordained, instituted, and commanded. may therein graciously consider God's honor and man's salvation and blessedness, or, indeed, may he not allow himself to be hurried to the utmost in this most sacrificial and most important matter, by the industrious impetuous or importunate persistence of the adversaries, as they would perhaps like to see and want, but, if the action among ourselves in love and kindness would be harmless on this Imperial Day, as, however, E. K. M. has decreed my superfluous and unavoidable action. My Majesty will graciously hear my superfluous request, which my fellow kinsmen agree with me, from the one that has been presented before: so let Your Majesty, for the sake of greater security of conscience, take the most important matters, as they are of God's will, into consideration.

The most important matters concerning honor and truth and the salvation and happiness of the souls of men, about which there is nothing more important, neither in heaven nor on earth, are to be brought to a common, free, Christian concilium, as Your Majesty has graciously granted, and as the princes, princes, and estates have found necessary, useful, and good at many different imperial congresses, due to the greatness of the matter. and have also most humbly requested it, so that for once the truth may be pursued with right earnestness and diligence and that it may be acted upon, what is right confirmed, and what is abused and wrong done away with everywhere. For Your Majesty is graciously pleased to consider how difficult it is to interpret and construe that, as often as a common, free, Christian Council has been spoken of and acted upon, most humbly and unanimously asked for, also granted, and the whole realm put off; and yet, if the action at this Imperial Diet, by virtue of Your Majesty's decree, is to be taken in an unobtrusive manner, it should be taken in an unobtrusive manner. If the action at this Imperial Diet, by virtue of Your Majesty's decree, were to be unobjectionably fine, it should not be allowed to proceed without the unavoidable necessity of all the present abuses in Christendom, about which the whole world has cried out for many years, so that, if God wills, Your Majesty will not allow it to happen for the sake of your most gracious grant, to the praise of God, also for the benefit of Christendom and, above all, for the benefit of the Empire of the German Nation. All of this, Your Majesty graciously wishes to note from me, not otherwise than cordially and completely humbly, also to my and my fellow relatives' need, and therefore, that I cannot nor may not desist from God's word, truth, order and command, as desired, for the sake of my conscience, let them move me and likewise my fellow relatives to disgrace, but on this superfluous my Christian inheritance, be and remain my most gracious Lord and Emperor. Again, all that I may otherwise grant, which is not contrary to God's word and my conscience, in this I will show myself most submissive, and with God's help keep it so that Your Imperial Majesty will regard me as a faithful emperor. Majesty shall find me a faithful, obedient and peaceful Elector, and one who is heartily sorry for error and incorrectness in doctrine and government, much less inclined to promote such, until the end and conclusion of my life.

The third article, concerning the covenant.

That also from the words "our kinsmen", so in my friends, and my last delivered writing, for the sake of the cities Nuremberg and Reutlingen, who in agreement with us have known and signed the preceding articles, should have understood or wanted to assume an alliance, I would not have provided myself with such dangerous interpretations by my detractors to induce Your Imperial Majesty to disfavor me. Majesty to disfavor me in any way. Thus it would have been unnecessary for me to take such thoughts against me for the reasons indicated and to complain to your Imperial Majesty about them; for it is easy to assume that I and my friends have not made a confession here on anyone's account in this important matter, or would do so and give an account of what is taught and held in other places that have not publicly signed with us and our confession. In this regard, Your Imperial Majesty Majesty that I have reacted to such a report, which was sent to me by your Imperial Majesty's command. Majesty's command, I have had the above-mentioned two Counts of Nassau and Neuenar, next to Insbruck, report such an alliance to me for a submissive truthful answer, which I hereby submit to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty I hereby humbly renew. That I should also have asked the Swiss for an alliance, or have left myself in communication with them, as I have done with Your Imperial Majesty, for further enquiries. Maj. I have requested further innocence: upon this I show Your Imperial Majesty my innocence. Majesty I so declare my innocence, and say that there is no man living in this world who would speak or say with truth, nor may it be made true at any time that all my life I have sought some alliance with the Swiss, much less have I let myself into some with them; and that is more, so no one will be able to say that I have sent, ordered, or with my knowledge and will ever done such seeking or acting with them secretly or publicly. And please, your Imperial. Majesty want those of my disfavored, so your Imperial. Your Imperial Majesty will consider them untrue and will not give them any credence until they make them true and, as is rightfully their due, prove them to be unable, God willing, to do so with the least amount of effort. Thus my cousin, Duke George of Saxony, almost gave me notice of such things in various winters, with avoidance, as if such should have reached your Majesty's brother, the royal dignities of Hungary and Bohemia, my special dear lord and uncle. But I have let myself be heard by his royal dignities and my cousins with such an answer that I hope (so I have also heard it from their royal dignities) that this will be the case.

Your dignities and dear ones may not understand otherwise), 1) that they have noted my apology and answer to good sufficiency, satisfaction, and without reference. And your Imperial Majesty graciously understands all this, and to my need, 2) that for your Imperial Majesty's sake I will earn it with all submissiveness, body and soul. Actum Augsburg, on the 21st day of July, Anno Domini 1530.

996. letter of the Elector Johann of Saxony to Niclas von Ende, bailiff in Georgenthal, because of the above event.

July 28, 1530.

From Müller's History, lib. III, eap. 22, S. 685.

Dear Council and Faithful! We graciously inform you that we have not yet received an answer from Imperial Majesty to our confession of our faith, and how we hold it in our principality, and what we have preached, and it will be five weeks after tomorrow that we have handed it over to Imperial Majesty. Majesty; then we have asked Imperial Majesty to lend us the Church of Saxony. This has been refused to us. We have not failed to do so, and have again petitioned Imperial Majesty. Majesty again to lend us the Chur, but we have not yet been able to obtain an answer. We have no other choice but to consider that we can hardly be trusted by Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and we fear that our own friends have brought this about; for Imperial Majesty has not yet given us a word. Majesty has not yet given us a word. Thus we lie here with great expenses. To this day we have with us three and a half hundred horses, and have consumed a great sum, and have had to borrow twelve thousand florins here. We also write to you herewith from the chancery, on the other articles. We would like you to come to us in Coburg when we return with divine help, which we graciously do not want you to do; we are inclined to show you mercy. Date at Augsburg, on Thursday after Jacobi [July 28] Anno 1530.

D. How the Papists, before they had finished refuting the Augsburg Confession, handed over various writings against Luther and his followers to the Emperor.

997 List of the writings which some papist doctors delivered to the Emperor at the Imperial Diet of Augsburg.

This number belongs to the same document from which No. 963 is taken. In the Wittenberg edition (1569), Vol. IX, p. 417; in the Jena edition (1566), Vol. V, p. 37d and in Spalatin's Annals, p. 145. Walch has given the Latin titles of the writings listed here in his table of contents to the 16th volume, p. 51 f.. Because we believe that no one is served by this, we have omitted it.

A Christian and urgent reply to the articles submitted by the Elector of Saxony and several other princes and two cities.

The repugnant articles in which the apostate Luther writes against himself in his Babylonia, extracted by Doctor Johann Faber.

The heresy and error, drawn together from various Luther's books.

The heresy, condemned in the holy Conciliar, but again aroused by the Lutherans.

The heresy and error of Luther, condemned by Pope Leo the Tenth ten years ago.

The heresy and error of Luther, condemned seven years ago by the University of Paris.

The Faculty of the Holy Scriptures at Louvain condemnation.

An excerpt of some of Martin Luther's heresies and errors.

Several much incorrect sects, grown out of Luther and the Lutherans.

The Abominable, Corrupt and Damned Fruits of the Lutheran Gospel.

Summa, some reckon it to two hundred and sixty leaves.

998 Melancthon's letter to Luther, with which he sends him the list of the above writings. July 15, 1530.

This letter is found in Melancthon's opist. lid.I, p. 11; in Cölestin, vol. II, p. 233; in Chyträus according to the Latin edition, p. 131 and according to the German, p. 215; in Cyprian's Beilagen zur Hist. der Augsb. Conf., p. 193, and in Oorp. Rot. vol.II, 197.

Verdeutsch.

(1) I have written to you that new councils are often held; this we have indeed learned. Yesterday, it was decided in the Council of the Princes and the Surgeons that the Emperor should be asked to arrange a concilium for the whole German Empire. It was added that in the meantime it should be held in such a way that the peace would not be broken. Our people have argued that the second point should be omitted; although they would do so and have brought forward a number of reasons for it, I do not particularly like it; we want to appear too cautious.

(2) I am sending you a list of the writings which our adversaries have handed over to the imperial majesty; in it you will see that they have appended to the confutation some repugnant articles and other things out of malicious intent, so that they may embitter imperial majesty's gentle heart against us. Majesty's gentle heart against us. The boys need such attacks against us. If we come to the answer, I will truly pay the loose bloodhounds again.

(3) I have now been several times with distant enemies, the redskins of the corner; it is not to be said how bitterly Pharisee-like hatred I have noticed in them. They do and strive nowhere else but to incite the princes against us, and to bring the pious emperor against us in an ungodly way. Hereby God commands and prays for us. Given on Friday after Margaret [July 15].

999. extract from Luther's reply to the preceding.

Here Walch brings a piece of the letter that is very poorly reported in No. 1073. We will report the entire document there in its entirety.

Luther's exhortation to the clergy, assembled at the Diet of Augsburg. Issued at the beginning of June 1530.

Already on May 12th Luther had finished this writing and sent it to Wittenberg for printing, as we can see from the letter No. 7 in the appendix of this volume. On June 7, the Strasbourg emissary Jakob Sturm sent a copy from Augsburg to his home. (Virck, Straßb. Corresp., p. 451, No. 733.) The first edition appeared under the title: "Vermanung an die geistlichen versamlet auff dem Reichstag zu Augsburg, Anno. 1530, Mart. Luther. Wittenberg. l'sai. 2nd Dt nuno ReZos intollißito, Druckimini ludiaos torruo." At the end, "Printed at Wittenberg, by Hans läufst. MDXXX." 8<sup>a</sup> sheets in 4. In the same year came with Joseph Klug.

In 1531 another edition was published by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg, likewise by Georg Wachter in Nuremberg, also two without indication of place and year. In 1531, another edition was published by Joseph Klug. At Magdeburg, Hans Wolther organized two different editions in Low German. In the "Gesamtausgabe": in the Wittenberg (1554), vol. VII, p. 446; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 76; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 201; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 146; in the Erlangen, "I. Aufl" vol. 24, p. 330 and 2nd ed. vol. 24, p. 358. According to the latter give only the text.

To the entire clergy of Augsburg, assembled at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, exhortation of Martin Luther.

Grace and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ! Although it is not my duty (dear Sirs) to appear in person at this Diet, and even if I had to or should appear, there could be nothing of use there, as there would be nothing in such pomp and business: I have nevertheless resolved to be among you in writing about my spiritual presence (which I want to prove with all my heart, through prayer and supplication to my God, diligently and honestly with God's help), and with this silent and weak message.

(2) And this because my conscience impels me to beseech, implore, and exhort you all kindly and cordially, that you do not miss this Diet nor abuse it in vain; for God gives you grace, space, time, and cause, through our most gracious Lord Emperor Carolum, to accomplish much and great good with this Diet, if you alone would. And now, of course, as St. Paul says in 2 Cor. 6:1, 2, "I urge you not to receive the grace of God in vain. For he saith, I have heard thee in the acceptable time, and have helped thee in the day of salvation. Behold, now is a pleasant time, and a day of salvation," for you most of all. And we see and hear how all men's hearts gaze and wait for this kingdom day, with great hope that it will be good.

003 But if this Diet (for which God is merciful) should pass away without end, and not something righteous be established, and

1) In the original: genehmen.

If all the world has now been put off and teased for a long time with imperial congresses and conciliis, and all hope has failed and been in vain, it is to be feared that despair would come of it, and everyone would grow weary of putting off and waiting, and the vain long gazing would make impatience and bad blood. For it cannot and may not stand longer as it now stands, especially with yourselves and with your state and nature; this you know and feel better than I can tell you; therefore I also do herewith what I do for your good, for the sake of peace and unity.

004 But whether some might sourly regard my presumption in this, and pretend: Who may thy? Who hath ever desired thy exhortation or letter? There are so many learned and pious men here, that know better how to advise the matter than thou fool 2c. Well, this I will gladly believe, and God help that all may be true. 2) I would gladly have my presumption punished and condemned; but this is also true: one cannot do too much of a good thing, and often a fool has given better counsel than many wise men; and again, wise men have commonly done the "greatest" harm on earth, especially when they have relied on their wisdom, and have not also acted with the fear of God, and with a humble heart have asked for divine help and mercy.

005 Of which all histories are full of examples, both in the scriptures, and out of the scriptures: and if there were no other example, it would be found in your own example. For you have tried your wisdom in this matter for ten years, with so many kingdoms, with so many counsels, with so many tricks and practices, with so many appeals and hopes, even with violence and wrath, with murder and punishment, that I have seen my wonder and sorrow in you; yet nowhere has it gone where you would have it go. All this means that wisdom, without the fear of God and humble prayer, has tried to master such great things by herself, and has been disgraced by her presumption. And will you not yet fear and humble yourselves before God?

2) In the original: zewarten.

that ye forbear from dread and from revenge, and earnestly beseech God for help and counsel, ye shall not yet avail; and if ye were at all as wise as King Solomon; for there is written 1 Peter 5:5: "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble."

(6) But we on our side pray diligently, and also know the right way to pray, by the grace of God; we are also certain that our prayer will be acceptable and heard for us; both of which (I take care) may do little on your part. And now we have also begun to pray earnestly for you, so that God Almighty may one day enlighten your hearts and move them to fear His Word and to act humbly toward Him. Such prayer is pleasant for us, that we know; but God help that you do not stubbornly oppose it, and that our prayer should return to our bosom, as lost and despised by you. For we see that the devil wants to come with the Turk, and is stirring up one mob after another, and would gladly push it all to the ground; should you then also remain obstinate and stiff-necked, as before, that would be too much and all the more infallible.

007 And first of all, ye shall do nothing for my sake, and for mine: for the right helper and counsellor hath brought us and our cause so far, and set it where it shall be, and since we will leave it, that we need no council, no counsel, no master; neither will we have it of you, as we know ye are not able to do better, yea, not so well. For we are about to come under Turks or Tatters, under Popes or devils, so our cause is certain, that we know how to believe and live, how to teach and do, how to suffer and pray, how to heal and die, where to wait, fetch and find everything, and where we are finally to stay, according to the words of St. Paul, Rom. 8:28: To the elect the Spirit creates all things for their good. God has abundantly given us these things through Christ our Lord, and they are already known and confirmed through the blood and suffering of many righteous people (killed by your part); not that we should be perfect, and that we should be able to live in the Lord.

but that we have the right rule (as St. Paul speaks Phil. 3,16.), the right way, and the right beginning before us, and that we lack nothing in doctrine, life be what it may.

008 But for you, and for the poor people, which are yet wholly undone among you, or ever uncertain, we will take care, and would gladly help here with prayers and exhortations, as best we can. For I am afraid that you will forget your office and your humility toward God, and that you will tighten the strings too hard, and ride the willing horse too hard, so that again a rebellion will arise, so that both of us will be in misery and distress with you, as happened before. For you still know without a doubt how before the uprising the Speirische Reichstag was announced with such glorious, comforting hope that all the world gaped with great eagerness and waited heartily for things to turn out well. But your counsel was full of wisdom, and brought it about that the same Diet was dully, shamefully, and disgracefully proclaimed. Then the ruthlessness came, namely the mint with the riot, and gave you a shilling, which you have not yet overcome, and unfortunately we have still greater damage from it. That is to say, all done with violence and his own mind.

(9) So, at Worms, the noble blood, our dear Emperor Carol, had to do what you wanted, and condemn me with my whole doctrine, which you yourselves have secretly accepted in many things, and need, and your preachers would have nothing to preach now, where Luther's books were not. For their book of sermons, and what used to be the clamor in the pulpit, they leave lying under the pew, and begin to preach against us about faith and good works, and the like, of which nothing was heard or known before. At that time, you enforced a commandment to kill the Lutherans so horribly that you yourselves could neither keep it nor suffer it, and it had to be changed at the Diet of Nuremberg, and some of the princes had to forbid it themselves, if they did not want to be in danger with their country and their people.

010 I tell you these things, not to mock you.

or mockery (for I have otherwise smelled you too high), but to ask you cordially, and to admonish you faithfully, that you would learn from your own experience and misfortune, to leave off defiance and anger, violence and insistence, and to act towards God with fear and humility, and, putting aside your presumption, to seek His help and mercy with earnest prayer. Verily, verily, the things are too great, human wisdom and power are far too small for them; God must help, or else trouble will come. 1) That is certain, for if you want to persist in your defiance and insistence, then you should know that the spirit of the mint is still alive, and more powerful and dangerous to my concern than you can believe or now understand. It is more to you than to us, though he is more hostile to us than to you; but we have a defiance against him, praise be to God for ever. If God would, you would have the same, namely, the pure word and righteous prayer.

011 Know ye also how faithfully and firmly we have held out against all the seditioners; and if I might boast, I would almost say that we had been your patrons, and that it was our business that ye should hitherto have remained what ye still are. And if we had done so, 2) I fear, verily, your scholars would have been too weak in the matter, and the enthusiasts and the mobs should soon have taught you otherwise. For this reason they are more hostile to us than to you, and blame us as those who crawl to the cross and recant. This we must suffer, and learn the proverb: He that will help another from the gallows, that same will gladly carry him up. The ruffians would not have known how to attack the pope, but now that they have been loosed by our help, and eat our bread, they trample us under their feet, as Christ says of his betrayer Judah [John 13:18, Psalm 41:10].

012 But some shall say here. Yes, it is all your fault, you started it, and these are the fruits of your teaching 2c. Well then, this I must suffer, knowing well that

1) Otherwise this proverb has the form, "Out of trouble comes trouble." St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 365, S 11.

2) That is, had we not been there. On this idiom compare St. Louis edition, vol. V, 877, § 188; 1191, S 28 and the note on the latter passage.

They say this to me, but again, I know many devout people among you who know that it is not true. So the work stands there in the day, my strong witnesses, that the fools have always despised my doctrine and persecuted it more than your doctrine, and I have also had to oppose them more strongly and to fight harder than I ever did against the pope; how then can it have come from my doctrine? Or why has not such displeasure arisen among my own, since I myself preach and teach daily, when it should be the first and highest evil, where such evil should come from my teaching?

013 But have ye forgotten that the German nobles at Worms presented four hundred pieces to the emperor's majesty, complaining of the ecclesiastics, and saying freely, if the emperor's majesty would not abolish such things, they would do it themselves; for they could no longer suffer it? What do you think? If this had been done (as the rebels then began to do), and if only one preacher had risen to advise it, where would you clergy now be? In bus oorreptam! Now at that time my doctrine was in force, and had not begun with any rebellion or run up to it, but had finely taught the people to keep peace and to obey the authorities; and where it had not been, the clergy would certainly have made quite a fuss. Now my teaching must have done it. But such thanks are due to me, nor do I desire any other; so it has been with all the prophets and apostles, and with Christ himself.

014 Have ye also forgotten how at the first my doctrine was almost a delightful thing among you all? for all the bishops were very glad to see the pope's tyranny a little restrained, and they could watch me, and listen, and sit still, and wait how they might recover their episcopal authority. Luther was a fine teacher, who attacked indulgences so honestly. For at that time the bishops and parish lords had to suffer that a monk or a foreign bad boy with the letters of indulgence in his monastery and parish went through and by a shameful drudgery, and were not allowed to rebel against it. There was no doctor in all the high schools or monasteries who would have known or been allowed to encounter such filth, and Luther was the dear child, and swept the monasteries and parishes from such a treacherous market, and held the bishops' risers so that they looked good again, and threw a block in the way of the pope; why was this also not rebellious among you?

(15) And afterwards, since I attacked the monastic life, and the monks have now become fewer, I have not yet heard any bishop or parish priest weeping over it, and I know that no greater service has ever been done to the bishops and parish priests than that they have thus been rid of the monks; and I fear, indeed, that there will now hardly be anyone in Augsburg who will take care of the monks, and ask that they be restored to their former state. Yes, the bishops will not suffer that such wanzken and lice should again be put into their furs, are glad that I have loused their furs so clean; although, to tell the truth, the monks had to govern the churches under the pope, and the bishops did nothing about it, but let themselves be called Junker. Now I have not destroyed the monks with rebellion, but with my doctrine, and pleases the bishops well, they could not have done it with all the power of kings, nor with all the art of the high schools; why do they not think that this is rebellious? Well, it pleases them too much that the monks are down, and thus the pope has almost lost a whole hand; and yet they know no thanks to Luther, whose teaching they so wonderfully use in this play.

016 And because I have just come to the conclusion that people have forgotten how things were in the world before my teaching began, and that no one now wants to have done nothing wrong, I must pull out the old vestments and put their forgotten virtue before the eyes of the clergy, so that they may see, or remember again, what would have been in the world if our gospel had not come, and we may also see to our consolation how manifold and glorious fruit the word of God has borne. And let us begin at the very place where my teaching began, namely, indulgences.

Of indulgences.

017 If our gospel had done nothing else but this, that it had redeemed the consciences from the shameful abomination and idol of indulgences, yet it should be known that it was the word and power of God. For all the world must confess that no human wisdom would be able to do this, since no bishop, no foundation, no monastery, no doctor, no high school, nor I myself at that time, and in sum, no reason understood or knew this abomination, much less knew how to control it or attack it, but had to approve it all and let it go for good, wholesome doctrine, even the dear bishops and popes confidently took money from it and let it go, namely:

1) That they sold indulgences for the divine grace that forgives sin, whereby Christ's blood and death is denied and blasphemed, together with the Holy Spirit and the gospel.

2) That they thereby falsely sold the souls out of purgatory, to great dishonor of divine majesty itself; but carried the amount of money.

3) That they thereby appointed the pope as God in heaven, who could command the angels to lead the pilgrims' souls, who were dying on the journey to Rome, to heaven.

4) The gospel, which is the only true indulgence, was silent in the churches before the indulgence.

5) That they defrauded the whole world of immeasurable money thereby, and afflicted it with insolent avarice and lies, as if they wanted to get against the Turk.

6) For they always put down the former indulgences for the sake of the new, and always took up the old indulgences in the churches for the sake of the new, and played with the golden year, after which they wanted money; yea, against the Turk!

7) And also the pall of the golden year is a mere poem and loose lies, to pervert the faith of Christ, and the daily golden year of Christ, yet deceiving innumerable thousands of souls with it, and shamefully deceiving the people to run to Rome, cheating them out of money and goods, with lost toil and cost besides.

8) That in indulgences they sold the good works of all Christendom, together with absolution,

As a strange thing, which the gospel before and for ever giveth freely unto the whole world, that consciences might be deceived from the gospel and from Christ unto works of men.

9) That they praised indulgences more highly than all good works of love.

10) That they put the merit of the saints, as remaining for themselves, to the treasure of indulgences, as if Christ's suffering were not sufficient for the remission of all sins also; which again corrupts faith in Christ.

11) That in the end they exalted indulgences so highly that they taught that if anyone had slept with the Mother of God, it would have been forgiven through indulgences.

12) That they might teach that if the penny were in the box, the soul would go to heaven.

13) That one should not have repentance and sorrow to obtain the indulgence, it would be enough that one put in the money now.

14) That St. Peter himself could not give greater grace than the indulgence was.

Where then has the immense money, treasure, and goods gone, which were stolen by indulgence so long ago, and so shamefully acquired?

(18) Who will tell all the abominations which indulgences alone have committed in all monasteries, convents, churches, chapels, altars, pictures, tablets, yea, almost in all houses and chambers, and where there was only money, as a right mighty idol? One would have to read anew the books that are written against it in ten years. Now, gentlemen, in this unspeakable thievery and robbery of money, and in such an incomprehensible multitude of deceived hearts and consciences, and in such a most dreadful, atrocious lie and blasphemy of the passion of Christ, of the Gospel, of grace, and of God Himself, committed by indulgences, you clergy are all guilty, not only those who have taken the money from it, but also those who have kept silent about it, and have willingly stood by and watched such devilish madness. They say of riots, of the taking of monasteries, of Turks; indeed, what are all such things against you indulgence-bearers alone, if one would but consider it? 'Tis a very Turkish thing.

Army has been against the right Christian faith.

019 But what man is there among you all that hath ever repented of such dreadful abominations, or sighed once, or wetted an eye? Yea, ye now, as the hardened impenitents, never having done any evil, now therefore come to Augsburg, and persuade us that the Holy Ghost is with you, and that through you (who have done nothing but harm in Christendom all your lives) great things shall be done, (who have done nothing but harm to Christendom in your lifetime), and after that lead you swiftly to heaven, with all such unpunished abominations defended, as if he should be glad of you, that you have so gloriously served your God the belly, and so miserably laid waste his church. Therefore you have no happiness, nor shall you have any more; you repent then and amend your ways. Well, this is one of the fools; so it was and was before my doctrine came in the piece. That it is no longer so is the fault of my rebellious gospel. The indulgence is followed by the other fair, called Confessionalia.

Of the Confessionalibus.

020 These were the letters of butter, wherein the pope sold liberty to eat butter, cheese, milk, and eggs, and gave power to hear mass in the house, and to marry in a forbidden member, and to choose a confessor as often as he pleased, to absolve from chastisement and guilt in life and in death, and the like. Dear, was this not also a blasphemous fair in all the world, all invented for the sake of money? Just as if God had not given such things freely to all the world through the Gospel before, or as if God had forbidden it, and they were the giants who wanted to sell God's commandments for money. The Gospel had to be nothing, and God had to be their merchant. This drudgery, fair and blasphemy was also overthrown by the rebellious Gospel, but now all is forgotten; and there is no bishop or clergyman who is sorry or in need of forgiveness before God. Nor was there any bishop or doctor here who would have punished such a thing, but all kept silent and approved. Well then, let us also see whether God will allow Himself to be fooled as they think.

From confession.

021 There are yet your books, wherein ye have made and taught confession, which I reckon one of the greatest plagues of all the earth; so that ye have confounded the consciences of all the world, made so many souls to despair, and weakened and diminished the faith of all men in Christ. For you have told us nothing at all of the consolation of absolution, which is the chief and best part of confession, and which also strengthens faith and confidence in Christ; but you have made it a work to strengthen your tyranny with commandments forcibly enforced upon unwilling hearts, and afterward to afflict, torture, and scourge them with the recital of all their sins, that is, with impossible labor to disturb forever the tranquillity and peace of heart. But when will you bring back all such souls, and make restitution for the murderous, causeless damage? My gospel has also justified such confession, and strengthened the stupid consciences again, since no bishop, doctor, nor high school knew anything about it, and now have neither remorse nor sorrow for such misery.

Of repentance.

022 This is the very soup and hell itself: and if all abominations were forgiven and given you, yet this piece can never be forgiven you. This piece hath filled hell, and hath more grievously destroyed the kingdom of Christ, than the Turk, or the whole world, can ever do. For thus have ye taught us, that by our works we should be sufficient for sin, even against God. And that means atoning for sin. Nowhere have you given so much to repentance and confession, though you have also made work of them. What then is this said differently: You must do enough for your sin, for so much: You must deny Christ, revoke your baptism, blaspheme the gospel, punish God with lies, not believe the forgiveness of sin, trample Christ's blood and death under foot, profane the Holy Spirit, and go to heaven by yourself with such virtues? Oh, where are the tongues and voices that may sufficiently speak of this?

1) ichts -something.

023 What then is this faith but the faith of the Turks, and of the Gentiles, and of the Jews, which all also will suffice by their works? But how is it possible for a soul not to despair, if it has no other consolation against sin than its own works? All this ye cannot deny; your books are there, wherein is taught nothing of faith, neither in confession nor repentance, but only your own works. There is not yet a bishop nor a clergyman here who would let a tear fall for such an abominable, infernal blasphemy of Christ, but they are pure and sure, calling us meanwhile rebels, and choking the marriage apostles, even against their own right; they are angry that the Lutherans do not stand as if they were fasting, as they do, nor wearing plates; and they defy the eternal God for all their inhuman wickedness.

(24) Out of this abomination have come, and must have come, and there has been no defense, all other abominations, namely, as much of the monasteries and convents' own sanctity, with their worship, the sacrificial masses, purgatory, vigils, brotherhoods, pilgrimages, indulgences, fasting, holy service, sanctuary, poltergeists, and the whole procession of the infernal cloister. For how can it be otherwise? If a conscience is to sit down and build itself on its works, then it sits on a loose sand that rides and calls 2) on and on, and must seek works, always one after the other, the longer the more, until at last one put on monk's caps for the dead, in which they should go to heaven. Dear Lord God, how should poor consciences do? They had to build on works, that is why they had to search so miserably, and catch what they could find, and fall into such deep foolishness.

025 Moreover, by such shameful doctrine all righteous good works, instituted and ordained of God, were despised, and even brought to nought, as, lord, subject, father, mother, son, daughter, servant, maid; which were not called good works, neither did they belong to repentance, but were called a worldly being, a perilous estate, and a lost work. So this play has both, Christian and worldly.

2)            So            the            original.            Jenaer:            reiset.            -            Maybe:            rieselt?

They have trampled under their feet and given neither God nor the emperor what is due to them, but have invented a new and unique one, which is neither this nor that, and they themselves do not know what it is, because there is no word of God in it; as Moses says that they serve the gods, whom they do not know. Nor was this a miracle. For in those days they knew no other way of preaching the gospel than to learn from it examples and good works, and no one ever heard a gospel that was drawn from Christ for the conscience's comfort, for faith and trust, as it ought to be, and as it is now being preached again in praise of God, and so the world was in the gospel, but without a gospel.

026 That they might have wisely distinguished such satisfaction for sin, that it might be done against man, and not against God, as Christ hath signified, Matt. 7:12, and 18:15, as the holy fathers also used in time past; and that the Christians, having sinned, might make satisfaction for it before the church and brethren, as is signified by the words, that they did penance two, three, seven years, 2c, Christ would be stayed with his sufficiency for us in heaven. But with this, the services in monasteries and convents, and indulgences (as said above) would not have arisen, and the great God's belly would not have received so much. Therefore, they had to mix it up, and in the end, they had to bring it up before God alone, even though this error has challenged Christianity from the beginning, even through great men, such as Origen, St. Jerome, and St. Gregory, but not so much as come into the regiment and to God's throne, as happened under the pope. For this error has been the oldest from the beginning of the world, and will probably remain the youngest until the end of the world. Let us now recount some of the things that have come to pass.

First of all from the purchase fair or angle fair.

027 Here you yourselves know, dear sirs, what a shameful fair you have made of the sacrament; this has been the common handiwork of all of you, that every day in all the world you have made so many thousands of masses for the sacrament.

Money bought and sold, one for a penny, one for eight pennies, one for six pennies 2c. And no excuse or denial helps here. For though you did not call it a bargain, yet you know that in fact it was nothing else than a bargain. It was done for money; if there was no money, the masses remained. This sin alone is so horrible that it would not be a wonder if God had let all the world become Turks over it, or sink into the abyss, and it is a great wonder to me that God has tolerated it so long. It is an incomprehensible patience, even though the wrath has not been restrained. Now therefore ye have done this, and it was so with you before our gospel came: be not so much as to adorn yourselves, for it is so near in the day, that even at that time ye were afraid of it: nevertheless ye let it go, and it was not called news.

028 Now your scholars will clean themselves, and bring forth old canons and fathers' sayings, that the mass is called a sacrifice with them. Clean thyself, dear little cat, thou mayest; if thou hast long canons and sayings, what is the use? We speak here of the Masses of Sale and of the Masses of the Angles; and the Canons speak of the Common Mass or the Mass of the Communicants, and urge them to communicate. The Masses for sale do not do this, and rhyme with the common or communicant Mass like a secret priest's whore with a pious, honest, public bride. The scholars know how to conduct the canons so well. And what is still finer, the old canons separate the offering and the communicating finely from one another; so they mix them even more finely into one another. For in the beginning of Christendom, when they wished to say mass, they kept the old law, and the Christians offered firstfruits on the altar of all kinds of fruits, also of milk, honey, apples, and pears. 2c. This then the priest offered, as Moses commanded the Jews, wherefore the office was long after called a sacrifice. But after this the communiciren began, or sacrament act; which they call not sacrificing, but communiciren. But our masses of sale make an offering of the sacrament, and leave off communicating.

029 Now here I must speak unto you, good sirs, which cry that Ulan should not allow any novelty: tell me, is not the buying fair a shameful novelty? Why then have you let it arise, and do you yet protect it? Yea, if ye should have allowed no novelty, beloved, what and how much would be found among you now, that is in the old Canonibus and Fathers? I would almost put it in a nutshell, since your news has filled the world.

030 I will say more, What was your state of the church before our gospel, but vain daily novelties, one upon another, with heaps brought in like a cloudburst; there is one that set up St. Annam, St. Christopher, St. George, St. Barbara, St. Bastian, St. Catharine, and who alone will tell such new services? St. George, St. Barbara, St. Bastian, St. Catharine, and probably 14 emergency helpers, and who alone will tell of such new services to the saints? Are they not news? Where were there bishops and shriekers who should not allow such things? So further: one set up the rosary, the other the crown of Mary, the other the psalter of Mary, the latter ten little paternoster stones at the doors, the former St. Bridget's prayer, the latter this prayer, the latter the prayer, and of these all number and measure, and all books full; where was there a bishop or doctor here who would have regarded such novelty a little askance?

(31) So with the pilgrimages, new ones went up every day to Grimmethal, to the oak, to Birnbaum, to Regensburg, and so many Our Lady's; there was almost no chapel or altar, a pilgrimage wanted to go up there, and the people ran as if they were mad, out of service and obedience, that one could grasp it, it would be the devil's ghost; bishops and monasteries and high schools were still silent. And if our gospel had not come, there would have been no room nor place left for pilgrimage. And was this not a special, masterful fraud with our Lord's skirt at Trier? as this shameful lie was revealed afterwards. What did all the Lutheran novelties do against this fraud and mischievousness? But there was no one here who could declare or denounce news, but Luther, who denounces and punishes such news, brings forth new things.

032 How daily and manifoldly doth the indulgence alone renew itself? How many new brotherhoods have been set up by priests and monks through all crafts, through all the saints' names? Daily they sold letters of brotherhood, and gave their good works and holy lives for money, sold vigils, anniversaries, masses of the soul with pomp for the money. Some of them invented the Mass of the Gilden, some of them the Mass of five, some of them the Mass of one kind or another, which also had no number, of which, of course, nothing is found in the old fathers. I will be silent here about the sanctuary, help God, how there were new things over new things; and among them such gross, tangible lies: about the holy cross, about many whole bodies of one and the same saint, about many fingers of one and the same saint, until one also honors St. Francisci Niederwat 1) and women's hair for St. Catharine's hair. Summa, there was no end nor measure here, that you yourselves made a laughing-stock of it at last; nor did it go unpunished, and no bishop saw anything new here.

033 But if I should come to the pulpit and the preaching seat, it would be all the more groundless; there the monks daily preached their new visions, dreams, and thoughts, new miracles and examples, and no measure of them. When a monk had been a preacher two or three years, he would make a new book of sermons, which had to rule the preaching seat for a time, and the world was full of such books, and yet in them was nothing of Christ and faith, but everything of our works, merit, and devotion, with many false, harmful examples. 2) But when they did their best in these books, they did not preach them. But if they did their best therein, it was to be commended by the saints, and their order not forgotten, until they made the holy, noble person, the Virgin Mary, an example to all the world, as a mediatrix of poor sinners, even against her Son Christ Himself. For we all know with one another, and I am as well in it as any other, that we were taught to hold Mariam badly in Christ's stead and office.

1) Niederwad Hosen. See St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 391, § 285, and the note thereto. In draft, Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 105: "Sannt Franciscus Niderclaid".

held Christ to be our wrathful judge, and Mary our mercy seat, where all our comfort and refuge was, if we would not otherwise despair. Was not this a dreadful news? Where were the bishops here, who punished such new blasphemers and betrayers of Christ, who took away Christ's office, and gave it to Mary? who taught us to flee from Christ, and to be afraid of him, as of the master of the rod, and to turn our confidence, which we owe to him, as the right service of God, elsewhere; vain idolatry have we learned from the betrayers.

034 To this end the doctors in the high schools, who had nothing else to do, helped to devise new opinions, one above the other; and one would not have been a doctor with special honors, who had not brought up something new; but their best was that they despised the holy Scriptures, and left them under the bench. What Biblia, Biblia! said they, Biblia is a heretic book, one must read the Doctores, there one finds it. I know that I am not lying here, for I grew up among them, and have seen and heard all this from them. Scotus writes that one cannot prove from Scripture this article, æeseueckit ack ivleros. ^> ccam, my dear master, writes that one may not prove from Scripture that a man is in need of God's grace for good works; these are the best two, what should the others do? Over all these goes Thomas Aquinas, teacher of all teachers (say otherwise the preachers rightly), who says freely that to become a monk is as much as to be baptized. Thus one should honor Christ's blood and death. This is not yet news, and he has been canonized by the pope and all the bishops.

035 In sum, there was misery and heartache in preaching and teaching, and all the bishops were still silent, and saw nothing new, who could now see a new gnat in the sun. And so all things stood so wild and desolate with vain discordant doctrines and strange new opinions, that no one could know any more what was certain or uncertain, what was a Christian or an un-Christian. The old doctrine of the faith of Christ, of love, of prayer, of the cross, of consolation in afflictions, was in ruins; indeed, there was no doctor in all the world, who would have known the whole Catechism, that is, the Lord's Prayer, ten commandments and faith, let alone that they should understand and teach it; as it is now, praise God, taught and learned, even by young children. Of this I refer to all their books, both theologians and jurists. If one will be able to learn a piece of the catechismi rightly from it, then I will let myself be wheeled and wheeled. Nothing new had to be there yet, but this must be new.

(36) Yea, saith thou, these pieces are now accepted and in daily use; but thine is new. Dear, tell me, how old is St. Anne's divine? How old is the rosary, the crown of Mary? How old are the Barefoot Paternostones at the doors and gates and in all corners? How old is the pilgrimage to Grimmerthal, Regensburg, the skirt at Trier, and the like much more? Were they not new 10, 20, 40 years ago? but who then held against the novelty? Let my gospel continue so long, for it shall wax old. Yes, your new gospel is right, but it has a peculiar novelty about it that is not good. What's that? It does harm in the bag and in the kitchen, say the canons of Magdeburg. That aloud! said that servant, that would be good German for once, that could be understood; if I had known that before! Why do we lose so many words so far? Well then, let us conclude here in secret concilio that new doctrine means what harms the bag and the kitchen; old doctrine means what fills the bag and the kitchen. O dear, now write and seal, we will send it to the Diet in Augsburg, and hear what the gentlemen say to it.

37. God knows that I do not say these things to you for dishonor; I am not helped by your destruction. I would rather that it were better for you. But you may well consider this yourselves; if you will forget such abominations, and adorn yourselves with them, and clean yourselves, there will be men who will not forget them, and perhaps they will act impurely enough. For such impudent outrage is not to be suffered, that news should be called what ye would, but what ye would not, should not be called news, to suppress the true-

...against your own conscience. For this would bring us back to the beginning of things, and afterward we would be worse with you than before. Although it is frightening that one should intend to hide such misery, and still justify himself in it, and blaspheme and persecute others; this is a sign of a hardened, impenitent heart, and that you must soon perish, since no sin offends and perverts God more than when one wants to deny, adorn, and hide public wickedness, as Cain and Saul did. Not so, gentlemen, do not do so; yet some of you give glory to God; confess that you have done evil in such matters; humble yourselves, and he will exalt you; ask, and he will forgive you; amend, and he will help you.

038 But if ye will not humble yourselves, but bury such things, and keep silence, and go unpunished and unpunished, and yet persecute the poor Lutherans, and take it into your minds to subdue them, well, we will watch you. If a plague comes upon you (as it cannot be otherwise), remember that you have been sufficiently warned; you shall not be the first to overthrow God, that I truly know. I mean it heartily and faithfully, if I may move some of you, because I hope that there are still a lot or two in your Sodoma; the others, who remain unrepentant, should not only not recognize such abominations, so that they have deserved death more than a thousand times over, but should also strangle, drown, hang, and burn the innocent (who do not want to praise such vices and disgrace), as they do honestly.

39) Too many things will now fall to me; I will come again to the angular fairs, and save the abominations that now occur to me, until I see how you will mend your ways, or cleanse yourselves and burn yourselves white 1) on this imperial day; so then we will come with your right color, and offer you proficiat 2) if God wills.

Forty, Let this time be enough of the fair of the merchants' monkeys. Well, if they do not ver-but would be held in the best way and for God's sake, yet you teach and hold it for a sacrifice and work, so that one may serve God, and both for us and others, living or dead, be sufficient for sin, and the most for the dead, as we all know that the Mass must almost fight for the dead against purgatory. My suffragan bishop, when he made me a priest, and gave the chalice into my hand, spoke no other way than thus: ^weipo potestatom saeriūeancki pro vivis et mortuis. That the earth did not swallow us both was wrong, and God's patience was too great. The living had this because they believed that whoever saw a mass in the daytime would be healed, safe, and happy; this was the best and meanest custom of the masses, you cannot deny; therefore ask all merchants, and what had to go over the fields, and all pious citizens and burgesses in cities, least of all about the Rorate mass.

(41) Is not this terrible news? Do not your ancient Canons Apostolorum say that no one should be at Mass who does not want to communicate or receive the Sacrament? Has not Christ appointed it to be received, and finely to be remembered, to strengthen faith in him, saying, "Do these things in remembrance of me"? But ye keep silence from such remembrance, neither suffer them to do it, nor receive it; neither teach, nor exhort to faith, as Christ hath instituted; Let it be said that the minister has seen the mass, which ye meanwhile offer in secret, and so let the poor spectator's lies and false confidence remain in his heart, as if he had done well by his watching, and had approved nothing of the sacrament either bodily or spiritual, as Christ would have it, and his apostles after him. I say again, you complain that you are deprived of foundations and monasteries; for the sake of this abomination and blasphemous abuse of the masses, foundations and monasteries should be dealt with as Josiah king of Judah dealt with the altars at Bethel, so that not one stone should be left out of another; that would be just and right, if you would not amend yourselves in this.

042 Ye cry, What good thing is come out of the new doctrine of Luther? I must Ask you again: Tell me, what good thing has remained with you? Not one thing have ye left uncorrupted. You have disgraced the mass, our one supreme treasure, with innumerable idolatries and abominations, and have trampled underfoot the right Christian custom, disturbed the faith, and kept silent the word. Baptism has remained with infants, though clumsily and industriously enough; but as soon as the child has grown up and come to his senses, you have quickly strangled him, worse than the Turk does, and taken away his baptism again by your grievous penance and works, so that he learns to despise his baptism, now lost and nullified by sin, and henceforth to seek salvation by his own works; just as if baptism had been a transient work of man, as the Anabaptists teach, and not an eternal covenant of God. Tell me here, what good has remained with you? I will be silent as to what good has come of it; for we cannot keep our baptism, sacrament, gospel, faith, and Christ before you, because you have taught nothing right, but everything against baptism, sacrament, and repentance; that is in the day.

043 The advantage of the Turk is, that if a man be baptized, he is not taught against his baptism; but the evil Turkish manner and example is dangerous and grievous. And even if one turns against his baptism, it is good to resist, because the Turk is not a Christian and is despised by a Christian with his teaching. But here among you not only is the example and the nature dangerous, but you also teach against it, and storm against it with words and works, and do this under the name of Christ, as the dear fathers of souls and friends of baptism. This cuteth as a sharp razor, as the Psalm saith [Ps. 52:4]; which also St. Peter complaineth of you, 2 Pet. 2:18: "They speak glorious words, when there is nothing behind, and provoke by fornication to carnal lust them that were rightly escaped, and now must walk in error."

044 But the good that is come out of my doctrine is, that all such abominations and blasphemies of yours are brought to pass, and are condemned, which is too much and great good; though it be not so. And much more good cometh out of it daily, as shall follow: but with you all good is corrupt, and nothing abideth.

From the spell.

(45) Know ye first of all the great robbery and sacrilege, that ye have taken unto yourselves the great ban, which is called the excoīninunioatio la'or (which, after all, is the right of the temporal authorities), until the popes also took upon themselves to depose emperors, kings, and princes, and to make themselves temporal emperors. Let it be said to you, dear sirs, that this is not right; let your ban be called the little one, which shutteth up not the world, but heaven, and separates from Christendom and Sacrament, as Christ Matthew 18, v. 17, saith, "Hold him as a Gentile," 2c., and St. Paul 1 Cor. 5, 12, "What have I to do with them that are without?" 2c. If other pieces were to be mended, this also ought to be mended, for God is not pleased with any sacrifice or service that comes from robbery, as Isaiah [Cap. 61, 8.] says.

046 This is the custom of excommunication, and shall be, to punish public vices, as robbery, adultery, fornication, murder, hatred, usury, profanity, and the like, as our Lord Christ teacheth, Matt. 18:17, that excommunication shall pass upon them that will not obey the church, or his congregation; as the church teacheth not otherwise than God's word 2c.

47. Now say, what good and old things have remained with you from the ban? What new and harmful abuses have arisen here? I will be silent, that you have banished, cursed, damned, and strangled innocent, pious people for heretics. The ban is nowhere to be used, except to collect interest and debt, and to inflict much misery on poor people. For you know to some extent what the knaves, officials, and commissioners have done here, and we will hereafter (if you do not do so at this Diet) set you a calendar of such virtue, so that you may realize that we have understood your abuse in this, and report it to the whole world.

048 But in the place where the excommunication should have its right power and use, it hath been a plenary indulgence and a blessing, has not been cut at all, namely with the bishops, canons, yes also with the popes and cardinals themselves. Here I would like to hear a canonist-doctor who would show me how many times, according to the canons and spiritual laws, the pope, cardinals, bishops, priests, monasteries and convents are condemned and cursed for sin and other misdeeds; but who keeps them evil? The declaration stands with them, and is thus called: Whom we will have in the ban, he is in the ban; whom we will not have in the ban, he is not in the ban. So continue, my lords, if your will is to be called right, Christianity may well have such bishops and popes.

(49) And I would know what you ought to be thought of. You do not want to be Christians, because you do not want to suffer Christ's word and order; neither do you want to be papal, because you want to keep the canons and spiritual laws much less, since they are much more difficult to keep than the gospel. But is not this a strange new newspaper, that papists do not wish to be papists, and yet pretend to be papists? that they wish to have the goods and government of the churches, solely for their own convenience, and not for the benefit of the churches; these are inconsistent things. Well, then, be epicurean and Turkish, that you certainly are. But because you are Epicurian, and yet cry out so miserably now that the monastery and priory estates are so rapped, I must therefore hold a secret friendly conversation with you.

(50) It is true, and I do not like it either, that such goods are so torn up and scattered; although the non-Lutherans do this most of all, and have more of it than those who are called Lutherans, as can be proved. And I especially dislike it where bad boys get it (as I well know), who do not deserve it; for those who work and serve faithfully, I do not want to make a conscience of whether they get anything out of it. But I would like to have an answer to this, because there are obviously two kinds of monastery thieves and monastery robbers, which among these two should be called the worst. Some are external, some are internal; the external are the wicked and unworthy, as I said above; the internal are the unworthy.

are the bishops, canons, and monks themselves, who sit in them, namely, who misuse such goods for all immorality and fornication, and brazenly transgress their endowed status, and send great sums of money to Rome, even greater knaves, and so shamefully plunder the monasteries with them.

051 Thinkest thou not that the emperors, kings, princes, and lords, which have endowed such bishoprics and monasteries, if they had intended to endow with them whorehouses, or churches of robbery to the Romans, would have been so sensible, that they would have stood otherwise, and not have assigned their money and goods to harlots and knaves, nor to Roman thieves and robbers. Because such fellows sit in monasteries and convents, and use such goods by persons whom the founders neither intended nor willed, and thus, contrary to their will and endowment, they possess such things, consume them blasphemously and destroy them disgracefully, and for this they are highly cursed in excommunication and insanity: Tell me, then, which are the worst robbers of foundations and thieves of churches; and thou shalt see the pope sitting on high, together with cardinals, bishops, canons, abbots, and monks; for they keep and do nowhere that for which they were founded, but straightway the contradiction, as the foolish, taking and using the goods as they will. If thou canst see the mote that is in another man's eye, and cry out for the plucking of spiritual goods, the beam that is in thine own eye (which thou wilt not see) ought to be shown thee also. If thou canst say one thing, thou must hear another also, that thou mayest know that other men also have eyes, and feel, and smell, and hear.

052 If therefore ye pretend that yours shall not be taken from you, of a surety yours shall not be taken from you: but I will play with you your spiritual law, which judgeth, and banisheth, and curseth, and departeth you, and saith, It is not yours; it is called espousal. For ye have not kept your pen and your law, and have thereby deposed yourselves. Therefore ye have long since lost the goods according to your own right, but have hitherto, like the damned robbers, held them with iniquity. For, should you decinir the verdm vsponatur per oiuiw8 perLOiE and conjgireu, where would pope, cardinal, bishop, and canons remain? it would certainly become a vordum impersonale, which no person would keep. But if it seems fair to you that people should be patient with you for not keeping your rights, let it also seem fair to you that you should be patient with those who, as unrepentant Simonists and banished robbers, take away your goods or do not let them follow, because they have your own rights here, that is, deponatur. Let it be done, then, that what is yours, that is, fornication and fornication, may be left to you; but what is not yours, that is, interest and goods, let it not be left to you, but let it be taken from you as from robbers and thieves.

(53) I do not want to defend anyone here; (1) each one sees for himself from what merit or cause he needs such goods. However, I make a distinction between the ecclesiastical goods custom, against the screamers, and still say: If then the goods of the monasteries and convents are to be wickedly stolen into Rome, and outwardly consumed shamefully with harlots and knaves, and the opinion of the founders is so lacking, then I would rather that the emperors, kings, princes, and lords themselves kept them out, and invested them better, because that is certain, that the founders wanted to provide them with pious, chaste, Christian persons, not those who stand there and bleat, or wear hats, but those who study, read and pray, so that one could take learned people from them as bishops, pastors, preachers, schoolmasters, chancellors, scribes 2c., As was done at the beginning of time. But now they leave such office and works and despise them, even mock them and persecute them, and are variously banished: so I would not weep for them, even if they lost their pay and interest over it. It is said, Loimüomm proptor oZmium, but not, Lonoüemm proptoi- maloüoium, which teacheth your own law, and punisheth it with the most abominable ban, and calleth it Simonias.

054 Tell me now, what pope, bishop, monastery, or convent, hath hitherto ever repented, and

1) In the original (as several times later): "vertheidingt".

2) "Habich" - goshawk, hunting falcon.

Have they suffered because they have let such offices perish, or sought to have them restored? And yet they have used such benefices, and so lived, two-faced church thieves and double monastery robbers, for they have not only held the goods which are endowed to other persons, neither are they, but have also stolen from all Christendom, robbed, and hindered pious, learned, Christian bishops, pastors, preachers, and such needful persons, whom one cannot counsel, and yet they should have given, according to the opinion and will of the founders. Dear, the founders did not mean the Officia, that you wear a long skirt, choir shirt, plates, or put on cassocks and consecrated garments; sticks and stones can also carry that; they wanted to draw people, for the comfort and salvation of Christendom.

055 Now if you will make a great noise that the monasteries and convents are to be restored to you, and that everything is to be restored to you, then it is right to say to you again: Gentlemen, first give and restore your twofold robbery, namely, persons and goods; the persons you have robbed from Christendom, and the goods you have stolen from the founders. If you restore these things, so that the Officia are restored, then the Beueficia will follow you. For Christianity is more interested in such persons than in all the goods and glory of the whole clergy. If not, it will not be a good account, that you alone will calculate the expenditure, and the income will be charged; you should be called to calculate in a different way, and better look at your fists. You have taken the goods of the lords, to keep and to draw people with them; where are they? Reckon. Yes, it is you who make the poor boys' schools melt away, that Christianity may be ruined on all sides by you, but that your Epicurean belly may stand firm.

056 This I have said, that it may be seen what the judges of splinters gain by shaking their filth. Therefore think and pray to God that he may help you to do good in this Diet. The things are great and heavy, and alas, they lie sunk deep and covered with mud, so that the power of men and -joke may not create anything here. The ban is necessary; but, O Lord God, it must not cow gnats and devour camels, or nothing will come of it.

(57) I am well concerned that the matters of penance, mass, baptism, faith, and works are too high among you; therefore I have little hope that you will conclude anything pure in them, because your scholars themselves do not understand anything about them, and such matters must be preserved and driven by Christ himself and his Holy Spirit alone, without the help of men. For also, except the first Concilium, Apost. 15, 4. ff., hardly one or two of them have acted. Wherefore I will further entreat, entreat, and exhort, that those things in which there may be no special illumination of the Holy Spirit, but which are comprehensible and certain in all Christians, may also be known almost by reason. And first of all:

Of both forms of the sacrament.

(58) Know ye well that the One Form is a grievous novelty, contrary to the clear, bright words of Christ, and contrary to the ancient custom of all Christendom, as all this is mightily signified unto you by many Scriptures; yet ye great enemies of all novelty have not only accepted and kept the blasphemous novelty, but have also defended it with abominable raging and persecution out of pure courage, tempting GOD to the utmost, blaspheming and condemning his word. God grant that you may atone for it and submit your mind to his word. You cannot keep it with any Scripture; if you keep it with pure iniquity and violence against the Scripture, it will not end well in the end. And it is of no avail to you that you should preach that nothing new should be done, nor that anything should be changed; for you have heard that this is a new thing, and that you are the ones who have brought forth new things and changes in Christianity without ceasing. And that which is changed according to the word of God is no innovation; let all custom give way to it, how good they are, speak your own law. God and his word are older than you are, and will be younger and newer than we and you are, for it is eternal.

To change and govern the new, and not to be changed or governed by the new or the old.

059 You pretend that nothing should be changed or added without the consent of the church. Who then is the church? If ye be the church, shew your seals and letters, or else prove it by deeds and fruits. Why are not we also, which are baptized as well as ye? teach, preach, have the sacraments, believe, pray, love, hope, suffer more than ye? Or are you the church because you impose vain novelties, change God's word about them, blaspheme, persecute and murder, and in addition have monasteries and convents as church robbers? Yea, ye feid the church of the devil, which is a liar against the word of God, and a murderess, as she seeth that her God the devil is also a liar and a murderer. For the true church must be the one that keeps God's word and suffers for it, as we do (praise God), and does not murder anyone, nor lead anyone away from God's word. Therefore you shall not say to us much, Church, Church, Church; you shall make us sure that you are the Church, that is the point. The devil also may say, I am God; worship me, Matt. 4:9; the wolf also may say, I am a shepherd, Matt. 7:15; John 10:1; we ourselves know that the church is to be obeyed, but we ask who and where she is.

(60) God help you to amend this article; if you do not, by the grace of God we will still do it as before. And I want to say more: If it is God's will that you neglect something in this Diet, we do not want to take it from you as if it were right now because of your neglect and wrong until now. No, you should be far too lowly for us, that in your arbitrariness and power should stand when and how long God should be true or a liar, and when or how long his word should be right or wrong; for that would have been too high, and according to the end-Christian hope would have raised you above God and his word, and revoked all our teachings and doings; But we want to force it from you by God's word, and have driven it from you as blasphemers, persecutors and murderers, that you humble yourselves before God, confess your sin, murder and blasphemy against God's word, and amend it, as those who have done wrong until now, persecuted God's word, and are innocent of any wrongdoing.

Blood have you shed. We do not want such sin and vice to be hidden, nor do we want to be silent and cover ourselves up, and make ourselves partakers of such abominations, or do we want to put a full stop to what is there, and stand with you at God's word, which you are pursuing. For, as I said at the beginning, we have no need of your Diet and no need to close it; we stand where we stand without your help, even against your raging and raging; but for your sake and for the sake of the poor people, we hereby do what we do, if only you or some of you could help us and advise the people, to the glory of God and the benefit of Christendom.

Of the celibate state.

61 Celibacy, that is, the celibate state or forbidden marriage (as you know), is also one of your papal novelties, contrary to the eternal word of God and contrary to the old blessed custom of Christianity, also contrary to the creature and creation of God Himself; thus is fulfilled the prophecy of Daniel in the 11th, v. 37, where he speaks of your king: "He will respect neither God nor the love of women. It must ever be a great vice (not to love women), because the prophet here denounces it for a special abomination of the end-Christ, next to idolatry. The old translatio has: erit in concupiscentiis loeminaru[n]i: he will be in love with women. But this would not be an endchristian virtue; but must therefore say: Lrit in concupiscentiis masculorum, though he means the same also when he says: Äüetnm erZa mulierW non euradit, which is the right text.

(62) Gentlemen, if you wish to be pious and do good, make yourselves repent of all the desolate, unspeakable wretchedness of fornication of all kinds in all the world, which has arisen from this cursed papal novelty, 1) which also lies and remains on the neck of all of you, if you do not do and change it. Ye hear here, that it is an endchristian abomination and plague to despise the love of women, that is, to despise marriage.

1) Marginal gloss: In the past, the canons were harshly opposed to the pope, especially those of Menz, because in Erfurt they would almost have slain their archbishop. Viäs ONron. OsrinuniaS. For God created women to honor and help men, and therefore He wants such love to be unbidden and unregarded. The flesh and the devil teach us to use women only for dishonor, to disgrace one after the other, as your new, laudable, celibate (I would almost have said dishonorable) state has done until now, and still does. That is not to love women, but to love and seek fornication and dishonor in women, and to hold them not as women, but as whores, and to respect them, so that no one may love them or value them. But God wants them to be held and respected like women, and to do this gladly and with love, that is, to have them conjugally and to remain with them with conjugal love. This pleases God, but it is art and grace.

033 Know ye also that the sixth commandment is, Thou shalt not commit adultery? This commandment, like all the others, makes no distinction between persons: whether they be clergy or laymen, priests or laymen, they shall not commit adultery, that is, they shall not touch another man's wife. But because every man committeth adultery with another man's wife, it is certain that every man shall admit his own wife: lest any man touch another man's wife, he shall be compelled to have one of his own. Now if it were true (as the dear Canons blaspheme) that a priest could not serve God by loving his own wives, then this sixth commandment would have to be ill-conceived, and not generally apply to all kinds of persons, and permit them to have their own wives.

64. For so I would say of other commandments also, Thou must not have thine own money nor goods, else thou canst not serve God; when the seventh commandment, Thou shalt not steal, admits of thine own money and goods, but forbids strange goods; yea, that one steal not, it is forbidden to have thine own goods. So I do not yet know whether there is greater danger of sinning with one's own money or with one's own wife. Avarice, mammon, and their fellows are mighty indeed. But in sum, it is a great folly of the Canon to pretend that one cannot serve God with one's own wife, and yet one can serve God with one's own mammon, money, goods, castles, and cities. The contradiction is true, that it is better to serve God with one's own wife than with one's own wife.

Good (though none hinders a Christian). For a wife is a thing to be had, and the care of her is to be had, and she is able to keep herself; but money is never enough, and she careth continually, without ceasing, how she may increase and keep it. But such care and love are the right hindrances to the service of God; which care a woman may take from the priest, that she may care for him, and make him serve God badly.

065 If any man should deceive against the fifth commandment, and say, Thou canst not have weapons, guns, and other weapons, and die before God; for thou mayest slay. The fifth commandment alone forbids killing, but permits arms and weapons, so that murder may be controlled, and it forbids having arms and weapons. But why do our unmarried holy men have both money and arms of their own, and build and fight confidently? Doth not this hinder them from worship? No; but a wife must hinder them. There was a man named Hans Worst, who made such a canon, one Hans Worst another; and he has deceived all the world, even all the learned men.

66. But the devil hath wrought this with this canon, that his wives which are not married have no wives of their own, but instead of them have wives, daughters, maids, and sodomites of all others, which they have not done in marriage. So also instead of their own goods (for it is hard to acquire them) they devour the goods of all the world, and spend them in idleness, which would remain afterward, when they should seek and acquire their own goods. So they have forbidden weapons, so that they may wield the swords of all kings and do with them what they will, which will remain when they should have their own. But wonder of wonders is it that these three things, namely, all kinds of free fornication, all kinds of avarice and splendor, all kinds of weapons and war, do not hinder these celibate saints from serving God, and a few pious wives hinder them.

Although the heathen poet confesses that charlatans and whoremongers do not like to take wives, I hope that you will take pity on the poor priests and pastors and let them marry, and that you will no longer be such shameful, murderous, mad canonists or jurists as you have been up to now. For your canons decree that a marriage priest should be suspended, that is, deposed from office. Thus you have interpreted it with your rough asses and bachants, that they should be hanged, drowned, stabbed, murdered, and chased away; you bloodthirsty and murderous bloodhounds are so utterly bloodthirsty and murderous that you are not ashamed to rage against and above your own right with all your might. If you will not show mercy when I say that it is on your neck, and you are oppressed by so much innocent blood, so much horrible vice and enormous wickedness, that God will hardly give you grace to do anything else but this, so that you will soon provoke your own destruction upon yourselves, as St. Peter says in 2 Peter 2:18, well then, you will still do what God wants, and not what you like.

(68) For the monks I know not how to ask, for it is well known that you would rather that they were all for the devil, God granting that they take wives or not; and not unreasonably; for two cocks on one muck do not suffer each other. They want to have the life that you have and would like to have alone; that is not for you to suffer. Therefore let them go, the rogues; let them not lead an episcopal nor a Roman life; it is only fitting for the church and the servants of God, as you are. May God Almighty graciously do more and better than you think, and provide us for you, amen. Otherwise the devil (I worry) will become abbot, and his mother abbess; without this being my hope and consolation, because you cannot live here forever, and one must always raise up new priests and pastors, so (whether God wills it) the young journeymen who come after will not burden themselves with your great, blasphemous oaths and duties to the dishonorable 1) state and other abominations. But if the

1) So the original. Wittenberger and Jenaer: ehelosen.

If parishes remain desolate, and the people without a word, and the monks are gone, then you shall see how long bishops and canons, monasteries and convents shall remain. There must be parish priests, if there were no bishop, nor canon, nor monks.

(69) Christianity has hitherto been preserved for so many hundred years without such foundation bishops and canons; it may well be preserved henceforth without them. Of course, at the Last Judgment, no Christian soul will be able to boast or testify that in so many hundred years one of its foundation bishops has ever heard the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, the faith, or a gospel, or learned it, or felt or enjoyed some episcopal office or work. We have hitherto, before Luther, lived ourselves as if we had no bishops at all, and must still live so. So I know for certain that all the world must say that before Luther's teaching they had no more of their bishops than they have now, and now and no less than they had before, except for the rudger and the estimation of money. They cannot feel nor notice whether they had bishops before, or have none now, so that nothing of episcopal works and office has gone to them. That is, having diligently waited for souls, they now seek to wait again.

(70) Yes, they say, I consecrate and ordain others in our stead who do this. They do not do this, but the suffragan bishop does it. Nor does he keep any episcopal manner or way, for he consecrates only the sacrificial mass, asks not a morsel about how and what one should preach, and what the people need to learn; therefore he is also satisfied when the priests can hardly read a requiem, then quickly smears his Chresem on the unlearned asses, and has them struck off. God himself creates preachers where they are, and thereby preserves his church. For the sake of the bishops and suffragan bishops, it would have disintegrated a hundred thousand times over long ago. However, that it has stood so badly up to now, and still stands, what is it but the fault of the foundation bishops, who sit in the apostle's place and in the episcopal office, and do none of these, let it all go to ruin? And now they cry out that they should be restored to their former rule; they seek the salvation of souls. It is otherwise a fine regiment, and seek well the salvation of souls; yes, the devil on their head (who also rides them), and all our misfortune on our neck, as happened to us before. It is a matter of princely nsum and ll? uuin; the episcopal office will remain with the pastors and preachers.

(71) Further, they pretend that we have people studying in high schools who are capable of preaching, and who will then be ordained from our ranks by the suffragan bishop. That is true; unfortunately, you let them study. So do the Turks and the Jews, let them study; what do they give or help? You, too, what do you give and help out of your endowed mammon, so that some one may study, as you are highly indebted? Yea, ye are sorry that high schools are. But there your breath stinks. Now ye are rid of the monks, or ever mighty, that ye cheerfully accept of the gospel; but ye would gladly be rid of the theologians and scholars also, they still lie in your way. If they were gone, then you would be the full masters of the priests. Then ye may again rise above kings and princes, yea, ye may even compel the pope himself, as he could not take you, that ye bishops alone should be gods and lords on earth. 1) That is where you are going, dear sirs. Is it not true, the secret council at Mainz, 2) since I could not be with you, the same quietly went on this way? Then we would have the world full of asses, and the churches no more word, nor pastorate. Oh, if you should have to study, then the benefices, which are taught in the seminaries to the high schools, will not become anyone's, unless he has first studied through other people's help; and if they are to become his, he must first buy and pay for them with a sum of money, and when he has paid for them, he is bound to howl and babble in the seminary, so that his studies and art do not grow into a preaching office or a teaching office. This is how you help Christianity.

022 But I presume that ye appoint others in your stead, (as ye do not,) to preach and to be bishops for your sakes: hear ye, I speak now of

1) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: we - would be.

2) See No. 826 in this volume.

Bishops, and do not speak of appointors. A farmer or a judge in a village, a city, or a prince may also appoint a preacher, but he is not a bishop. A bishop is one who feeds God's people. For it is written in Acts 20:28. 20:28, St. Paul's teaching to the bishops: "Take heed to yourselves, and to all the host, among whom the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, to feed the congregation of God, which he hath purchased by his own blood." If you were bishops, as your name and office demand, your hair would stand on end at this saying, and you would be as reluctant to be foundation bishops as I am to be a preacher and doctor, because you would not have it much better than I and my like. So also saith St. Paul, A bishop ought to be didacticus, 1 Tim. 3, 2 Tit. 1:9, that is, didactic, who hath always been occupied with teaching. But he does not mean bishops of princes, nor bishops of castles, but bishops of the church, who do the work, as (praise God!) many fine pastors do now, though they do not wear pointed hats, which the clogs and Niclas bishops 1) can also wear. For that you, as bishops, should look what is rightly taught, and do not know it yourselves, that is ridiculous. Yes, unfortunately not ridiculous, for we have learned so far what good your attention has done; as the above-mentioned pieces show.

(73) I have had to remind and admonish you, dear sirs, for this reason, that I see how you do not fear God, and do not seek repentance or remorse for your wicked ways, nor do you make a conscience of them, so that God may be greatly angered. For since we poor Lutheran wives have been taken, you let yourselves think that you have once seized a little piece of us, because you can find nothing else that you want to make use of, and so sweat and press us with it, that with it all your shameful, lewd whoring, all monastery robbery and monastery thievery, together with all the basic soup of your abominations and perverse, unbishoply abuses, deeds, vices, harm and ruin of Christendom should be hidden, covered,

1) "Niclasbischöfe," children's play bishops. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 675, § 14, and the note thereto.

2) Erlanger: all.

Be silent, beautiful, and praised, that ye henceforth, as the pure and innocent, whom no water grieveth, like unto the apostles themselves, may refrain from all violence. But proceed, good sirs, see that ye lack not. Speak not hoi; ye are not yet over the hill. How ye may cover yourselves and adorn yourselves, that ye have now seen. But ye have not yet seen how to strip yourselves of your beautiful bellows, and therefore to paint yourselves, that ye may spit upon yourselves. But do not be angry or defiant, for your cause is not as good as you think.

74. If you are able to take our wives, whom we confess before God with a clear conscience, and before the world not as our whores, but as our wives: you will never believe how masterfully we will cleanse you of your whores and stolen wives, whom you and we know that you do not have with a good conscience, and who must confess to you before the world no other than as your whores, and must have you called and judged as whoremongers and harlots, both before God and the world. Moreover, we want to strike out your Roman Sodoma, French marriage, Venetian and Turkish brides and Florentine bridegrooms, so that you may see and grasp that our marriage has smelled of your dishonorable chastity. And if perchance some of you are not guilty of such in all things, we do not inquire. Let the patron, the defender, the companion, and the comrades be considered as much as the self-inflicted, because they do not punish, banish, or avoid such vices (as the gospel and your own law teaches), but help and assist such malefactors, and rage against us beside them, and with such assistance make themselves partakers of all such abominations, and so are no better than the self-inflicted, Rom. 2.

075 For no heathen, no Turk, no pope, no emperor, nor any man on earth, hath ever put to death, or done, any man for the sake of marriage; and this is a new unheard-of thing, begun of you new bishops, who are the greatest robbers of foundations, harlots, and whore-hunters in your churches that are on earth. And do it not for chastity's sake.

but because you do not want to commit fornication and immorality, as you do, for you leave them unpunished. And no one can believe that you faithfully mean chastity by such punishment, since greater enemies of chastity are nowhere than you, who pursue it in your own bodies with all fornication without ceasing in the most shameful way.

Seventy-six: though such a thing is the least in comparison with the high common abomination, that ye are such bishops as aforesaid, and in time (if ye amend not) shall be made otherwise. For if we have godless whoremongers and enemies of God as bishops, we will also show them honestly to which churches they belong. For as long as you do not leave our marriage satisfied, you shall not have much joy and honor from your fornication and end-Christian bishoprics. If I die over it, there are others that can do better. In Snmma, we and you know that you live without God's Word, but we have God's Word. Therefore, our highest desire and most humble request is that you give glory to God, that you recognize yourselves, repent, and amend. If not, accept me; if I live, I am your pestilence; if I die, I am your death. For God has set me on you; I must be a bear and a lion to you in the way of Assyria, as Hosea says (Cap. 13:7); you shall have no rest from my name until you amend your ways or perish.

Therefore we offer you the choice. First, since ye cannot nor will not devote your episcopal office and work, as ye do not preach, nor comfort consciences, nor judge, verily, verily, with all your scholars, let us perform your office, which ye owe; Give us the gospel freely to teach, and let us minister to the poor people (who desire to be godly); yet satisfy and forbid not that which ye cannot, and yet are guilty, and others will do for you.

078 Secondly, above these things we will not desire anything of you, neither will we take wages of you; but, where God feedeth us, we will wait, that ye may have both labour and wages, toil and food.

Not that we have so great a desire to preach; for to speak for me, I would not hear a more sweet message, than that which deposed me from the preaching office; for I am so weary, because of the great ingratitude of the people; but much more because of the unmistakable vexation which the devil and the world impute unto me. But the poor souls will not; so there is also a man called Jesus Christ, who saith nay to this, and I will follow him, as he is more deserving of me. So now you (praise God) all know yourselves that the Lutheran preachers are pious, and do you no harm, but are more useful to you than all your and the pope's scholars. And more pious heretics you have never had, nor will you get more pious; pray God that they may remain with you.

79. thirdly, we will let you remain what you are, and teach (as we have done hitherto) that you should be princes and lords for the sake of peace, and leave your goods; which the Hussites and Viglephists did not do, nor do any fanciers or sectarians now want to do, so that you may see that you have not enemies, but great friends, even patrons, in us. For what harm is it to us, whether ye be lords and princes? If ye will not do what is right for yourselves, your station, and your office, then not we, but ye, shall give account: but keep peace, and persecute us not. For we ask no more, neither have we asked any other thing, but the free gospel. You can help us, and we you, to peace. If you do not, we will keep the honor, and you will lose both peace and honor.

80 Fourthly, ye may restore the episcopal constraint (so far as ye leave us free to preach the gospel); then also for my part I will confidently help and counsel, that ye may have some episcopal office also. And so you would have two pieces of episcopal office: one, that we and the preachers teach the gospel in your stead; the other, that you help to administer it with episcopal authority. We left your person, life, and princely being to your conscience and God's judgment; so we have never taken such constraint from you, you have never Let him himself fall. For since ye could not keep the indulgences and other unpleasant abuses with it, ye dropped it altogether, and would not protect our gospel, neither suffer it, but turn such constraint against us and against the gospel, he must surely stumble and become dull; for God hath not ordained him against fine word, but for his word.

81. Truly we cannot offer ourselves more and higher (than daily prayer, good will, and service, which without these we owe even to all our enemies), namely, we will carry out your ministry, we will feed ourselves without your food, we will help you to remain as you are, we will counsel you to have the upper hand, and see to it that things go right. What more shall we do? Verily we bear heavily; we have brought upon ourselves you, and the spirits of the wicked, and all the world, yea, all the devils; and there is none to help us. If ye will not help us, but press on, see that ye break not our backs in twain, and try not our patience. If you want to dampen the pious heretics who are carrying you, see where you stay. Unfortunately, the game is no longer in our hands, as it was before; the devil has taken it away from us; we can truly never help you; now help yourselves, too, and look not at yourselves, but at the common heap and the dear peace; it is high time, we also want to do our best. And if there be any pious heart among you, it cannot fail to perceive from this whole scripture, that I speak and must speak the truth, and mean heartily to you and to every man; for I cannot do more, because ye have wicked things too well.

022 Whether any man thinketh here that it is ridiculous to hear that the bishops of the foundations should govern the churches, because it is well known that they cannot, nor will they learn to do it, when St. Paul saith, he that presideth evil in his own house shall never preside well in the church; and we see before our eyes how the bishops preside over their foundations, and keep discipline, that they are impuniti lupunaria and latrocinii. Answer: I know, alas, that it is so; but that the wicked people may see, that we seek peace, and are not lacking, I can well suffer them to supply pastors and preachers' chairs with spiritual persons, and thus help to administer the gospel. I would rather that the lack were in them than in us, and God has ruled before through evil men, and done good; and I must think that now is the time when Herod at Jerusalem sold the priestly office, and the Romans also, and yet the service of God and the word remain. But if they will dampen the gospel, or even remain impenitent, let them stand their adventures; we preach what we will. Neither sit they so fast. If they have a desire for misfortune, God will soon raise up another coiner to overthrow them completely. If they do not want to be bishops in God's name, then let them be bathers in the devil's name, without our fault or cause. The Lutherans remain masters, because Christ remains with them, and they remain with him, even though hell, the world, the devil, princes, and all things should become nonsensical.

But now it will become too much and too long to deal with more pieces. May God help you to proceed in this way at the Diet, so that we do not have to start everything all over again, for that is not good for you; so we would rather be spared the trouble. But so that you do not think that what I am about to say is loose dramatic words, I will tell you here, as much as I can think of now, about the pieces and articles that are being written on both sides.

(86) I will stop here, for who can tell it all in such brevity? But if one does not want peace, then I (or another better) can tell it even further, so that the dear canons and bishops do not think that the monks alone have sinned, and they are the pure kittens. Not so, I have not wanted to indicate more this time, for what has been the custom in the parish churches alone, which have been the least piece in your regiment, and despised beyond all measure, which you have also trampled underfoot. But if I should enter the<sup>1)</sup> monasteries, cathedral churches, official houses, convents, and preachers' chairs, and then to the mendicants, stationers, and finally to the sophists in the high schools: God help me, I am not surprised that you forget such baseless abominations and now seek to adorn yourselves. But I have done it myself

(I have forgotten, and I did not mean that you were sitting there, where I see you sitting now. O now be silent for God's sake, and amend yourselves; otherwise it will become evil with you.

(87) It is true that among the above-mentioned pieces there are some that cannot be rejected, and some of them have fallen that I would not have wanted to fall, but they can easily come up again. And the best thing is that the fine Latin chants have remained, even though they are almost drowned out by the new sacred chants and are of almost no value; yet we keep them firmly and like them from the bottom of our hearts. And that I briefly speak my opinion, this is the summa of it:

(88) If one had let such plays remain a children's play for the youth and young pupils, so that they would have had a childlike image of Christian doctrine and life, as one must give children dolls, horses, and other children's work, and would have remained with the custom as one teaches children. It would have been a good thing for them to take hold of St. Nicholas and the Christ Child, so that they could give them presents at night, as our forefathers did: so it would have been a good thing for them to let Palm Sunday, Ascension Day, and the like go on and happen, because no conscience would have been confused with them.

(89) But that we old fools go about in bishops' hats and spiritual pomp, and make a serious matter of it, yea, not only serious, but articles of faith, that it must be sin, and torture the consciences, whoever does not worship such childish play, that is the devil himself. It follows, then, that all the above-mentioned plays, no matter how childish and ridiculous they may be, nevertheless seriously attack and corrupt the Christian faith and the right, necessary plays, as indicated above, as if there had been no other help, had such things been held. For we have unfortunately experienced that such children's and foolish games have been (and still are) played more seriously than the right main things. So we are now of the opinion: If we can help to preserve such children's games, which are tolerable, for the sake of the youth, without detriment to the right, serious main parts, then we will gladly do so. But that we should regard them as articles of the Faith should hold, and also in bishop's hats narrare, there nothing becomes from, anger and laugh who wants there.

(90) This I will have pointed out to you, dear sirs, for your friendly and faithful admonition, asking with the utmost diligence that you will earnestly call upon God together with us, that he may grant you grace and wisdom to do and act in these great matters, that it may be your honor and the salvation of us all. And take care that ye do not adorn yourselves, nor excuse, nor defend, nor use violence against your former wrongdoing. For what is the use of making more bad blood among the people? The hearts are already, and not without just cause, too highly embittered, that it is necessary to soothe them with humble confession and noble correction, to quench and calm them, and not to tear and tear further. For ye know, if it were not for the gospel, that your nature and state are fallen and corrupted out of measure and too much, even contrary to your own rights, that ye will not suffer your heads to be lifted up.

91. You also know that Pope Adrian himself confessed through his legate at Nuremberg that the Roman See was the cause of much misery, and he offered to amend. Why then will you be ashamed to confess this, and in addition stubbornly persist in your pride, neither yielding nor relinquishing anything, but having everything by force, regardless of whether improvement or annoyance results from it? For you know, or ought to know, that Christian government or violence, not to destroy, but to amend, is instituted by God, as Paul says, and is not to be a tyranny, but a service. So then we might again help you among the people. For I think that you will not be able to do without the Lutherans, as pious heretics, at the least without their prayers, if you are to accomplish anything lasting in any other way. But if you will go by force, stiff-necked and stiff-necked (since God is for you), I hereby testify, together with all who believe with me, before God and all the world, that our fault is not where your pride would be lacking, that you are reduced to ruins. Let your blood be on your head; we are and will be innocent of the following your blood and condemnation, as we have sufficiently shown you your iniquity, have faithfully exhorted you to repentance, have earnestly entreated you, and have most earnestly offered you all things that pertain to peace, and have neither sought nor desired anything else but the one consolation of our souls, the free and pure gospel, so that we may boast with a good conscience that we have not been in want. But may God of peace and comfort give you a fine Spirit, who will guide you and lead you to all truth, through our dear Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and thanksgiving for all his unspeakable grace and gifts for ever and ever, amen.

It was thought that this day the pope's supposed confession against our confession would be read out publicly, but it was a false rumor. Nevertheless, it is thought that they will no longer be forgiven. After that, as some say, terrible edicts are to follow. Though I cannot yet write anything certain of it, yet I have much news, that I easily believe we shall not receive a very gracious or mild parting. But do not cease to beseech our Lord Christ to incline the Emperor's heart to peace. Some indicate that it would not be unprofitable for us to appeal to the Council. But in a few days we shall know all. I am suffering from a very ugly cough, which I have contracted through sleeplessness several nights. Caspar Aquila, whom not only our friends but also the Bishop of Augsburg himself has honestly traced, will tell you what else is going on here.

The same bishop has also read your admonition to the bishop of Mainz 1) today in the Council of Princes without any hesitation. He takes care of us quite seriously; but how much he can accomplish, I cannot yet see. Hiemit GOTT befohlen. July 30, 1530.

1002 Des Joh. Brenz Bedenken, ob die Privatmesse nicht wegen der Eucharistie wiederhergestellt werden kann.

This concern is Latin in Cölestin, toi". II, x. 277 and German in Chyträus, p. 430. Here is another translation.

Translated from the Latin by Al. A. Tittel.

Although the Lord's Supper is to be partaken of with thanksgiving, it is not actually instituted by Christ for thanksgiving, but to comfort the conscience, and to preserve the body and soul of believers unto eternal life.

Reason.

(1) Gifts, whether human or divine, are given for the benefit and fruit of him who receives them. This is a selfish and shameful giver, who, in bestowing his gifts, looks only to his own benefit and not to that which receives them.

Now the Sacrament of the Supper is a gift which Christ distributes, since, according to Augustine, the Sacrament is a visible form of the invisible gift, that is, to say it more clearly, the Sacrament is a visible sign of the invisible gift. For grace was sometimes used by the ancients for a gift which is graciously bestowed.

So it is actually instituted, not that we present something to Christ when we enjoy the supper, but that something is given and handed to us.

2) Further, the bread which is distributed in the supper is the body of Christ, and the wine is his blood.

But as his body was not offered on the cross merely for thanksgiving, nor his blood shed merely for the remission and forgiveness of sins, so in the holy supper they are not merely distributed, that they may be signs of thanksgiving, but certain marks and evidences of the remission and forgiveness of sins.

3) Also, the promises are not actually given for the purpose of giving thanks to GOD, but rather that one might enjoy the things promised; that is, since God promised Abraham the increase of his seed, he did not actually seek this by awakening Abraham to thanksgiving (although this also came about), but that he might work faith in Abraham and justify him by faith. He also promised the kingdom to David, not that he should give thanks, but that David should possess the kingdom, from which thanksgiving arose in David, as the fruit of good works, not as the cause of the promise.

Now, in the supper promises of body and blood are made, or, if I may say correctly, present offerings are made. Thus the supper is instituted to receive something from God, not to give something to God, although it is the duty of a grateful person to give thanks upon receiving the gift.

4) Christ also saith, "This do in remembrance of me"; and Paul, "As often as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, proclaim the death of the Lord."

Now the proclamation of the Lord's death is not actually instituted for thanksgiving, but for the awakening of faith and the raising of weak consciences, just as the preaching of the divine word is not actually intended merely that we give thanks to God, but that we 1) be taught righteousness and receive comfort. It follows, then, that the Lord's Supper was not instituted for the very end to which the proclamation of the Lord's death is directed.

5) Likewise, as we eat common bread, that we may feed the body. For this is the main purpose of bodily eating, from which thanksgiving arises afterwards, not as the end (or final purpose), but as a consequence of the end.

6) And as we are baptized, not for thanksgiving, but for the washing away of the filth of souls, and that we may obtain blessedness by the bath of regeneration, although the gift of baptism is followed by thanksgiving in the believer: so also we eat the bread of the supper, the conscience, to speak thus, to feed, which after the food then looks to thanksgiving, not as to the end, but as to the consequence of the end.

7) Nor does anyone of the popes say, as much as I know, that the laity, when they communicate (or partake of the Lord's Supper), sacrifice to God, but rather they confess that they are sacrificing the holy em-pfahen. How then may the priests take and presume more of the Lord's Supper than the laity, since Christ instituted it for both, and dedicated it to one estate as much as to the other?

Revival of faith and consolation of conscience is the ultimate purpose of the institution of the holy supper.

Thanksgiving is the consequence (or that which follows the final purpose) of the institution of the holy supper.

Joh. Brentius.

1003 Philipp Melancthon's Judgment of the Mass, at Augsburg Anno 1530 in the month of July.

In Cölestin, tow. II, p. 278; the following number is also there. This writing is Latin also in the 6orp. Rsk., vol. II, 208.

Translated from the Latin.

(1) There may be five opinions of the mass, the two first of which are nefarious, and easy to be understood and judged, because they refer the sacrament only to the use of men, which does not suffer from the nature of a sacrament. For in the sacraments we have to do with God. The other three opinions have great dark controversy about them, and deal with the use against God, not merely against men.

002 The first opinion is, that the supper of the Lord is a banquet, which was instituted among Christians to signify a friendship thereby, because banquets seem to serve much for the foundation of friendships.

(3) Such is the opinion of good-minded and learned men, who compare this ceremony with the heathen customs. These do not think that it concerns the conscience, or serves to understand the will of God, but use it only as a sign or pattern to bind human society together.

(4) The other opinion is almost the same as the first, that the Lord's Supper was instituted as a sign of confession, by which Christians were distinguished from other nations, as the toga distinguished the Romans from others, or the habit distinguished the monks. So also the Zwinglian mob speaks everywhere of the use of the sacrament. They teach that it is instituted that we may show our faith before men, that is, testify that we are Christians. They also depreciate the dignity of the sacraments. And because these opinions speak of the sacraments in a worldly (bourgeois) way, and are easily mistaken-

If they can be stood on their own, they are considered to be appropriate. Thus they flatter the judgment of crude worldlings, who think that religion serves only for civil use and intercourse in human society, but not for the conscience and the heart's position toward God, so that there is no further use to be sought in it.

(5) Now follow the other opinions which teach the use of the sacraments against God, and seem more godly.

(6) The first is that of Thomas and others like him, which not only has brought a great number of still masses into the church, but also teaches that the mass is a sacrifice for the living and the dead. For the sake of ambiguity, we will not use one word, but will explain the matter.

7 Thomas therefore writes that Christ's passion was sufficient for original sin, and that the Lord's supper, or the mass, was instituted to make such a work sufficient for our daily sins, and to merit grace, not only for him who does it, but for the whole church, and especially for those for whom it is done. This opinion attaches merit to the work itself, and describes the sacrament thus: that it is a work deserving of grace, or God reconciles both him who does it and others, because of the mere act (ex opere operato), that is, if they are not already in grace, if only they have no intention of sinning.

(8) After this it was argued whether one mass is of as much use to many as one mass is to individuals. Answer. Now here they reckon up scales of merit. By a common merit, they say, the mass applies to all at the same time. They also say that it is valid for the whole church, even if he who says it is not in grace, as they say. By a very special merit, however, they say, it applies more to individuals. This disputation is found in Scotus. From these dreams have arisen innumerable fairs, foundations, accompaniments, and other many kinds of purchase fairs. It was thought that nothing went right where there was not first a mass that reconciled God.

(9) Luther punished this opinion of the merit of the mass. In this way he denies that it is a sacrifice; but otherwise he does not dispute about the name, whether the mass could not be called a sacrifice in some other way. For he wished to punish the common error which then circulated in the Church, but not to quarrel on account of the name. This opinion, however, can be most easily refuted if one understands the justice of faith.

10. first, Christ has paid for all sins.

nugthan, as the Scripture saith, "With One Sacrifice He hath made the saints perfect." And one must not tolerate in the church the blasphemy that Christ's suffering only paid for the mere debt of inheritance.

011 Secondly, Every man is justified by his own faith, Rom. 3; that is, not by the work of the mass, whether he do it himself or another. But they that ascribe merit to the mass, hold that a man is justified by the work of the mass, if he do it himself, or another; and for the sake of this work sins are forgiven, and by the same all manner of good things are obtained from God. For hence come the masses against pestilence, war, for prosperity, crops, 2c., which all fall away, when the righteousness of faith is considered. Since faith makes righteous, it is impossible for the living or the dead to be made righteous by the work of the Mass. And this reason is so important, when rightly explained, that it may be clearly seen from it that the opinion of reconciliation of God by the work of the Mass is ungodly and intolerable.

012 Neither do I think that there are many who would defend it in this present time, after the doctrine of the righteousness of faith has been brought to light. And if any man will maintain it, he can easily be refuted.

013 Therefore among men of understanding this opinion will not long be disputed, especially as it lacks the testimonies of ancient teachers. It is all a new and fictitious work, of which the ancient church before Gregory knew nothing. Perhaps there are some knaves and fools who cannot be instructed. But for the judgment of them I ask nothing. For this whole matter must depend on the judgment of wise and pious men.

1^ The other opinion is that of some newer people, who, in order to maintain that masses are necessary, and that one must remain in the old tradition of the church, also argue that the mass is a sacrifice. And yet they describe the sacrifice somewhat differently, namely, that it is not praised as a merit, because they see that this is in conflict with the righteousness of the faith. They have the opinion that the Mass is a good work that we do to give thanks to God. They believe that this ceremony was instituted by Christ to be always kept in practice in the Church, for two reasons: first, that the memory of Christ's passion and of history might be preserved; secondly, that by it our gratitude might be testified; as was done in Rome and other places.

The people of the city have set up games in other places in order to preserve the memory of brave men who have rendered outstanding services to the common good, but at the same time also to show the city's gratitude for this work. The mass is said to be such a work, and in this way they defend it as a sacrifice, although it is not a work that makes the one who does it or others righteous, but as it is a good work to give thanks often with words, to give alms often, together with others or alone: so also the mass is a good work that one must do often before God to show one's gratitude. Hence they conclude that the silent masses must be kept, because it is useful that there should be a certain number of priests who celebrate such a spectacle, as a certain number of sacrificers have been appointed in the law. If the people before Luther had had this opinion of the mass, and had not used it for gain and a pretext of merit, Luther might never have taken up this disputation.

(15) Now the adversaries mischievously disguise the vices of former times, and seek a pretence to subdue Luther, that, when they have suppressed him, that may again arise in the church by which they formerly made their profit. For they defend the silent masses for no other reason with the appearance of this other opinion than that it may have the appearance that they are keeping the church interest, of which they think that it is only endowed for the purpose of ordering masses, and that it is not rather given to the students in order to maintain them through the benefit of the church, and finally, if it is necessary, for the government and support of the congregations. Likewise, if the masses are kept under any pretext, the opinion of the merit of the mass, which brings so much profit, will soon fall into the hearts of the people again.

(16) I do not deny that the other opinion is more famous than the first, and has great predecessors. The ancients seem to have thought of the Mass in this way, who had no Masses yet. For these sprang from the delusion of merit. But if the bishops were to adopt the other opinion, they would have to abolish many masses, namely, the masses for the souls and other masses for sale. Such thanksgiving is useful only to him who does it; it is of no profit to others, and therefore no masses can be said for others. For just as giving thanks in words is a work that is none of another's business, so one man's mass is none of another's business, even if it were a sacrifice in this way.

017 But against the falsities of this opinion, we may conclude thus: If the Lord's Supper is a sacrifice which only certain people must make, then the laity must have no part in it. But now the laity as well as the priests partake of it; therefore it is not instituted to be done by a certain class of men. Therefore it is not an appointed sacrifice, which must be made by certain men in the church for and on behalf of the people, as in the Old Testament the sacrifices were made by certain persons.

018 If then laymen and priests have the same communion, what is the use of the silent masses? For then it is enough for each of the people to receive the sacrament in the common supper, when it is administered by one of the priests. For each one gives thanks for himself; therefore it is not necessary to hold silent masses, and to separate the thanksgiving of the people from the thanksgiving of the priests. These are the most probable reasons, which are put forth in many words, and yet are not improperly opposed to silent masses.

019 But other, more important reasons must be sought, and it must be shown that the Lord's Supper was not merely instituted, that it was done as a work before God, to show gratitude.

020 A ceremony without faith is not thanksgiving. Therefore the mass is no sacrifice to the church, whether it be done by a pious or a wicked man, as they are wont to say. For faith and confession alone is thanksgiving, as it is written, "Let us through him offer unto God the sacrifice of praise, that is, the fruit of the lips of them that confess his name." Much might be said here of the sacrifices of the Old Testament, by keeping them together the whole matter would become clearer. For the Canones have written from Moses, which is not rightly understood: An offering (or sacrifice) must make a sacrifice in the church. For they have thought that the legal service made righteous. So also now they dream that the work of the mass or supper is valid in itself, faith may be present or not.

021 Furthermore, every sacrifice is ours, which we present unto God. In the Lord's Supper, however, the body of the Lord is offered to us and grace is offered along with it; thus the supper is not a sacrifice. For the words of the Lord's Supper indicate that here the body is not offered to God, but is presented to us: "Take, eat" 2c. But this opinion will be still more easily refuted if we hold it against the third opinion which follows here:

022 The third opinion is Luther's, which I hold to be quite in accordance with Scripture, namely, that the supper was instituted, not that we might offer the body of Christ, but that something might be offered to us by it, namely, that it was a sacrament by which grace was offered to us, and by it we might be brought to faith, and timid consciences comforted.

(23) This opinion can first of all be proven from the name "sacrament". For "sacrament" is a sign of the grace promised to us. But since, according to the common usage of the church, the evening meal is called a sacrament, it follows that in it something is given us to strengthen our faith and to comfort our consciences.

024 Now it is certain that in the Lord's supper the body of the Lord is given us, and with it grace; therefore the supper is not a thing which we offer to God, or chiefly instituted to offer to God, but to comfort souls, and to receive grace.

Christ calls the Lord's Supper "a testament". But a testament means a promise in which something is given to us that we must accept in faith. So the Lord's Supper is not something we give to God, but rather something in which those who have a guilty conscience receive grace and comfort.

026 Christ saith also, Do these things in remembrance of me. But to remember the benefits of Christ is to believe that through Christ we have received grace and forgiveness of sins. For a remembrance without faith is useless, for even Jews and wicked men can remember a history in this way. Therefore, since memory is so much as faith, which knows that it has received grace, it follows that the supper was actually instituted to give us something that is received in faith.

(27) This third opinion is a great contradiction to the still measurements, for it is not possible to appoint a certain order or class of men to partake of the evening meal at a certain time. Men use it only when they want to comfort their consciences. But such emotions are not bound to a certain time. Nor is it necessary to separate the classes from one another; for a layman's taking or enjoying is nothing different from a priest's 1) taking. Why then, as if there were a great difference, should a certain estate be appointed to take the Lord's Supper, on account of the laity? What is this but a confusion of the spiritual office, that a single person hands himself the body of the Lord?

1) "Laymen" in the old edition instead of: "Priests".

028 And there is this vexation, that from such a spectacle the common man conceives that this work is a certain worship, by which God must be propitiated.

029 Perhaps someone would be surprised that there are so many different opinions about the use of a single ceremony. Answer: But there must have been many opinions in the church after the righteousness of the faith was lost; for since the learned men of God knew nothing of this, they dreamed that the mass was a work of justification, according to the first opinion; but this opinion is already destroyed.

30. The other still retain many, and there is a small and dark difference between the second and the third. But it is this difference. After the third, the supper comforts the conscience, and we receive certain benefits from God. After the second, a work is performed for God, like a work under the law, at the performance of which the conscience is only more shocked when it is in doubt whether it has sacrificed in a pure way 2c.

031 After the third, they are sent to the supper which have fearful consciences, that they may be comforted; as Ambrose also saith, Because I perish daily, I take medicine daily. According to the second, the work of the Mass can be done at all times, just as one can give thanks in words at all times. For this reason, according to this opinion, the silent masses are more easily defended, because they are thought to be works in which gratitude is shown, just as when one gives thanks orally; but just as one can give thanks for himself more often, so it seems that this work of the evening meal can also be done in silence.

(32) But here again the example of the church in Paul may be contrasted, that such a service was instituted without God's command. Likewise, since there is no difference between the thanksgiving of a layman and that of a priest, it is quite annoying that a certain number should be appointed to sacrifice, as if they did something different from the laity.

033 It were best to leave off all this quarrelling, and to have a common supper, wherein the body of the Lord should be given to them that ask it, teaching that the supper was instituted, first to comfort consciences, and afterwards for thanksgiving. For the thanksgiving of which the adversaries dream, not realizing that it receives at the same time something from Christ, is a hypocrisy.

034 Then is it a true thanksgiving, when consciences know that the benefits of Christ are done unto them, and they are comforted. Therefore in the third opinion there is more thanksgiving, and more certain, than in the second.

035 Finally, since the whole Christian doctrine embraces faith and love, the sign must also be related to both. Therefore, as I have said, it strengthens faith according to the third opinion. Afterwards, however, it must also serve to indicate the love and goodwill of Christians for one another. Thus these opinions may be united to some extent. If, however, any one should wish to maintain the second opinion by all means, in order that he may the sooner pass through the silent masses, he will have to refuse many masses, namely, all those which have been instituted for the dead. Likewise many others, because the common man thinks that there must be masses for everything that one seeks from God. When these masses will be stopped, there will perhaps not be so much dispute about other silent masses, which are truly for thanksgiving. For many would like to maintain a daily ceremony in the church to train and awaken the people to godliness, to which they think that this mass ceremony contributes much.

1004 Another concern of Melanchthon to Margrave George of Brandenburg, in which he asserts that the private mass cannot be permitted according to God's word. September 14, 1531.

In Oorp. Hei., vol. II, 538 from Pezel's Christian Concerns, p. 1. Walch has erroneously moved this concern to the year 1530. Compare Luther's letter to the Margrave on the same matter, Sept. 14, 1531, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1216. We give the text according to the 6orp. Rest. and have also completed the writing after it.

Whether to arrange the private mass again, so that the people visit the church the more diligently.

Sublime, highborn prince, gracious lord! Your princely... ..my poor, willing servants are ready beforehand. My lord! (Your Grace... (To Your F. Grace's question as to whether Masses that are not communicants are to be celebrated again, to bring the people into the churches, this is my humble answer: that Masses that are not communicants are not to be celebrated again in any way. And for this reason: the private masses are done, that one has held them as works, thereby giving forgiveness to others.

and eternal life, and to earn all sorts of other things by it. Now, the F. F. G. know that this error is most contrary to salvific doctrine and faith, and causes public idolatry, in that one hopes to become blessed through this work of the mass, and so such false delusion draws and turns the heart away from Christ to this work. Thus faith in Christ is suppressed and blinded, so that the heart cannot comfort itself, and does not know that with this alone we are to seek and attain forgiveness of sins and salvation, that we believe that God wants to be merciful to us for Christ's sake without our merit. And Christ ordained the Sacrament to build and strengthen such faith, that we should use it, not so that the work itself would make us pious, as our opponents teach of the Mass, but so that we should be exhorted by signs to awaken the faith that God is gracious to us, counts us pious and righteous, and wants to make us blessed for Christ's sake, without our merit. If private masses were to be instituted again, it would have to follow that they would again be a work to destroy faith and a service against God's command. For the people are accustomed to the mass, are also driven to it by false opinion, and would also be strengthened in such false opinion that the mass is a work by which they are to be saved. Thus they would again be turned away from the right doctrine of their own faith and the practice of it. For this reason, the E. F. G. do not want to be moved to reestablish the Mass, if they are not communicants.

But that the people come less to church, it must be considered that the mass would not help to drive the people to church. Good, earnest preaching should bring more people to church than the mass, and I think it is partly the preachers' fault that the people are not diligent, so that they do not do things usefully and earnestly in their sermons, nor do they exhort people diligently to God's word, to God's service, to prayer, to the sacrament.

I would also like the authorities to take serious care that the people are driven to church, especially on holidays, and that those are punished who are caught in public houses at the time when they are supposed to be in church.

That E. F. G. also desire to know how it is held here, I add to E. F. G.'s knowledge that no Mass is held where there are not communicants, and are here at Wittenberg and at many other places.

Otherwise, on holidays, there are always many communicants, and otherwise the churches are full. On weekdays, they preach and the students sing several psalms and litanies, and quite a number come to church. Otherwise, in the country, one finds that the people are generally diligent or industrious, according to the preachers.

I am sending E. F. G. the Apologia, again outgoing and improved, in which I have diligently acted the most useful trades, as äs rwttioatiois, and äs posnitsntia and äs Ni88a. Please, E. F. G. accept them graciously, and command me E. F. G. humbly. God keep E. F. G. always. Date Wittenberg, on sxaltatorim ornoi8 s14. Sept. 1531.

uther's two concerns sent from Coburg by the Mass.

The first concern is found in Cölestin, toin. II, p. 281 Latin, German here in Walch. De Wette, Vol. I V, p. 116, confines himself to saying that it can be read in Walch. - The second objection is likewise found in Cölestin, tona. II, p. 284; in Buddeus, p. 170, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 113. In Walch the conclusion is missing. We have retranslated the second concern after De Wette.

a. The first concern. July 1530.

I. Whether the papists would pretend to receive their corner masses, let a priest communicate himself, or give him the sacrament himself; just as the sick are reported, or communicated, singly in houses,

To which the answer is:

002 First, that it is not enough thus to speak and to do, but that they should have a clear word and command from God, that it should be so done; for without the word of God nothing is to be done in the service and things of God.

003 Secondly, it is a perversion of the priestly office which God hath instituted. For the sacraments are to be administered by the public common ministry, in the place of Christ and of Christendom. Now a single person, in contrast to himself, cannot have or need a public or common office. If

But when the sacraments are given to the sick, this is done out of the ordinary office, just as if the sacrament were otherwise taken from the altar and brought to one in the corner or behind the church door; and thus the office here remains intact in its work.

(4) Thirdly, it is well known that the papists do not pretend this out of devotion or desire for the sacrament, but to confirm their merchandising with such a pretense. For their devotion to God and His service is well known. And if they have a desire or devotion for the sacrament, they can have it properly, since there is no danger of such abuse; but if they despise it and want to have it in the wrong, dangerous way, it is publicly understood that they do not mean the sacrament, but their belly.

005 It is also an evil example. For even with the right to communicate oneself, one might say mass secretly alone; or, if he wanted to pretend to lie, he would have said mass secretly, and yet there would be nothing to it. This would be a disgraceful perversion, both of the office and of the custom.

006 And if their own communicating be nothing else than communicating as the laity receive the sacrament, and not a sacrificing; why then should a special state and order be set up for it, by consecrations and vestments and other adornments? Let them, like the laity, receive the sacrament unconsecrated and unclothed, and there is a superfluous, unnecessary distinction between the consecrated and the laity. In sum, priestly ordination would then be in vain, just as it would be in vain for a man to be elected pastor, that he might secretly read the Gospel, and teach or preach himself; for they give neither office nor distinction from the laity.

007 It is also unprofitable for one person to eat and drink by himself, and leave the rest to watch; to whom he saith, Take, eat, and drink; and saith not, I alone will take, eat, and drink, and leave you to watch. For as it hath been said, it is with the sick that they eat and drink with the meat, as it is given from the altar.

008 Christ also would have such a sacrament in remembrance of his passion, to be spoken of openly among the hearers. But such deviates make a silence of it, and call it a silent mass; for they teach the words of the sacrament to be spoken secretly, and to hide them from the people, which is contrary to the institution of Christ. 2c. But with the sick they speak them freely in public, and also preach them to the same. For a mass without preaching Christ will not have, and is also a mass, as a body without a soul, or a bag without money, a cask without wine.

b. The second concern to Spalatin. July 27, 1530.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace from the Lord! It is no less my opinion, my dear Spalatin, than that private masses should be retained, even under whatever pretence it may be. If those are pious who say that they must be kept for the sake of thanksgiving, they are challenged by carnal thoughts. There is no need for thanksgiving in the public mass; then, if any man will, in every work, at every time, in every place, so that the private mass is not necessary for it. For it is a danger and an annoyance, even if it were kept in the best of hearts, just as the ephod (Lpöock) of Gideon was [Judges 8:27]. Christ also instituted the public mass, and all the words are in the numerus of the majority, addressed and spoken to the congregation. It is not enough that one should say, I have a good opinion. One must say: I have the Word of God; for, as we have often taught, a thanksgiving and a new service without the Word must not be established, for we must be certain of a work to be done against God. In the same way one would say: I will become a monk for the sake of thanksgiving. Why do you not do this without the monastic state? Although I would allow it with regard to the monastic state, when and for how long do you think such monks will be? It is not in the capacity of human nature to worship God in this way.

The only way to love them is to seek thanksgiving through the monastic state or private masses; this will hardly be in keeping with the highest grace. Then the masses and monasticism are already rejected for the sake of abuse; therefore they must not be permitted to revive anew. He who is once evil is thought by mau to be always evil. "A thief is nowhere better than on the gallows." Nor can any godly man heartily approve of private mass, under whatever great name it may be praised.

About the traditions I have written to M. Philippus, then in the theses, 1) in which the opponents will find innumerable heresies, but also contradictions, because they are very sharp dialecticians, especially when they move outside those formulas: Homo currit, Plato murrit, which alone they have learned. The Lord JESus be with you and with you all, Amen. From the desert, on Wednesday after Jacobi [July 27] in the year 1530.

Martin Luther.

1006 The reasons why the Mass should not be kept, written by Philipp Melanchthon and handed over to Elector John on the evening before the Nativity of Mary [Sept. 7].

From Cölestin, tom. II, p. 284. also in the Oorp. Heck., vol. II, 353, where it is remarked: Melanchthon seems to have composed this writing not in Latin, but in German.

Translated into German by U. A. Tütel.

001 It is well known that the adversaries write and teach that the mass is such a work, which, if it be given to the living and the dead, earns and acquires for them not only forgiveness of sins and grace, but also all other good things, such as good health, victory, and riches, by the mere work.

002 Now since this is a manifest, gross, and injurious error, we cannot by any means resume and establish the still masses in our churches.

1) "D. Martin Lntber's Article of the Violence of the Eastern Church," which he wishes to receive against the whole -atan school 2c. St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 958.

(3) But it is not necessary to prove that this dedication is wholly contrary to the Gospel. For if works can earn us grace and make us righteous before God by mere works, ex opere operato, as they call it, then righteousness will not come from faith.

004 Now it is evident and evident from Paul's doctrine, that righteousness is by faith without all our merit and works.

005 Moreover, to give merit to the mass is just as if I said, This mass is Christ. For if the mass 2c. is a satisfaction for sins, what is Christ's death and suffering for? Let Christ's suffering be compared to the jugglery of a sacristan.

6th Then, since Christ has once paid a full ransom for all men's sins, as the Scripture says, "By one offering the saints are perfected," it follows that no further sacrifice or satisfaction is necessary.

007 Further, since Christ commanded that it should be done for his memory and remembrance, it follows that the sacrament is of no use or profit to those who are absent, since their faith is not awakened by the remembrance of such things. But since the dead are absent, and cannot be remembered, this whole doctrine must necessarily fall away.

008 Likewise the mass is specially instituted, that the word of God may be preached unto the people in such public assemblies, as Paul also saith, "Ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord. But such things cannot be preached to the dead.

009 Likewise, since the most holy sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord JESUS Christ is instituted for the use and salvation of the whole church, and there is no distinction between the lay and the priestly communion, it follows that it is most vexatious and a confusion of the ecclesiastical office if, apart from the common communion and assembly, people offer sacrifices and celebrate masses in silence, as if the priestly communion were a better work and something more meritorious than the lay communion.

010 Likewise, as the communion of one layman profiteth not another, neither is it of any use; so also it is clear, that the communion of the priests profiteth not another.

(11) Likewise, since in the sacrament Christ distributes and offers us his body and blood and all the other goods of the New Testament, it follows that it is not a sacrifice by which we give anything to God, but only receive what he presents to us.

From the Canon [of the Mass].

Since the dedication of other things is strengthened by the canon, we cannot approve or accept it, because it is completely contrary to the gospel. For if we did, we should thereby approve and confirm the cession.

1007. two treatises on the liturgy.

In Cölestin, tow. II, x. 287. The second is also German in Chyträus, p. 433. - Compare J. T. Müller: "Die symbolischen Bücher," p. 266. The first so-called treatise is also found inserted in the first draft of the Apology in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 518 f., though not literally, but almost sentence by sentence. Also in the Oorp. Uet., vol. II, 215.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

The first, from the origin of the word "liturgy".

(1) We will also add a brief explanation of the liturgy, by which some, in gross ignorance, would make the mass a sacrifice; but we say that this word in the least signifies no sacrifice, but the administration of any office or service, whether far or spiritual. Therefore it is often used for worldly burdens (imposts), e.g. interest, taxes, customs, and the like, hence it signifies also the tax (handout) so done to the saints. Paul used it in 2 Cor. 9, 1. and Phil. 2, 25. he says that Epaphroditus was the one who gave him a hand up in his need, where the word "liturgy" certainly does not mean a sacrifice.

2 Therefore, although this word is already found in the Acts of the Apostles, it does not follow that the mass is a sacrifice, for the text does not only commemorate the mass, but also reports that the apostles otherwise administered their office, by which not only the administration of the holy supper, but also other of their official duties, e.g. preaching, prayer, and other good works, are understood and indicated, so that they served the Christian community and did good for the church.

The other, from the liturgy, as the thing itself is explained.

I. The supper is the presentation of the body; therefore it is not a sacrifice, because something is given to us, whereas in the sacrifice itself we give something.

II. Is it a testament, wherein we are promised something?

III If it be a sacrifice, faith doth not make righteous.

IV. (One might also ask:) Whether such sacrifice consists in the meal, or in the elevation?

V. Likewise it is to be an assembly (synaxis), for Paul says, "When ye come together, wait one for another."

VI There is also (or ought to be) no difference between a layman who communicates and a priest. Therefore it is unnecessary to ordain priests to a silent (privatum) communion.

VII The priesthood is a state specially instituted for communion, but there is no distinction. Therefore it is a nuisance that the priest should say mass specially, because it is a special service.

(VIII) It is a confusion of office, when one communicates himself, even as when one baptizes himself. For a pastor communicates himself as a member of the church (that is, with others) 1) and has a double person on him, a special and a common one.

008 Melancthon's letter to Luther on questions of the traditions. The 14 July 1530.

In Cölestin, tom. II, D. 288; in Chyträus, p. 161; in Buddeus, p. 161 and rm Oorp. Rec. vol. II, 193.

Translated into German.

(1) I received two letters from you yesterday, and I confess with pleasure that you are very much ahead of us in this matter. You not only write more often, but also more pleasant things than we do. Nothing has yet been decided about us and our cause. Every day there are new assassinations; may Christ grant that they may bring peace. Eck, with his pile, has delivered to the Emperor a refutation of our confession. It has not yet come to light; but I hear from good friends that it is a long writing full of invective. Zwingli has sent a printed confession; one should swear he was quite mad. Of original sin, of the use of the sacraments, he evidently rehashes the old errors. Of the ceremonies he speaks quite Swissly, that is, most barbarically; he would like to have them all abolished. He pushes his cause of the Lord's Supper hard. He wants all the bishops exterminated. I will send a copy of the writing when I get it, for the one I have had is going around among the princes.

1) who in the beginning gave himself the supper. (Walch.)

(2) I send you the question of the statutes of men (tränitoribus), and ask you to write about it in some detail. For there is no matter that causes me more trouble in all our disputations than this, which seems to be the easiest. And indeed it is a small thing: the doctrines of men are but cords of conscience; they are held or abolished alike. We have one firm ground of justification; and the other of liberty, that we must hold even above external liberty, finds much offence. But I call this liberty, as Paul also keepeth the law among the Jews with. I have set forth four causes of the statutes of men, from which they are derived, that ye may the sooner see where I am lacking. For if such traditional statutes are kept without any sinful opinion of them, it seems that they are necessary to be kept because of the right of the authorities (x> otsstntis), but not because of any worship. For we see that the bishops do indeed rule by human right.

(3) In the matter of the mass and in the first list of the articles of faith, I think I have been cautious enough; but in the matter of the statutes of men, I am not yet satisfied with myself in this writing. I also believe that the adversaries will make a great noise about the spiritual orders. Farewell, the day after Margaret [July 14] 1530.

There may be five causes of the church statutes:

I. As if they were works that could propitiate God, as the world has believed from the satisfaction and many other ceremonies and the penitential canons.

(ii) As if they were necessary services, as in the Old Testament there was a continual service, with certain days and meat, and such like. This cause is little different from the preceding, but there is some difference, that it seems to include works which follow justification, together with a confession of faith. For this I call service and worship, and to this is added the condition of necessity; for I have said that a necessary service is made up, as in the law with perpetual ceremonies. Of these two causes it is easy to judge. For because they are ungodly statutes, they will surely be transgressed. And Paul alone deals with these cases; Luther, too, in the beginning dealt only with such. So it is easy to judge of this.

(iii) In the third cause there is nothing ungodly. When statutes are made for the sake of good order, "that things may be done properly," as, holidays, Sundays, the order of the readings at mass, and also that no one may distribute the Lord's Supper unless he be an ordained priest.

IV. The fourth cause also seems right, for the better, that a bodily discipline should be ordained for the rude and ignorant, as certain fasts, certain feasts. Not that the fasts are divine services, but bodily exercises, which keep savage, rough people, that they may be fit to hear the word.

V. The fifth, indeed, because of a service, but which follows faith, as the work of the Magdalene, the anointing of the feet. Thus the Maccabees ordained the consecration of the church, namely, a work by which thanks are given, which should be a testimony and mark of thankfulness and faith.

In the last three cases, the statutes can be safely and justly enforced. And in such a case the opponents may conclude that such statutes are permitted and commanded by the authorities, and therefore they must be kept, just as the Jews were compelled by necessity to keep the consecration of the church ordered by the Maccabees, and the Ninevites to keep the fast proclaimed by the king, just as the Jews were formerly compelled to keep that of Jehoshaphat. For we must confess that the bishops are authorities by human right, and therefore the statutes are binding, not because they are in themselves divine services, but because they are permitted works, and commanded by the authorities. It is the right of authority that is the problem here, not the nature of the work itself.

Here you will say, that there is not only cause why they should be omitted, because they run counter to the doctrine of justification; but also because the liberty given by the gospel cannot be taken away from us, as Paul kept the law freely among the Jews, only that he might offend no man. But this seems not sufficient, or is certainly very offensive to common people. For if obedience be necessary, there is no more liberty. For obedience and freedom conflict with each other. This knot must be untied. For that freedom seems to cancel out obedience altogether, which is not proper.

I also conclude thus: The Jews would have sinned if they had not kept the fast proclaimed by Jehoshaphat; the Ninevites would have sinned if they had not kept the fast commanded. Therefore also we do wrong if we do not keep the fasts commanded in lawful cases. For that Ahab should be reproached for having ordained a divine service is another thing. For he ordained a service to propitiate God, contrary to the doctrine of faith: but if he had ordained nothing contrary to faith, but according to it, as Jehoshaphat did, it should not have been transgressed.

So may it be said of the statutes of ours. For I admit that the bishops can rule according to human law. Answer me, therefore, whether the statutes, if they have been commanded in the three cases, must necessarily be kept because of the authority and command of the authorities, and whether such statutes bind the conscience?

Luther's answer to Melancthon on the questions sent to him about the statutes of man. July 21, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in 6o6. d, co. 72, and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 60. Printed in Cölestin, tom. II, p. 2891>; in Buddeus, p. 164, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 105. According to the latter we have translated.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! In your previous letters, my dear Philip, you gave me hope that as early as Monday of last week [July 11] you would have the answer of the Adversaries; by an edict soon to follow you would be released. Therefore, I almost certainly expected that you would return the same week. Now these letters show something else. But of that and other things another time.

Now to the disputation of the statutes. Five causes of the ceremonies are treated by you in proper wisdom. But where the knot is, and thou seekest it, viz. on the

1) The first refutation was delivered to the Emperor on July 13; but as he was dissatisfied with it, a second was drafted, and this was read on August 3 (De Wette).

The question of the person or cause of the statutes is a matter of dispute. For the question of the end is easy.

This is my opinion about this whole knot. First, since it is certain that these two governments are separate and distinct, namely, the spiritual and the temporal, which Satan, through the papacy, has extraordinarily confused and mixed together, we armies must keep a sharp watch and not allow them to be mixed together again, nor must we yield to anyone or consent to his mixing them together. For this would be to partake with thieves and robbers, for this is the saying of God, who commands that they be kept separate and unmixed, saying [Luc. 22:26.], "But ye not so."

Secondly. From this it follows that one and the same person cannot be both bishop and prince, nor at the same time pastor and householder. You understand here sufficiently what I want. I want to have the persons unmixed, as well as the governments, although the same person can represent both persons, and one and the same Pomeranian can be pastor and head of household. For I will not trouble the bishops, since there are still good ones among them. Thus the same person Conrad von Thüngen is Duke of Franconia and Bishop of Wuerzburg, although the Duke of Franconia cannot be Bishop of Wuerzburg. This I treat with so many words before thee, because thou knowest that our word hath dealt chiefly also with these effectual causes of the statutes, and not merely with the final causes, which thou hast enumerated.

Thirdly. A bishop, being a bishop, has no power to interpret any statute or ceremony to his church, except with the express or implied consent of the church. For the church is free and the mistress, and bishops are not to be lords over the faith of the churches, nor to weigh them down or oppress them against their will. For they are only servants and stewards, not masters of the church. But when the church has consented to be one body with the bishop, they may impose upon themselves whatever they please, provided that godliness is not violated. If the bishops do not seek this authority, so they want to rule and keep everything at their own discretion. We must not allow this, nor in any way participate in this impiety and injustice, or in the suppression of the church and the truth.

Fourthly. A bishop, as a prince, can still less impose anything on the church, for that would be to confuse these two powers altogether, and then he would in truth be one who reaches into a foreign office (allotriospiseoxus [1 Pet. 4:15.], and we, if we let him, would be guilty of the same robbery of the church. So against this iniquity and ungodliness we must rather leave our lives. I am speaking of the church, which is already separated from the secular polity.

Fifthly. A bishop, as a prince, may impose on his subjects, as subjects, whatever they think good, if it is only godly and permissible, and the subjects are bound to obey. For then they obey not as a church, but as citizens. For the church is also a twofold person in the same man. Thus, when Conrad of Thuengen commands his Franks, as duke of Franconia, to fast or do some other lawful thing, he compels those who acknowledge him as duke to obey, but not those who acknowledge him as bishop, namely, those who are under the rule of other princes, though they belong to the church of Wurzburg; just as Pomeranian compels his servant to obey his household law, but not his church of Wittenberg.

As for the king of Nineveh, you see that it is a mere secular commandment, regardless of whether there is a church or a pagan nation under him. Thus, if the emperor should command all in general to fast, even those who are the church will obey him, because the church is under the emperor according to the flesh, but it does not obey as a church. Likewise it is with king Jehoshaphat. But of the Maccabees it is clear that they did not institute their church consecration [1 Macc. 4, 59.] themselves alone, but the whole people unanimously consented. This very unanimity could also have annulled it, although here, too, there was much secular law involved, indeed, almost the whole of it secular, since, namely, the church was not consecrated by the people themselves.

ly the Maccabees ruled, and yet it is not decreed without the consent of the people.

Therefore, neither according to spiritual nor according to temporal law can we attribute to the bishops the power to decree anything over the church, however permissible and godly, because it is not necessary to do evil in order that good may come of it. If they should wish to enforce this by force and put it into effect, we must not obey or consent to them, but rather die for the maintenance of the difference of these governments, that is, for the will and law of God, against ungodliness and the robberies of the church. In addition, if they should say (which they will not do) that they would weigh us down at their peril, and be held by us as tyrants, and enforce that we should not resist the evil, 2c.: we must nevertheless resist, nor obey by any work, but do the opposite, because here not only the evil is borne, but ungodliness is confirmed, and the godly nature denied, namely, by the work itself and by acquiescence. But if they force us to fast by physical violence, that is, by taking away our food or keeping us in the dungeon, then the evil will certainly be tolerated, since we have not given our consent to it either by deed or word.

Here, however, I have thoughts that we might be endangered by their deceptions and false pretenses, namely, if they pretend that the emperor, as emperor, and they, as princes, want to have such things decreed, or that the statutes are maintained by the church, not as by the church, but as by subjects, and under this pretext revive and confirm that whole tyranny of confusion, and in this way keep the church nevertheless oppressed and subject under the episcopal power:

Here my opinion is that by the Word of God it is forbidden to believe them, because Christ forbids that the ungodly and the sinner be acknowledged as righteous, unless he has obviously repented, Matth. 18, 17: "If he does not hear the congregation, then stop him.

him as a heathen and a publican." Now, since the bishops are evidently guilty of this disorderly tyranny 1) and of the oppression of the church, they must not be believed, unless they have first, in manifest repentance, abjured and rejected the former laws, and all the facts which have proceeded from disorderly tyranny. If they refuse to do so, it is clear that they wish to remain unrepentant and unpunished, and to restore all their abominations with cunning and deceit, lying that they, as princes, or the emperor, as emperor, command it.

Let us therefore take heed that we walk carefully toward them, because they are full of all the deceitfulness and deceitfulness of their god, Satan, lest they take hold of some of ours, and afterwards leave a sting and incurable sobbing because of the church that is ruined and the abomination that is set up again.

One could grasp this fraud (if they wanted to impose it at all by force) with one's hands, if the bishop of Wuerzburg not only commanded those whose duke he is, but at the same time also those whose bishop he is; so, if the pope did not command only the subjects of his temporal dominion 2c. Thus far you may safely concede to the bishops the power over the statutes. If then 2) by any pretext the church were suppressed, it would be without our consent and without our fault, and I would that they would urge and demand it, that they should be admitted with their charters according to the custom of princes, but not according to the custom of bishops; but Satan will not do this, perceiving beforehand that his rope turns back against himself. Yet it would be well for Duke George, who would thus become bishop of Meissen and Merseburg and Prague, namely, by commanding in his name that the bishops should be obeyed, as if he himself had commanded it; but much better would it be for the Landgrave of Hesse, who would give nothing to the Mainz.

1) eontusa t'rannis, the tyranny which results from the blending of the spiritual and the secular regiments.

2) Here we have with the O06. . l'n. and Aurifaber turn assumed, instead of tantuin at De Anette.

except Hammelburg and Fritzlar, and nothing would be left in Thuringia but the episcopal court at Erfurt.

But these things you despise as coarse and rude. Nevertheless, they are worthy of being used to answer your impertinent and useless questions, since you see that those people want or can want nothing less than to rule the churches according to secular law, or to be taken for princes of the world. They want to be bishops, and if they did not want that, what would they be? what would they remain? That is why I wanted you to be a little calmer. You plague me too with your futile worry, so that it almost annoys me to write to you, since I see that I achieve nothing with my words. "I am foolish in speech, but not foolish in knowledge" [2 Cor. 11:6]. The Lord Christ be with you, amen. From the desert, July 21, 1530.

(1) The adversary's Confutation has not yet been delivered to us, and I hear that the reason for the delay is that they are emending it from the Emperor's Council and taking out the invective; but today I have heard from Campegius that it will come forth in a few days. If she will come out, then we will be able to conclude about our parting. For we want to ask that they grant us an answer to it; if they will do so, we do not want to stay long.

2 Erasmus has written to the emperor again, and has put up with our cause clearly, as far as priestly marriage, vows, and both are concerned. For he has reported these articles in particular.

(3) I am sorry to say, that ye are somewhat moved in your answers by the statutes of men. But I pray you, let my disputation be for my good.

hold. They are great things, and these are of little help to me. I am absolutely certain that the bishops must not burden the churches with their statutes, and I have written so in the Confession, and do not change the same. But I ask you of other things. I ask you to answer me, not from the causative cause of the ordinances of men, but from the final cause, which I have set for the fifth, namely, whether certain works, chosen by believers out of their own devotion, can be divine service? As if St. Bernard, who already believes in the righteousness of faith, chooses to do something certain, whether such a certain work can be a service to God, or such a work by which God is actually thanked and praised? For this is what Thomas calls

I hold that such a work is only a bodily exercise, and not a worship; as, if he fasts on certain days, the purpose of this work is really mortification of the body, not a worship, but a praise of God. For I am speaking of the most proper and immediate purpose, and I fear that St. Bernard is mistaken if he considers it to be a divine service. Thus, when St. Peter decrees that Sunday should be celebrated, I hold that the work is not a divine service, but has a bodily use, that the people should come together on a certain day. But Thomas is against this, and makes a divine service out of these self-chosen works. Likewise also he writes of the vows. Please, do not complain to speak to me of these matters in writing, since this is not without benefit. Hereby commanded by God. July 27 at Augsburg in the year 1530.

This letter is found in Latin in Buddeus, p. 175, from the Jena manuscript; in Flacius' Latin collection of letters; in Cölestin, tom. II, x. 292; in Chyträus, p. 168, and in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 122. German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 430b; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 117b; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 244; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 88; in Chyträus, p. 112 b, and in Walch. In all German editions the postscript is given as a separate document. We have translated it according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To Magister Philipp Melanchthon, his extremely dear brother.

Grace and peace! Now you are writing to me for the third or fourth time about the

Either I do not understand you, or you are arguing about an impossible matter, namely, whether Bernard, who is already well grounded in doctrine, can choose a certain custom and say, "This is to be the service, honor, and praise of God," or "It is to be used to give thanks to God. This is a quite impossible case, which involves a manifest contradiction. For to say: this is to be God's service or to be, does not stand with Bernhardus, but solely with GÖtte. Therefore Bernhardus, who stands right in doctrine, will never be able to say: This shall be God's service, or he will cease to stand rightly in doctrine. For what else would that be but to exalt oneself above GÖD and all worship? And what else does the first commandment and all the prophets forbid but such works services? For after all, the final causes may be wholly divine, much less permitted: but by this addition, "Let it be a service of God," 1) the greatest blasphemies and robberies of God are done by man, namely, as if man wanted to make GÖtt, or to teach in what manner He must be worshipped. Therefore (as you say) such a work is not a worship, but an exercise. This is also my opinion. Yes, I know for certain that without that addition alone it is an exercise, and with the addition it is idolatry. This is what I mean when I speak of the cause. For if the causative cause is not, then the final cause is necessarily a figment of my imagination (Obiinasra). You force me, therefore, to wonder, and to doubt altogether whether I understand you, since you so reject the causative cause and urge the final cause. I say still more: that very self-chosen work of Bernard, even without addition, is dangerous by its peculiarity and almost like an annoyance, as if all that is ours were not already sufficiently ordained by the general commandment of God for the service of God, that we are to do, speak, bear, and live everything for the glory and praise of God, and only that peculiar saint would have to come with his self-chosen work, without any

No need, without the word of God, to put on a show for us, as if he wanted to show us something better than what we already have, decreed by God, although nothing that a man may devise can nor should be considered equal to it. You will see whether I have understood you rightly; I could not think otherwise of your words now. May the Lord soon make you such people as will return. Greetings to all of us. The grace of GÖD be with you all, Amen. From the desert, 2) August 3, 1530. Martin Luther.

"My head is obstinate," as you say, but it is obstinate to me now in the highest degree, 3) because Satan thus forces me against my will to be idle and to lose time.

4) The church lacks the cause of laws.

1. there is no causation because no one has a right.
- (2) The final cause, because everything that is godly, lawful, honorable, and necessary to salvation is already commanded and ordained, and there is no other final cause.
3. the material cause is lacking, because things and external goods of the world do not belong to the church, but spiritual and eternal things.
4. the formal cause, because nothing better and more suitable could be ordained by the word of God, which has written everything with weight, measure, number and order sWeish. 11, 22/, than faith, love, cross, the ten commandments, precepts, promises.

Yes, reason does not comprehend the formal causes, as well as the material ones, nor the causative or final cause in the church.

1. the final cause of the laws in the church must be eternal life.

2) We have omitted "Coburg" with Flacius and Aurifaber. Only from September 23 Luther dates his letters from "Coburg".

3) "siMNkinniMSsimum". The A6NU8 neuter is explained by the eaput, which can be inferred from the preceding.

4) The Folget,de brings Walch as a special

2. the material, the sin and the sinner to be justified, the believer and righteousness before God.
3. the effectual, the Lord of eternal life.
4. the formal cause is the oral word, taught in the mind, recorded, not merely recorded on paper or uttered with the voice.

For what is the law of the church?

It is the Word, believed in the Spirit unto eternal life, given by GÖTTE. But these things do not rhyme with external laws. Tit. 1,1,2: The godly doctrine of the faith of the elect for the hope of eternal life, which is promised by God, who does not lie.

The question of laws is the most difficult of all, undertaken by many in many ways, but never solved by anyone. This comes

1. Of the imperfect knowledge of the spirit,
2. from the wickedness of men.

This letter is handwritten in Rhediger's collection of letters at Breslau, datirt August 4; in 606. öon. d, fol. 76, and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 76. Printed in the Latin collection of letters of Flacius; in Cölestin, tom. 11, p. 293; in Buddeus, p. 178; in Schütze, vol. II, p. 161, erroneously and without the conclusion from Börner's collection at Leipzig; and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 124. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 431; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 118; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 244; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 88, and in Walch. In all German editions the conclusion is missing. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

The grace and peace of Christ! I perceive indeed, my dear Philip, that thou wouldest not that thy final causes of the statutes should be despised by me. Therefore I protest again, first of all, that I also do not want my effectual causes of the statutes to be despised by you. "Take it well to heart; it is an important matter." It is nothing that any one should

1) VirZ. Lueolicm, Lei. III, v. 54.

And if there is no cause to bring it about, you know that it would be a great cause. Therefore, since neither princes nor bishops have the power to establish statutes in the church, it is nothing for them to boast that it is godly, that it is permitted, that it is an exercise, that it is thanksgiving, that it is discipline. God does not care about this, but demands His commandment. If, therefore, the causative cause is taken away, no abominations of the Antichrist could be resisted, since he would like to say: This is godly, this is permitted 2c. For who will be judge here, who arbitrator? The examples are there, on which they press, and will easily obtain it. It was godly to sacrifice his son after the example of Abraham; it was godly (said Muenzer) to kill the kings of Canaan and the Amorites, so let us kill. Therefore I do not depart from the effecting cause. That is the first thing.

Secondly, thy final causes are all impossible. For if I ask what are the godly or lawful things that are to be established by the statutes, you will say: thanksgiving, discipline 2c. But these are already established by the word of God. For GOD commanded to pray, to preach. To give thanks, to restrain the flesh, to instruct the people and the children. Now show me any work that is subject to the statutes. Will you mention purgatory, pilgrimages, brotherhoods, the service of the saints? These, of course, are without the word of God, but at the same time they are ungodly. Since there is no work that the statute could establish anew, it follows that it takes before itself a work already commanded by God, and presupposes, as it were, the category of substance, which it solicits, as they call it, and clothes with quantity, quality, where, when, to what end; just as giving thanks is a work of the statute, rather not of the statute, but of the divine command. But it becomes a work of the statute, in that the statute prescribes, at this hour, in this place, with this voice, stopping so long, in this dress, with these gestures let us do it. But these categories of accidental things God has in His works as free and in truth accidental.

But in no way as the essence (substantiam).

Now the disputation returns to its circle, that also no one can himself impose the accidental things (aeoickoutia,) on others, unless he be commanded, and he be called by God as the effecting cause, as when a man speaketh and executeth the ministry as by the word and power of God. This is my opinion of the statutes. But whether I understand you and yours, I do not know.

But when you mix into the statutes the service of your own choice with your Bernard, whom you assume to be right in doctrine and yet chooses a certain fast in order to give thanks, I do not call this a statute decreed by authority, but an act of the own choice of an individual. From this I judge that it is not lawful for St. Bernard to choose such a fast or order. For this particularity or order would be detrimental to the other orders and works of God, since all ours must be done in the name of Christ and for the glory of God. But that particularity would obscure everything by this dangerous example, and by an irritation harmful to the simple, and, as the Scripture says (Deut. 19:14), it would give offence to the blind.

But if even this trouble were tolerated, mitigated by this remedy, that at the same time it were taught (as it ought to be taught) that, besides this order of Bernard, any order of God was much holier than that of husbands, servants, parents, the state of children, 2c., and much more suitable to give thanks, and a thousand times more agreeable to God than this peculiar and self-chosen one: then it would not be to be feared that this self-chosen worship would get the upper hand. But this is not the point.

The summa is this: That it is not lawful to choose or invent any worship without an express commandment of GOD and a certain word. For so far we have taught, and rightly so. But what would that order of Bernard's be but in fact a service above and apart from what God has commanded, which would be entirely self-chosen?

Take this from me, as from one who guesses more at your opinion than sees it clearly. Perhaps I am so distracted by other thoughts that I do not quite see yours. Otherwise it is strange to me why you should ask about such things as if you did not know them, while I know that you understand all of ours in the best way. I hold that in all these things the causative cause is sufficient, namely, that Bernard should not choose or follow such a service, because he is not called to it, nor does he have any word of God by which he might become the causative cause. Otherwise, the service itself and the final cause would be holy in itself if it were commanded by the word of God, that is, in my opinion, it would become truly holy through the effecting cause.

There is nothing new here, except that a new house is being built for the emperor at Augsburg, so that he may remain in Germany for many years; and that Queen Mary will be given to the voivode as a wife. And the Turkish emperor sent to the emperor ten beautiful maidens (Iwroas) with eighteen horsemen, who brought many gifts on two mules, silver and gold vessels, to fortify the peace. Next, that there is great unrest among our people at Augsburg, namely Philip and Jonas and the whole company (eolleZium), and also sickness. It is to be wondered at that this, which I have said last, is thundered out with great clamor. This, which I hope will be unknown to you, being present, have I, as one absent, wished to denounce to you?) The Lord Jesus Christ be with you, amen. From the desert, August 4, 1530.

About the history of the origin of this writing and the most distinguished authors of the same may be read what J. T. Müller, "Die symbolischen Bücher der ev.-luth. Kirche" in the historical-theological introduction, p. HXX ff. has explained. - After Cochläus had printed a short summary of the Confutation soon after the Imperial Diet, it was not until 1573 that the first complete Latin copy came out at Cologne, in des Andreas Fabricius Ilaririouiu eoukesmoius ^UM8t.uuuu ckoetriuuu 6VuuA6li6U6 60U86U8UM llodirrmto. K. M., who, with a Christian spirit and zeal, sincerely desires and desires the honor of the most gracious and most powerful God, the salvation of souls, Christian unity and the common peace, honor, union and salvation of the entire German land, has not only read such Confession herself and, as much as was necessary, diligently reviewed it, but also, so that I. K. M. might be able to read it as thoroughly as possible. K. M. may proceed so much more thoroughly and bravely (as is befitting in such great matters), and act the high cause quite diligently, hand over to some learned, wise, proven and honorable men, from many countries, to inspect and examine the same Confession, and earnestly command and enjoin upon them what they must do in the Confession.

and catholic, should be recognized as good and praised; again, also, in which they did not agree with the Catholic Church, should be recorded, and thereafter handed over to their High Commissioner with their answer and concerns. Which was done correctly and properly. For they have perused the aforementioned confession with all diligence and fidelity, and have put in writing what their opinion is of each article, and have thus delivered their answer to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Which answer the Roman Imperial Majesty, as befits a Christian Majesty, as befits a Christian Emperor, has read through most diligently, and has handed over to the other Princes, Princes and Estates of the Roman Empire to read and examine. Which they have also acknowledged and confirmed to be right and catholic, and in full accord with the Gospel and Holy Scripture. Therefore the Imperial Majesty Majesty, after having heard the advice of the aforementioned Princes, Princes and Estates, so that all disagreement and misunderstanding in our lawful holy faith and Christian religion may be removed, has ordered such answer to be read in the present time.

To the articles which have been submitted by the Elector of Saxony and several princes and cities of the Holy Roman Empire, in matters concerning our holy and Christian faith, to the Roman Imperial Majesty. Majesty, this Christian answer may be given:

For the first. That in the first article they confess the unity of the divine essence in three persons, according to the command of the Concilii of Nicaea; such their confession is to be accepted, because it thoroughly agrees with the rule of faith and of the Roman church. For the Nicene Concilium, held under the Emperor Constantius Magus, has always been regarded as entirely pure and holy, in which three hundred and eighteen bishops, who were of holy life, martyrs, and highly honored, after diligent study of the holy Scriptures, decided and declared this article, which they all confess here, of the unity of the divine essence and of the Trinity of Persons. It is therefore to be assumed that they condemn all heresies against this article, the Manichaeans, Arians, Eunomians, Valentinians, and Samosatians. For these also the holy and catholic church formerly condemned.

II. In the other article of the Confession it is well supposed that they confess with the catholic church, that the fall of inheritance is indeed sin, which condemns, and brings eternal death upon those who are not born again by baptism and the Holy Ghost. For they in the right condemn the new and old Pelagians, whom the Church has long ago condemned. But the explanation of the article, that original sin is that men are born without the fear of God, without faith in God, is to be rejected altogether, because every Christian is aware that without the fear of God and without faith in God it is fine, more real sins of adults, than of a young newborn child, who does not yet need reason, is a pity. Just as the Lord says to Moses: "Your children, who today understand neither good nor evil" [Deut. 1, 39].

They also reject the statement that the fall of inheritance is evil desire, inasmuch as they hold that desire is sin, that sin remains in children after baptism. For these two articles of Martin Luther have been recently condemned by the apostolic see, the other and the third, concerning sin remaining in the child after baptism, and concerning tinder, which prevents the soul from entering heaven. But if, according to the opinion of St. Augustine, they called the original sin a lust, which ceases to be a sin at baptism, it is to be supposed. For even according to St. Paul's opinion, Eph. 2:3, we are all born children of wrath, and in Adam we have all sinned [Rom. 5:12].

III. There is nothing in the third article that is objectionable. For the same agrees entirely with the apostolic symbol and with the right rule of faith. That the Son of God became man, took on human nature in unity of person, was born of the virgin Mary, truly suffered, was crucified, died, went to hell, rose from the dead on the third day, ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of God.

IV. That in the fourth article the Pelagians are condemned, who hold that man by his own powers, excluded by the grace of God, could attain eternal life, is accepted as catholic, and according to the ancient Conciliis. For the Holy Scriptures expressly testify to this. John 3:27, John the Baptist says, "A man can take nothing, except it be given him from heaven"; Jac. 1:17, "Every good gift, and every perfect gift, cometh down from above, from the Father of lights"; 2 Cor. 3:5: "That we are able is of GOD, who hath made us able"; and Christ saith, "No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him that sent me," John 6:44.; and Paul, "What hast thou that thou hast not received?" 1 Cor. 4, 7.

But if anyone were to deny the merits of men, which are the result of divine grace, he would be more in accord with the Manichaeans than with the holy Catholic Church. For it is wholly contrary to God's word to deny that our works are meritorious. For Paul says, "I have fought a good fight, I have run the race, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me in that day," 2 Tim. 4:7; and 2 Cor. 5:10: "We must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ, that every man may receive according to that he hath done in life, whether it be good or bad."

For where there is reward, there is also merit, as the Lord also said to Abraham, "Fear not, Abraham; I am thy shield, and thy very great reward," Gen. 15:1; and Isaiah saith, Behold, his reward is with him, and his work is with him, Isa. 40:10; Isa. 58:7: "Break thy bread to the hungry, and bring into the house them that are in misery: then shall thy light break forth as the dawn, and the glory of the LORD shall take thee." Thus saith the Lord to Cain, If thou be godly, thou art acceptable; Genesis 4:7; and thus the gospel parable of the Lord's vineyard is explained, where he made us laborers, and became one with us daily for a penny. Who also said, "Call the labourers, and give them wages," Matt. 20:8. Paul also, who is aware of God's mystery, says: "Each one will receive his reward according to his work", 1 Cor. 3, 14.

Nevertheless, all Catholics confess that our works do not deserve anything of themselves, but that God's grace makes them worthy of eternal life. Thus St. John says: "They shall walk with me in white raiment, for they are worthy"; and St. Paul Col. 1:12: "Give thanks unto the Father, which hath made us able to the inheritance of the saints in light."

V. In the fifth article it is thought proper that the Holy Ghost should be given by the word and holy sacraments, as by instrument. For thus Apost. 10:44, it is written, "While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell upon all them that heard the word:" and John 1:33, "This is he that baptizeth with the Holy Ghost."

But that they here think of faith, this is so far yielded, as far as it is not of faith alone (as some evil teach), but is understood by faith, which is active through love (as Paul rightly teaches to the Galatians). For also in baptism not only faith, but also hope and love are poured in at the same time, as Pope Alexander proves, C. Nasorss äs daptismo. As also long before John the Baptist taught, speaking of Christ, Luc. 3:16. "He shall lute you with the Holy Ghost and fire."

VI. But that they confess in the sixth article, that faith ought to bring forth good fruits, is accepted with equity and pleasure. For "faith without good works is dead," Jac. 2. And the whole Scripture provokes us to good works. For the wise man saith, "What thy hand can do, do always for and for," Eccl. 9:10. And, "GOD [hath] regarded Habel and his sacrifice," Gen. 4:4. And [Gen. 18:19] God saw that Abraham would command his children, and his household after him, to love the way of the LORD, and to do that which is right and good," and [said:] "I have sworn by myself, saith the LORD, because thou hast done these things, I will bless thy seed, and multiply them, Gen. 22:16, 17. Thus hath God regarded the fasting of Nineveh, lon. 3, and the weeping and crying of Ezekiel the king, 2 Kings 20. Therefore all believers should follow the counsel of Paul, who says: "Therefore, since we have time, let us do good to everyone, but most of all to those who believe," Gal. 6, 10. For Christ says: "The night is coming, when no one will be able to work," Joh. 9, 4. For "their works follow them," Revelation 14, 13.

But that in the same article justification is attributed to faith alone is contrary to evangelical truth, which does not exclude works. For "glory and honor and peace to all who do good," Rom. 2; and David Ps. 61, Christ Matt. 15, and Paul Rom. 2 testify that God will give to each one according to his works. Further, Christ says, "Not all that say unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but they that do the will of my Father which is in heaven." From this it follows that a man may believe as much as he wills, but if he does not do good, he is not God's friend. "Ye are my friends," saith Christ, "if ye do whatsoever I command you." John 15.

Therefore they are not permitted to ascribe righteousness so often to faith, because this belongs to grace and love. For Paul plainly and distinctly saith, If I had all faith, so as to remove mountains, and had not love, I should be nothing: 1 Cor. 13.

St. Paul makes the princes and the whole church certain that faith alone does not make one righteous. Therefore he teaches that love is the chiefest virtue, Col. 3: "But above all things put on love, which is the bond of perfection.

Neither is it of any avail that Christ saith, If ye have done all that is commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; how much more shall they say it which believe alone? If ye believe all things, say, We are unprofitable servants. Therefore this discourse of Christ does not exalt faith without works, but teaches that our works, compared with the eternal reward, are nothing at all. Thus St. Paul says: "I hold that the suffering of this present time is not worthy of the glory that is to be revealed in us," Romans 8. For faith and good works are also God's gift, to which eternal life is given through God's mercy.

So also Ambrose, so dressed here, does not belong here, because St. Ambrose clearly declares himself of the works of the law. For he saith, Without law, understand: without law of the Sabbath and circumcision 2c. And this he tells Heller concerning the Epistle to the Romans Cap. 4, where he introduces St. Jacob of the righteousness of Abrahama, without works of the law, before circumcision. For how should Ambrose speak otherwise in his Commentariis, than Paul in the text, when he saith, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight," Rom. 3. Wherefore at the end he does not even exclude works, but saith, "We mean that a man is justified without works of the law."

VII The seventh article of the Confession, in which it is said that the church is an assembly of saints, cannot be admitted without detriment to the faith, if thereby the wicked and sinners are entirely excluded and separated from the church. For this article, condemned in the Concilio of Costnitz, is among other errors of the condemned John Hus, and is wholly contrary to the Gospel. For it was said that John the Baptist compared the church to a threshing floor, which Christ sweeps with his shovel and gathers the wheat into his sheds, but burns the chaff with eternal fire, Matt. 3. But what does the chaff mean other than the wicked, and the wheat other than the good? And Christ compares the church to a net, in which are good and evil fishes, Matt. 13; item, Christ compares his church to ten virgins, five of whom were wise and five foolish, Matt. 25. Therefore this article of the Confession cannot be accepted.

Ob-

But to praise this in them, that they confess that the church abideth for ever. For here is Christ's promise, that the Spirit of truth shall abide with her for ever, John 14: and Christ himself hath promised to be with her alway, even unto the end of the world.

This also is approved, that they hold that the inequality of the ceremonies does not separate the unity of the faith, so far as they speak of special church ordinances, in which every country may keep its own opinion and manner, says Jerome. But if they would extend this part of the confession to the general ceremonies of the church, it should be rejected altogether, and it should be said to them with St. Paul, "We have no such usage," 1 Cor. 11, for the general ceremonies are to be held by all Christians in unity, as Augustine writes to Januarius, which testimony they also adduce. For to hold that such ceremonies flowed from apostles.

VIII. The eighth article of the Confession, concerning the wicked ministers of the church and hypocrites, so that their wickedness does not interrupt nor harm the sacrament and word, is accepted together with the holy Roman church. And here the princes are praised for condemning the Donatists and all Origenists, who pretend that in the Word of God it is not permitted to receive the sacraments from wicked ministers. Which heresy afterwards the Waldenses and xauxsrss äs l'uAäuno have renewed, followed also by John Wiklef in England, and John Hus in Bohemia.

IX. The ninth article, concerning baptism, that it is necessary for salvation, and that children should be baptized, is praised and accepted. And the Anabaptists, who are seditious, are condemned, and are to be driven far out of the Holy Roman Empire, lest such a terrible and pernicious upheaval and bloodshed should again be wrought in praiseworthy Germany, as happened five years ago with the loss of many thousands of people.

X. The tenth article is to be tolerated, so far as the words are concerned, since they confess that in the holy supper, after lawful consecration has been held, the body and blood of Christ are essentially and truly present, if they only believe that the whole Christ is present under any form, that is, that no less Christ's blood is under the form of bread xsr oonooirätantiuni than it is under the form of wine, and again. Otherwise Christ's body in the Eucharist would be dead and without blood, contrary to St. Paulum. For "Christ raised from the dead, dieth no more henceforth," Rom. 6.

In this article of the Confession it is necessary to remember and add this, that they should rather believe the Church than some others who teach otherwise, that through the almighty Word of God in the Consecration of the Eucharist, the essence of bread is changed into the body of Christ. For thus in the general Concilio concluded, 0. l'inätsr äs 8th Prini. st üäs satUolisa. Therefore we praise those who expressly condemn the Capernaïtes, who deny the true presence of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Lord's Supper.

XI. That they confess in the eleventh article, that private absolution should be kept in the church with confession, is approved as catholic and conformable to our faith. For absolution is affirmed with the word of Christ, as he saith John 20 to his disciples, "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them." Yet two things are to be required of them: One, that the annual confession may be kept by their subjects, according to the Constitution 0. Omriis utriusque, Os xsnit. st rsmis. and according to common custom of the Church. The other, that they may by their preachers faithfully exhort their subjects how they ought to confess; though they cannot tell all their sins at once, yet, when they have diligently searched their consciences, they make a perfect confession of all their sins which occur to them in such reflection. But in others, which we have forgotten, and are not mindful of, we may make common confession, and say with David Psalm 18 s19:13,1, "Who can know how oft he sinneth? Forgive me the hidden faults."

XII. But that they confess in the twelfth article that those who have fallen may obtain forgiveness of sins at all times, if they are converted, and that the church should impart absolution to those who return, this is considered right and praised. For they with all fairness condemn the Novatians, who denied that after the first repentance one could repent again. And this is against the prophet, who promises God's grace to the sinner, at what hour he will be converted, Ezek. 18. 18 And it is also against the saying of grace of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which answered St. Peter, how often he should forgive, and said, Not seven, but seventy times seven times in a day shalt thou forgive."

But the other part of this article is wholly rejected. For in that they appropriate only two pieces of repentance, they are contrary to the whole of the general

This is contrary to the church, which from the time of the apostles held and believed that there are three parts of repentance, repentance, confession, and satisfaction. Thus the ancient teachers, Origen, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Gregory, Augustine, taught with Scripture testimonies, especially from 2 Sam. 12 of David; 2 Chron. 33 of Manasseh, Ps. 31. 37. 50. 101 2c. Therefore Pope Leo the Tenth, of blessed memory, has justly condemned the articles of Luther, who thus set: That there are three parts of repentance, repentance, confession, and satisfaction, is not founded in the holy Christian teachings. Therefore this part of the article cannot be admitted. Neither can it be said that faith is a part of repentance, since it is known to all that faith precedes repentance. For he that believeth not shall never repent. Nor is that part of this article to be accepted which despises repentance. For it is against the Gospel, against the Apostles, against the Fathers, against the Conciliarity, and against the whole Catholic Church. John the Baptist cries, "Do worthy fruits of repentance," Matt. 3. St. Paul gives, "As ye have given your members for the service of uncleanness, even so now give your members for the service of righteousness, that they may be sanctified," Rom. 6. He also preached the same to the Gentiles, how they should repent, and turn to God, and do worthy works of repentance, Acts 26. Christ also began to preach and teach, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," Matt. 4. He then commanded his apostles to preach and teach in this manner, Luc. 24, and St. Peter faithfully followed him in his first sermon, Acts 2. 2 Augustine also exhorts that every man should be in earnest against himself, that he, being judged by himself, may not be judged by God, 1 Cor. 11.

Pope Leo Magnus says: "The mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ, has given the church this superior power, that she should impose works of penance on those who confess, and admit those who have been cleansed by wholesome satisfaction to the communion of sacraments through the door of reconciliation. Thus Ambrose says: after one's conscience has been burdened with sins, one should impose penance. Various canons of penance are set forth in the holy synod held at Nicaea. The heretic Jovinianus thought that all sins were equal; therefore, he did not want to permit the inequality of penances for sin.

Therefore, the satisfaction in the church, against the Bright Gospel, of the conciliar and the The decree of the fathers is by no means to be relinquished. Rather, those who have been absolved by the priest should do the penance imposed, and follow St. Paul: "He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all unrighteousness, and purify for himself a people for his own possession, diligent to do good works. So Christ has done enough for us, that we also should be followers of good works, to fulfill the satisfaction imposed.

(XIII) The thirteenth article is considered good, inasmuch as they say that the sacraments are not ordained for the sole reason that they are to be the marks of Christians, but rather that they are to be signs and testimonies of the divine will toward us. But it is to be desired of them, what they here speak of sacraments in general, that they also confess this especially of the seven sacraments of the church, and provide that they may be kept by their subjects.

XIV But when they confess in the fourteenth article that no one shall administer the word of God and the holy sacraments in the church, unless he be duly called, it is to be understood that he is duly called who is called according to the form of law, according to the statutes and decrees of the church, which have been held everywhere in the Christian world. Not as Jeroboam called his priests, nor by the tumult of the common rabble, nor by any other disorderly intrusion. For let no man arrogate honour to himself, except he be called, as Aaron was. In this understanding the confession is accepted. But they are to be admonished to persevere in it, and not to admit any pastor or preacher, unless he be rightly called, into their lands.

XV. If they confess in the fifteenth article that ceremonies are to be kept in the churches, which can be kept without sin, and are useful for unity and good order in the church, this is accepted. And the princes and cities are to be exhorted to keep the church ordinances, both of the general church, and those which are kept in every country except ours, with all godliness and devotion, also in their dominions and territories, and to re-establish those which have hitherto been omitted. And to decree that everything be done in their churches according to the old way, and also to command their subjects to do the same.

But the appendix of the article, as being altogether false, shall be wholly taken away, that the human statutes, being instituted to propitiate God, and to do enough for sin, may be added unto the

The same is to be explained at length hereafter concerning vows, the difference of food, and the like.

The sixteenth article, of temporal authority, is gladly accepted, as being conformable, not only to temporal, but also to spiritual law, the gospel, the holy scriptures, and the whole rule of faith. For the apostle commanded that "every man should be subject to the authority that has power over him. For there is no authority without from God, but where there is authority, it is ordered by God. He who resists the authorities resists God's order. But those who resist will receive judgment upon themselves," Rom. 13:1 ff. And it is pledged that the princes condemn the Anabaptists, who destroy all worldly order, and forbid the Christians to have authority, and other civil offices, without which no civil community can be governed.

XVII The confession of the seventeenth article is accepted. For the whole Catholic Church knows from the apostolic symbol and from the holy Scriptures that Christ will come on the last day to judge the living and the dead. Wherefore they also justly condemn the Anabaptists, who are of opinion that there is an end of the damned and of the devil's torment. Who also, after the manner of the Jews, devise unto themselves a kingdom of godliness before the resurrection of the dead in this world, wherein they shall subdue all ungodly men.

XVIII. In the eighteenth article they confess the power of free will, that it has liberty to do civil righteousness, but has not power, without the Holy Spirit, to do God's righteousness. This confession is approved and accepted. For so it behooves Catholics to take the middle course, lest too much be given to free will with the Pelagians, nor all liberty be taken from the will with the ungodly Manichees; for both are unjust.

Thus Augustine says: "That there is a free will in man, we ought to believe with certain faith, and to confess without doubt. For it is an inhuman error to deny that there is a free will in man, which every man can find in himself, and which is often proved in the holy Scriptures. St. Paul says, "But he that hath power of his own will," 1 Cor. 7. Of the righteous, the wise man says, "He that might transgress, and hath not transgressed; he that might do evil, hath not done it," Sir. 31:10. God said to Cain, "If thou be righteous, thou art

But if thou be not godly, sin resteth at the door. But leave not thou her will, but have dominion over her," Gen. 4. By the prophet Isaias he saith, "If ye will, and hearken unto me, ye shall eat the goods of the earth. But if ye will not, and provoke me to anger, the sword shall devour you." This Jeremiah lately apprehended, "Behold, thou hast spoken evil, and hast done evil, and hast been able to do it," Jer. 3.

Let us also add to this the testimony of St. Ezekiel in the 18th chapter: "Cast away from you all your iniquities, that ye have transgressed; and make you a new heart, and a new spirit. And why then wilt thou die, O house of Israel? For I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, 1) saith the LORD. Therefore be converted, and ye shall live"; and St. Paul, "The spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets," 1 Cor. 14; and 2 Cor. 9, "Every man according to his will, not with unwillingness, nor of constraint. For a cheerful giver GOD loveth." Finally, Christ with One Word has struck down all the Manichaeans, when He says, "The poor ye have always with you, and if ye will ye may do them good," Marc. 14; and to Jerusalem, "How often have I willed to gather thy children under my wings, and thou hast not willed," saith Christ Matt. 23.

XIX The nineteenth article is also found to be right. For God, as the highest good, is not a cause of evil, but the rational and apostate will is a cause of sins. Therefore no one should impute his iniquity and sin to God, but to himself, according to the saying of Jer. 2: "It is the fault of your wickedness that you are thus punished, and of your disobedience that you are thus punished"; and Hosea the 13th: "Israel, you bring yourself into misfortune, for your salvation is with me alone." And David perceived in the Spirit that GOD would not have sin, Ps. 5.

XX. In the twentieth article, which is not so much the confession of princes and cities as the excuse of preachers, there is a clause which applies to princes and cities, namely, that good works do not merit forgiveness of sins; for as it was rejected and condemned above, so it is rejected and condemned again. For the saying of Daniel, which is very wicked, saith otherwise, Loose thy sin with alms, Dan. 004 And Tobias saith unto his son, that alms are a remission of all sin, and of that which is sinful.

1) "Godless" put by us instead of: "dying" in the old edition. For also in the Vulgate it is written: imxit.

And Christ: "Give alms, and all things shall be clean unto you," Luc. 11. If works deserve nothing, why should the wise man have said, "God rewardeth the saints their labour? Weish. 10. Why did St. Peter so diligently exhort us to good works? saying, "Therefore, brethren, be the more diligent to establish your profession and election by good works," 2 Pet. 1. Why should Paul have said, "God is not unjust, that He should forget your work and labor of love, which ye have shown toward His name"? Heb. 6.

By this we do not despise the merit of Christ, but know that our works are nothing, and are not meritorious, except in the power of the merit of Christ's suffering. We know that Christ is the way, the life, and the truth, John 14: but Christ, being a good shepherd, which began to do and to teach (Acts 1), hath given us an example, that as he hath done, so should we do, John 13: and hath passed through the wilderness by the way of good works, which all Christians ought to follow, and after his commandment to take up their cross, and to follow him, Matt. 10 and 16: and he that taketh not the cross cannot be Christ's disciple. And is it also true that John saith, Whosoever saith that he abideth in Christ, even so shall he walk, even as he walked, 1 John 2.

But this opinion of good works was condemned and rejected eleven hundred years ago, in the time of Augustine. XXI Lastly, they set forth the twenty-first article, in which they declare that the saints are to be remembered, that we may follow their faith and good works, but not that they are to be invoked, and that help is to be sought from them. Which is to be wondered at, that the princes and cities have tolerated that such error has been awakened in their dominions, which is so often condemned in the church, since eleven hundred years ago St. Jerome overcame the heretic Vigilantius in this matter. A long time afterwards the Albigenses, parixsrss äs l'Zänno, the Picardians, brought forth again this error, all of which have long since been lawfully condemned. Wherefore this Article of the Confession, for oftentimes condemned, is wholly to be rejected, and to be reprobated with the general whole orthodox Church. For that one should call upon the saints, we have not only the custom and authority of the general church, but also the consensus of all the holy fathers, Augustine, Jerome, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Basil, Bernhardt, and the other teachers of the Church, nor is this Catholic doctrine lacking in the testimony and authority of Holy Scripture.

For that one should honor the saints was also taught by Christ, when he said: "Whoever serves me, my Father who is in heaven will honor him", John 12. If then God honors the saints, why should we humans not honor them? The Lord also turned to the repentance of Job, when he asked for his friends, Job 42. Why then should not the pious God rather grant the request of the virgins Mary, because he granted Job? We also read in the Baruch at 3. Cap. 4. Vulg.], "O Lord, Almighty GOD Israel, hear now the prayer of the dead Israel." This is what the dead pray for us. So did Onias and Jeremiah in the Old Testament. For Judas Maccabaeus saw Oniam the high priest stretching forth his hand, and praying for all the people of the Jews. And afterward there appeared unto him an old glorious man, clothed in delicious apparel, and in a very glorious form beside him. And Onias said unto Judah, This is Jeremiah the prophet of God, which loveth thy brethren greatly, and prayeth always for the people, and for the holy city:" 2 Macc. 15.

We also know from God's Word that the angels also pray for us. Why then should we deny this of the saints? "O LORD of hosts," saith the angel, "how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast been wroth these seventy years? and the LORD answered the angel that talked with him with words of comfort and kindness. 1 Job also bears witness to this: "If an angel, baptizing one, speak unto him, to shew unto a man how he ought to do right, he shall incline unto him, and say, He shall be delivered, that he go not down to destruction," Job 33:23, 24. It is also evident from the words of the holy souls of John the Evangelist, where he saith, "Then the four beasts, and the four and twenty elders, fell down before the Lamb, having every man harps, and golden vials, and incense, which are the prayers of the saints," Revelation 5:14, and 8:3, 5:14. and 8:3. f. "And another angel came and stood by the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, the prayer of all the saints upon the golden altar before the throne: and the smoke of the incense of the prayer of the saints ascended up from the hand of the angel before God."

At last St. Cyprianus, martyr, writing a thousand two hundred and fifty years ago to the pope Cornelius, in the first book in the first epistle, requesting that whoever first departed should not cease to pray for his brothers and sisters. If the holy man had not believed it to be true that the saints prayed for the living after this life, he would have exhorted Cornelium to do so in vain.

Nor is this article of the Confession sufficiently confirmed by the fact that there is only One Mediator of God and of men, 1 Tim. 2 and 1 John 2. For although Imperial Maj. Maj. confesses with the whole Church that there is but One Mediator of salvation, yet there are many Mediators of intercession. So also Moses was a mediator and intercessor between God and men, Deut. 5, for he interceded for the children of Israel, Ex. 17 and 32. So St. Paul interceded for those who were with him in the ship, Acts 27. 27; so Paul himself desired that the Romans might pray for him, Rom. 15; the Corinthians, 2 Cor. 1; the Colossians, Col. 4; so that when St. Peter was in prison, prayer was made without ceasing in the church for him, Acts 12. 12. for which cause Christ is our chief intercessor, and the greatest. But because the saints are the members of Christ (1 Cor. 12 and Eph. 5), and they conform their wills to the will of Christ, and see that our Head, Christ, pleads for us, who can doubt that the saints do that which they see Christ do?

In consideration of all these causes, it is to be requested of the princes and cities, dependent on them, that they reject this little piece of the Confession, and hold with the holy general orthodox church, believe and confess of the holy honors and intercession, what the whole Christian world believes and confesses, and also at the time of Augustine was customary in all churches; As he says, the Christian people remember the martyrs with great devotion and glory, that they may be awakened to follow them, and be made partakers of their merits, and be helped by their prayers.

Response to the other part of the Confession.

Of both shapes.

That in the confession of princes and cities it is counted among the abuses that only one form of the sacrament is administered to the laity, and that therefore in their dominions the laity have both forms administered, from this it is to be answered: that according to the custom of the holy church this is not rightly counted among the abuses, since according to the same church usage and statutes it is more of an abuse and disobedience to hand both figures to the laity.

For under one form of bread the saints communicated in the first church, of whom Lucas says, "But they continued in the apostles' doctrine, and in fellowship, and in the breaking of bread," Acts 2. 2 Here Lucas thinks only of the bread. As he also says Apost. 20, "Now on a sabbath day, when the disciples came together to break bread." Yea, Christ also, the founder of this most holy sacrament, rising from the dead, gave under one form alone the Eucharist to the disciples that went to Emmaus, when he took bread, and blessed it, and broke it, and gave it unto them, but they knew him by the breaking of bread, Luc. 24. 24 Augustine, Chrysostom, Theophylactus, and Beda, some of whom lived many hundreds of years ago, and not long after the apostles' time, prove that it was the Eucharist. Christ Joh. 6 also often remembers the bread alone. St. Ignatius, St. John the Evangelist's disciple, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, remembers the bread alone in the "Eucharist" communion.

Blessed Ambrose does the same in the book of the Sacraments, where he speaks of the Communion of the Laity. In the Concilio Remensi, the laity are forbidden to bring the sacrament of the body to the sick. And there is no mention of the form of wine. From this it is to be understood that the sacrament is to be given to the sick only under one form. This is affirmed by the ancient Eunonss xosriitsntiules. For the Concilium Agathense thrusts a poor priest into the monastery, and gives him Communion after the laity. Osius, in the Concilio Sardicensi, forbids some of the wicked to take the communion of the laity, for they confess beforehand. Therefore there has always been a distinction in the church between lay communion under one form and that of a priest under two forms.

Which was finely foretold in the Old Testament, by the descendants of Heli: "It shall come to pass (saith God 1 Sam. 2), that whosoever shall remain in thy house, that he shall come to be prayed for, and he shall offer a penny of silver, and a morsel of bread. And he shall say, Let me to a priest's portion, that I may eat a morsel of bread." Here the holy Scripture clearly shows that the descendants of Heli, when the priesthood is taken from them, desire that they may be admitted to a priestly portion, to a morsel of bread. So also our laymen shall be admitted to a priestly portion, to a morsel of bread.

To be satiated with one figure. For even the Roman popes, cardinals, and all bishops and priests, besides the mass, and in their last, to take to the Viatico (as it is called in the Nicene Concilio), are satisfied with one form; which they would not do, if they thought that both forms were necessary to beatitude.

Although in former times in many churches both forms were given to the laity (for at that time it was free to communicate under one or two forms), yet, for the sake of danger, such a custom of giving both forms has remained. For if one considers the multitude of the people, there are old, young, trembling, sick, crippled; where great care is not taken, the sacrament could easily be dishonored by the pouring out of the wine (li<sup>n</sup>nitti). Also, in front of such a large crowd of people, it would be difficult to carefully pour a measure of wine from a chalice, and if it were kept for a long time, it would become vinegar, and give rise to disgust among the communicants, or cause vomiting, nor could it be carried around to the sick without danger of being poured out.

By these and other causes, no doubt from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the churches, when it was the custom for both forms to be given to the laity, have been moved that henceforth only One Form shall be given. And this is principally considered, that the whole Christ is received under one form, and not less under one than under two forms.

And so it was decided in the Concilium at Costnitz, and a decree was issued. Thus the Concilium of Basel lawfully decreed. And although it was formerly free to use one or both forms in the Lord's Supper, nevertheless, since the heresy arose which taught that both forms were necessary, the holy church, guided by the Holy Spirit, has forbidden both forms to the laity. For thus the church sometimes also uses repugnant statutes to restrain heresies. When those who disputed that only unleavened bread should be consecrated in the Sacrament were first raised, the Church for a time commanded that leavened bread should be consecrated. Since Nestorius wanted the ever-virgin Mary to be Christ's mother, and not God's mother, the Church forbade that she should be called Christ's mother. For this reason, the princes and cities should be requested not to introduce this rift or schism into the Roman Empire in Germany, and not to allow themselves to be led away from the common church custom.

Nor do the arguments introduced in this article prove anything. For although Christ ordained both forms of the sacrament, yet nowhere in the Gospel is it found that both forms are commanded to be used by the laity. But that Christ saith, Matt. 26, "Drink ye all of it," is told to the twelve apostles, the priests; which is evident from Marco, when he saith, "And they all drank of it." Which indeed is not yet fulfilled in the laity. For this reason it has never been customary in the whole church for the laity to be given both forms, although the custom may have been observed among the Corinthians and Carthaginians and some other churches.

But that they bring in Gelasius, oux>. Ooirix>6riiru8, äs oon866rutioii6, äi8t. 2nd: If they look at the letter, they will find that Gelasius speaks of the priests, and not of the laity. Therefore it is to be rejected that they say that the custom of giving a form is contrary to divine right.

And especially the appendix of the article, that the procession with the Eucharist should be omitted, because otherwise the sacrament would be divided, should be rejected. For they themselves know, or ought to know, from the Christian faith, that Christ is not divided, but is wholly under both forms, and that the Gospel nowhere forbids the division of the forms of the Sacrament. Which is done on the day of Paraskeue 1) in the common catholic church; although he who celebrates mass consecrates both forms, he also ought to take both forms. Therefore the princes and cities are to be admonished that they show due reverence and honor to the Lord Christ, the Son of the living God, our Redeemer and Savior, the Lord in heaven and on earth, because they truly believe and confess that he is present. Which they also know to have been kept with all devotion by their forefathers, the Christian princes.

From the priest marriage.

That they should refer to the celibate state of the clergy among abuses, and allow their priests to take wives, and advise others to take them: is it to be wondered at that they should call the priestly celibacy an abuse, since, on the contrary, the priestly celibacy is an abuse?

1) In writing No. 1000 in this volume, § 85 towards the end, we read: "Half Mass on silent Friday. "The explanation is given us in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 101: "On silent Friday half masses without (at) the figure of wine." - "Paraskene" - preparation day, the day before the Sabbath.

the transgression of the celibacy, and the improper admission to the married state in priests is to be called the very worst abuse.

For that the priests should never take wives is testified by Aurelius in the Concilio of Carthage, where he says: "That which the apostles taught by their example, and the ancients kept, we also ought to keep. And a little before this such a Canon is read: It pleases us that bishops, priests, deacons, and those who administer the sacraments, should preserve chastity, and abstain from women. From these words it is evident that this tradition was adopted by the Apostles, and not recently invented by the Church. Augustine, who followed Aurelio in the bishopric, in the last question of the New and Old Testaments, writes with these words, and asks: "If it be said, that it is right and good to be free, why then must priests have no wives? Pope Calixtus, a holy man and martyr, decreed thirteen hundred years ago that priests should not take wives. In the same case we read in the holy Conciliis, Caesariensi, Neocaesariensi, Africano, Agathensi, Gerundensi, Meldensi, Aurelianensi. And so it has been held from the time of the Gospel and the Apostles that no one in the priestly office is permitted by right to take a wife.

It is true that in the first church, for want of ministers, husbands were admitted to the priesthood, as is evident from the canons of the apostles and Paphnutii's answer in the Nicene Conciliar; yet those who wished to be free had to do so before they were admitted to the subdiaconal order; as is stated in 6. 8i Huis sorum, ist. 32. (32) This custom of the early Church has continued to this day, and has been retained by the Greek Church. But since by the grace of God the Church increased, that there was no lack of the servants of God in the Church, the pope Siricius, eleven hundred and forty years ago, no doubt not without the Holy Spirit, commanded perfect chastity to the priests, 0. riirios, aist. 28. which the popes Jnnocentius I., Leo Magnus and Gregorius Magnus have recognized and confirmed as right, and the Catholic Church has kept it everywhere to this day. From which arguments it is sufficiently proved that the celibacy of the clergy is not an abuse, because it has been confirmed by such holy fathers for so long a time, and has been accepted by the whole Latin Church.

There were also the priests of the old law at the time of their office and service in the temple of separated unto women, as Zacharias was in the time of his ordinance, Luc. 1. But because a priest of the new law shall always wait for his priesthood, it followeth that he shall always be chaste.

Further, the husband and wife shall not deprive one another of their duty, but only for a time (1 Cor. 7), that they may pray. Since a priest should pray for and for, he should also abstain from women at all times. These causes have attracted Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine.

St. Paul also says: "I want you to be without care. He that is without a wife careth for the things that pertain unto the Lord, as he pleaseth the Lord: but he that is free careth for the things that pertain unto the world, as he pleaseth the wife." Genesis 7. Therefore a priest, who is to please God forever, should avoid the care of a wife, nor look back with the wife of Lot, Genesis 19.

Further, priestly chastity was prefigured in the Old Testament. For Moses, when he received the law, commanded that they should not come nigh unto their wives until the third day, Exodus 19: Wherefore the priests, which should receive the lawgiver, Christ the Lord our Saviour, should come nigh unto their wives much less. Likewise the priests must wear linen garments to cover the flesh of the shame, Exodus 28, which was a sign of the future abstinence in the priests, says Beda.

When Abimelech gave the sacred bread to the sons of David, did he first ask them if they had abstained from women? David answered the priest, and said unto him, The women were withheld from us three days, when I went forth, 1 Sam. 21. Therefore they shall always be clean, when they take the living bread, which cometh down from heaven, Joh. 6.

Their loins were girded when they ate the paschal lamb, Exodus 12: therefore also the priests, which oft eat our paschal lamb, Christ, shall gird up their loins with abstinence and purity.

As the LORD commanded them, "Be pure," saith he, "ye that bear the LORD's vessel," Isa. 52. "Be ye holy, for I am holy," Deut. 19. Therefore the priests shall serve GOD in holiness and righteousness all their days, Luc. 1.

Therefore the holy martyr Cyprian testifies that it was revealed to him by the Lord, and earnestly commanded, that he should diligently exhort the clerics that they should not have a common habitation with women. Therefore priestly chastity, because it is commanded by the councils and popes, revealed by God, with its own arbitrariness.

vowed to God by the priest, is not to be rejected. For the high and excellent sacrifice which they perform, the daily prayer, the freedom and purity of spirit, that they may be anxious to please God, according to Paul's teaching, require such chastity.

For since it is evident that this is the old heresy of Joviniani, which the Roman church has condemned, and St. Jerome has subdued with writings, and St. For since it is evident that this is the old heresy of Jovinian, which the Roman Church has condemned, and which St. Jerome has suppressed with writings, and St. Augustine says that this heresy will soon be eradicated, and that it will not come to such a pass that the priests will be taken in and corrupted by it, the princes should by no means tolerate such corruption of the priests, which is to the everlasting dishonor and dishonor of the holy Roman Empire, but should much rather keep themselves in conformity with the general Church, and should not be moved by that which is brought before them against it.

For that St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. 7, "Let every man have his own wife, to avoid fornication;" to this Jerome answers, that he speaketh of him that hath not made a vow. As also Anastasius or Vulgarius understands this saying of St. Paul, "A virgin sinneth not if she be free." Here he calls a virgin who is not consecrated to God.

Thus to the saying, "It is best to be free than to suffer heat," St. Jerome answered sharply against the Jovinianum. For the same Paul saith, "It is good for a man that he touch no woman." For a priest has the means that he neither suffer heat nor free, but abstains by God's grace, which he obtains from God through intimate prayer and chastening of the flesh, through fasting and vigil.

Further, that they say Christ taught that not all men are fit for the celibate life: this is well true, therefore they are not all fit for the priesthood. But if a priest prays diligently, he will be able to grasp Christ's word of abstinence, as St. Paul says: "I can do all things in him who strengthens me," Phil. 4. For abstinence is God's gift, Wis. 8.

Further, that one pretends that this is God's order and commandment, Genesis 1, to which Jerome answered a thousand years ago with these words: "It was necessary to first plant a forest and let it grow, so that afterwards one would have it, so that one could build from it. At that time it was commanded concerning the bringing forth of children, that the earth should be filled. But because it is full, and so full that one almost crushes another, it is not commanded to those who can abstain.

They also boast in vain of the divine command. But they may prove, if they can, where God commanded the priests that they should take wives.

For this purpose it is found in the divine law that the vows once made shall be kept, Ps. 40 and 75, Eccl. 5. Why then do they not keep the bright divine law?

They also pervert St. Paul, who commandeth that a bishop that is elected shall be a husband, when St. Paul saith that he shall be the husband of one wife. Which is not to be understood that he should be a husband. Otherwise Martinus, Nicolaus, Titus, John the Evangelist, and even Christ would not have been bishops. Therefore Jerome explains these words of St. Paul: "That a bishop should be the husband of one wife is that he should not have had two wives in succession. The truth of this statement is not only evident from Jerome, whose authority should nevertheless be held in high esteem by every Catholic, but also from St. Paul, who writes of a widow: "Let no widow be mentioned under sixty years of age, who has been a man's wife," 1 Tim. 5.

The fact that they are finally attracting the Germans, who are opposed to celibacy, is a mere act and not a right. For when Emperor Henricus IV was at odds with the pope and his son and the princes of the empire, and made war, both human and divine rights were thrown into one heap. Thus, at that time, laymen were allowed to measure, to use dung for holy oil, to baptize, and to do many other things contrary to the Christian religion. The clergy also did too much with such disobedience, which cannot now be considered right.

It has not been wrong to divorce ungodly marriages that have been contracted against the vows and statutes of the fathers and councils. Just as today priests' marriages to their supposed wives are invalid. For this reason they complain in vain that the world is growing old, and that this medicine should be granted to the weak. For those who are consecrated to God have another remedy for weakness, namely, that they should avoid the company of women, that they should not walk idly, that they should discipline their flesh with fasting and vigilance, and that they should keep their outward senses, especially their eyes and ears, from all that is unseemly, and their eyes from seeing vanity. Finally, they shall keep their little ones, that is, the carnal thoughts, from the

They should stop their desires, call upon and knock upon the pious God for and for with true devotion. These are undoubtedly the most powerful remedies useful for the preservation of chastity in persons who serve the Church and God.

St. Paul rightly said that it is the doctrine of the devil for those who forbid marriage. Such were the heretics Tatianus and Marcion, whom Augustine and Jerome remember. But the church does not forbid marriage at all, and so it also counts marriage among the seven sacraments. In this it exists that, for the sake of the high office, it gives the ministers of the church a higher degree of purity. For it is false that a commandment of God is to be free, otherwise John the Evangelist, St. James, St. Lawrence, Titus, Martin, Catharine, and Barbara would have sinned.

Cyprian also, being attracted by them, speaks not of a virgin who had made a glorious vow, but of one who had undertaken to abstain from marriage; as the beginning of the other epistle of the first book sufficiently indicates. For it is certain in the opinion of St. Augustine that it is a crime for virgins who take a vow not only to be free, but also to desire to be free. For this reason, the abuse of the marriage state and the breaking of vows is by no means to be tolerated in the clergy.

From the fair.

What is set forth in this article of the most holy office of the Mass, which is in accordance with the holy Roman and apostolic Church, is accepted. But whatever is done to it, which is contrary to the common and catholic church observation, is rejected, because it greatly angers God, violates Christian unity, and arouses dissension and sedition in the holy Roman Empire.

For as much as the things which they allege in this article concern us, we are displeased first of all with this: that they, contrary to the whole Roman church custom, do not say mass and other church ceremonies in the Roman, but in the German language, for the most part. And that they pretend to do it by St. Paul's command, which is to teach that such a language should be used in the church as the common man can understand, 1 Cor. 14: if this were the mind of Paul's words, they would be urged to say the whole mass in German, which yet they do not do.

But because the priest is a common person of the whole church, not only of the bystanders, it's no wonder the priest says mass in Latin in the Latin church.

But the Latin language is also useful for the German to hear, if he hears mass in the faith of the church. And experience shows that there is far more devotion among devout Germans when they hear Mass in an unknown language than there is today among those who hear Mass in German. And if the words of the Apostle are rightly considered, it is enough that one who answers fills the place of a layman who says Amen. Which the canons also prescribe. And it is not necessary that he should hear and understand all the words of the Mass, or, if he understands them, that he should always pay the same attention to them. For it is better to understand and consider the end for which the Mass is said, namely, that the Eucharist may be offered up in remembrance of the passion of Christ.

It also serves to show that the apostles and their successors, according to the common opinion of the fathers, up to the time of Emperor Adrian, celebrated mass only in the Hebrew language, which was truly unknown to the Christians, and especially to the converted pagans. Even if the mass had been said in a language known and used by the common people at that time, it is not necessary now. For at that time many were daily converted to the Christian faith who knew nothing of the ceremonies and mysteries of the Christian churches. Therefore it was good for them to understand the words of the ministry from time to time. But now the Catholics are brought up from childhood in the habits and customs of the church, so that they can easily know what is to be done in church at all times.

But that they complain of the abuses of the masses, there is no understanding man that would not that the abuses were abolished. But that they which serve the altar should live of the altar, is not an abuse, but according to divine and human rights: for "who ever getteth on his own wages?" saith Paul, "Know ye not that they which offer eat of the sacrifice, and they which minister of the altar enjoy of the altar?" And Christ saith, "A labourer is worthy of his hire," Matt. 10.

It is, however, above all, criminal that in some places private masses have been abolished, as if, although they already have large pensions, they should nevertheless be held no less than others for the sake of profit. But by this abolition of the masses, the divine service is diminished, the saints are deprived of their honor, the founder's last will is broken and nullified, the deceased deprived of their suffragies, and the living devotion is distorted and perishes. For this reason, the abolition of private masses is by no means to be yielded to, nor tolerated.

Nor can it be sufficiently understood what is meant by the objection that Christ has done enough for original sin, and has instituted the mass for real sins. For this has never been heard of among the Catholics, and those who are now inquired of testify constantly that they have never taught it in this way. For the mass does not blot out sins which are cured by penance, as by a peculiar remedy. It removes the punishment for sin, fulfills pardons, increases grace, is beneficial to the living, and finally brings the hope of divine comfort and help in all concerns and needs.

That they further allege that Christ is not sacrificed in the Mass, which, being formerly condemned and rejected by the faithful, is altogether unacceptable. For this is the old heresy of the Arians, says Augustine, who denied that in the Mass a sacrifice is made for the living and the dead. And this is contrary to holy Scripture and to the whole Catholic Church. For the Lord, by the prophet Malachiam, preached the rejection of the Jews, the profession of the Gentiles, and the sacrifice of the Gospel law: "I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts. And the meat offering of your hands is not acceptable unto me. But from the going forth of the sun even unto the going down of the same, my name shall be glorified among the heathen, and in every place incense shall be burned unto my name, and a pure meat offering shall be offered," Mal. 1 Now there is no pure sacrifice offered in all places to God, but the purest eucharistia in the sacrifice of the altar. This testimony was used by St. Augustine and other Catholics against the unfaithful Jews, which is more true of the Catholic princes than all the opponents' counter-talk.

The same prophet, speaking of the future of Messiah, saith, He shall purify and cleanse the children of Levi as gold and silver, and they shall offer meat offerings unto the LORD in righteousness: and the meat offering of Judah and Jerusalem shall be acceptable unto the LORD, as it was before, and as it was many years ago. 3 Here the prophet saw beforehand in the spirit the children of Levi, that is, the evangelical priests, saith Jerome, that they should sacrifice, not in the blood of goats, but in righteousness. Therefore these words in the same spirit, that they might be written out by the prophet, are repeated in the holy canon of the mass.

The angel also said unto Daniel, Many shall be purged, and purified, and tried: and the wicked shall lead an ungodly life; and the wicked shall not esteem it, but the prudent shall esteem it. And from the time that the daily sacrifice is taken away, and an abomination of desolation is offered, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days," Dan. 12. That this prophecy shall be fulfilled, and is not yet fulfilled, Christ testifies, Matt. 24. Therefore, in the future of abomination, that is, of antichrist, the daily sacrifice of Christians will cease completely, as it has now ceased in part in some churches, and will thus sit in the place of desolation, when the churches will be desolate, and no horue canonicus will be sung in them, nor masses said, nor sacraments administered, no altars, no images of the saints, no lights, no ornaments.

Wherefore to exhort all princes, and the faithful subjects of the holy Roman empire, that they do not do, or forbear, thereby to prepare the way for such an utter impiety of the Antichrist, when the common, that is, the catholic church, as St. John saw in the Spirit, shall flee into the wilderness, having a place prepared of God, that there it may be nourished a thousand two hundred and threescore days, Revelation 12.

Finally, St. Paul says in Heb. 5: "Every high priest that is taken from among men is set apart for men against God, that he may offer gifts and sacrifices for sin." Since the outward high priesthood does not cease in the new law, but has been changed into a better one, therefore also this day the high priest and the whole priesthood in the church shall offer an outward sacrifice, which is none other than the Eucharist.

Here may be drawn, that in the Acts of the Apostles in the 13th chapter is read, according to the new translation, that Barnabas, Simon, Lucius of Cyrene, Manaches, and Saul sacrificed, which is not to be understood of the sacrifice made to idols, but of the mass, because it is called Liturgia by the Greeks.

And that the mass in the church was a sacrifice is abundantly attested by all the holy fathers. For Ignatius, a disciple of St. John the Apostle, says: "One should neither offer sacrifice nor celebrate mass without a bishop. And Irenaeus, a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, testifies that Christ taught the new sacrifice of the New Testament, which the church received from the apostles and offered to God throughout the world. This bishop, who lived soon after the apostles' time, testifies that the evangelical sacrifice is offered in the whole world. The same is taught by Origen, Cyprian, Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, Basil, Hilarius, etc., which words are omitted for the sake of brevity. Therefore, since the Catholic Church has always taught and held the same way from the time of the apostles throughout the Christian world, as it does now, it should also be held and maintained in this way everywhere from now on, without any contradiction.

Thus the saying of St. Paul to the Hebrews is not against the sacrifice of the mass, when he saith, "That we are sanctified by the one sacrifice of the body of JEsu Christ, which was once made." For St. Paul speaks of the offering of the bloody sacrifice, of the slain lamb, on the altar of the holy cross, which sacrifice was indeed once made, whence all the sacraments, and also the sacrifice of the mass, have their power. For this reason it was sacrificed once on the cross, by the pouring out of its blood, but today it is sacrificed daily at mass in secret, without suffering, as it was sacrificed in the Old Testament in an exemplary and figurative way.

Finally, that the mass is a sacrifice is given by the words themselves; for missa is not otherwise called than a sacrifice on the altar, which in Hebrew is nidsuok, and in Greek from sacrifice.

But it is sufficiently explained above that we are not justified by faith, but by love. But if there be found in the holy scriptures any such speech, the catholics know that it is said of faith, which worketh by love and good works, Gal. 5; and because justification is begun by faith, for it is the substance of things hoped for, Heb. 11.

Nor is it denied that the mass is a memorial of Christ's suffering and of God's good deeds. For the example of the paschal lamb, which was both a sacrifice and a memorial, has been proved, Exodus 12, and is represented in the Catholic Church not only with words and sacrament, but also with holy vestments and garments. But in memory of the sacrifice made on the cross, the Church offers the Eucharist in secret to God the Father Almighty.

Therefore it is not punished that princes and cities hold a common mass in their churches, if they do this rightly according to the holy canon, as all Catholics do. But that they all other masses have taken place, the Christian

Profession doesn't.

The fact that all the present communicated in the past is not punished. Would to God that they were all so skillful as to take this bread worthily every day. But if they think that one mass is useful, how much more would many masses be useful, which they have unjustly taken away.

In consideration of all these causes mentioned, it is to be desired that they completely abolish and discard the new form of keeping Mass, invented by them and now changed several times, and that they again adopt the old way of keeping Mass, according to the old usage and custom of the Germans and of all Christendom, and that they again establish the abolished Masses, according to the last will of the founders, in which they themselves can create all welfare and honor, and again peace and tranquility for the whole German country.

From confession.

As to confession, let it remain with the answer and opinion previously given in the XI article. For it is false what they bring forward from Chrysostom, who speaks of public confession, but they refer it to sacramental and priestly confession. Which his words plainly declare, since he saith in the beginning, I say not unto thee, that thou shalt openly betray thyself, and accuse thyself to others. Thus Gratianus and Longobardus answered three hundred years ago, and this answer becomes clearer from other oerterns of Chrysostom, as when in the 29th sermon he speaks of the penitent: He repents of sin in his heart, and confesses, and shows righteous humility in his works. This is fruitful and perfect repentance. Does he not here expressly set three pieces of repentance? So in the 10th Homily on Matthew he also teaches the appointed time for confession, and that afterwards the opened wounds of sins are healed by repentance. But how can sins be opened if they are not revealed to the priest by confession? Thus Chrysostom himself in many places refutes this opinion, which Jerome also completely overthrows, saying: "If the serpent, the devil, bites one secretly, and, since no one knows of it, poisons him with the poison of sins, if he is silent, who is wounded, and does not repent, and will not confess his wounds to his brother and master. For if a sick man is ashamed to reveal his wounds to the physician, the art of medicine, if it knows not, cannot cure the disease. Therefore

Princes and estates should much rather believe these excellent old doctrines, than the some gloss in the decree, which, however, has always been contested and rejected by the legal scholars.

Therefore they are to be admonished, because a perfect confession is not only necessary to salvation, but is also the noblest bond of Christian discipline and of all church obedience, that in this they conform to the orthodox church. For as Jerome testifies, the same is their opinion of the Montan heresy, which was condemned twelve hundred and more years ago, because they were ashamed to confess their sin. For this reason they should not follow the error of Montani, but rather the practice of the holy fathers and the entire Catholic Church, that each one in his dominions should command confession, as the most precious treasure in the Church of God, to be kept according to the rule of faith and all custom, even in their church.

Of human statutes.

The things which they have brought forward concerning the difference of food, and such like statutes, which they regard as contemptible, are to be rejected. For we know from the apostle that all authority is from God, and especially spiritual authority is given by God for edification. Therefore, by a Christian heart obedient to the holy church, the same holy catholic and apostolic church should adopt ordinances that serve the church, both to increase the worship of God and to restrain the lusts of the flesh, because they make it easier to keep the divine commandments, and are advised in the holy Scriptures; and he who despises them or opposes them freely angers God, according to the saying of the Lord Christ: "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me," Luc. 10. but a prelate is despised when his statutes are despised, and St. Paul says, "He that despiseth these despiseth not a man, but God, who hath given you his Holy Ghost in you," 1 Thess. 4; and, speaking to the bishops, "Take heed to yourselves, and to all the host, among whom the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops, to govern the Church of God," Acts 20. 20.

If then the prelates have power to govern, they must also have power to make statutes for the wholesome government of the church, and the best of the subjects. For the same apostle also commanded the Corinthians, that all things should be done among them.

But this cannot happen without laws. Therefore he commanded the Hebrews, saying, "Obey your teachers," Heb. 13, since Paul not only demands obedience, but also indicates the cause of obedience.

St. Paul used such authority when he gave so many laws besides the gospel, concerning the election of a bishop, widows, women, that they should cover their heads, and keep silence in the church, and also concerning other worldly things, 1 Thess. 4, worldly courts, 1 Cor. 6, and says plainly to the Corinthians, "To others I say, and not to the Lord," 1 Cor. 7.

And elsewhere he says: "Behold and keep the statutes which ye have learned, or by our epistles, or by the preachers," 2 Thess. 2, 15. Therefore the princes and cities are to be admonished that they render and show obedience to the ordinances and statutes of the church, lest, when they deprive God of His due obedience, they again be despised by their subjects, and they also would not render them due obedience, as in the next peasant uprising the subjects submitted themselves. Therefore, they should be careful not to be seduced by false teachings.

It is also quite wrong for them to say that the righteousness of faith is obscured by these statutes. For one would be foolish and mad who would keep them without faith, because they are prescribed for believers, not for Turks or Agarenes. For "what have I to do with them that are without?" saith St. Paul, 1 Cor. 5. But that they here exalt faith above all things, in this they are contrary to St. Paul, as we have also said above, and tear St. Paul apart, whom, speaking of the works of the law, they draw to the evangelical works, as all such errors are rejected above.

It is also false that the statutes should obscure the commandments of God, since they are useful to a man in keeping the divine commandments, as by the fastings of the flesh lusts are subdued and slain, that it become not lustful.

It is also a falsehood that it is impossible to keep the statutes, for the Mother, the Church, is not so merciless that she should not, in case of need, dispense with holidays, fasting, and the like.

About this they falsely introduce Augustine aā inquisitiontizi Januarii, who is squarely opposed to them. For he in the same place expressly

What is taught and commanded by the church in general is to be kept by all. But the middle things, and those which are free, may be kept or not kept. Thus the holy father Augustine and the blessed Ambrose conclude that the custom of every church should be observed, for, says he, "When I come to Rome, I fast; when I am here, I do not fast.

Furthermore, they do violence to the holy scripture by daring to strengthen their errors with it. For Christ, Matt. 15, does not reject all human statutes, but only those that are contrary to God's law, which is revealed in Marci the seventh; and here Matt. 15: "Why then," saith Christ, "do ye transgress God's commandment for yourselves?" So Paul gives Col. 2, that no man should judge in eating and drinking, and in holidays, according to the Jewish custom. For the church therefore holdeth not the flesh to be unclean, whether it be yet to eat it, as the Jews thought in the synagogue.

Thus the saying of Christ concerning that which passeth through the mouth is drawn here without right understanding, since it was the mind of the Lord Christ to abolish the error of the Jews herewith, who meant that food touched without washed hands was unclean, and he that did eat it was unclean; as is evident from the circumstances of the text, and the church with these statutes does not desire to interpret again Moses, who has heavy hands, to the church.

In the same way they reject St. Paul, who calls the doctrine of the devil forbidding food, 1 Tim. 4, namely, as the Tatians, Marcionites, and Manichaeans held that food was unclean; as is evident from the following words, since St. Paul adds: "All creatures of God are good." But the church does not reject food because it is evil and unclean, but to make men more able to keep the commandments of God, so that the arguments against it are defeated.

But if they praised the cross and bodily discipline, and fasting in such a way that the body would be tamed by it, we would well put up with their doctrine in the play; but because they want to have all this freely, it is condemned and rejected as quite contrary to the faith and the discipline of the church. And it is no help to them to pretend that the church ordinances are unequal; for although it is true that in some special ceremonies each country keeps its own way, nevertheless, what general church ordinances are to be kept, they are not to be kept apart.

are held the same everywhere, and the particular ones in countries where they are common.

And is nothing that they admit of the paschal feast. For the Roman popes at last brought those from Asia to celebrate the Pascha with the general church in a uniform manner. So also Irenaeus is to be understood. For, without any harm to the faith, several apostles' evenings are held in France without fasting, although they are fasted in Germany.

The princes and cities are also to be exhorted to follow the decree of Pope Gregory. This decree states that the ways of every country should be observed, as long as they are not contrary to the Catholic faith, C. Quoniam consuetudinem, dist. 12. from which we know that inequality of ceremonies can be in unity of faith, and that in every country the custom taught and accepted by the ancients should be kept, but without detriment to the general customs and ceremonies of the whole Catholic Church.

Of the monastic vows.

Although much and various things are brought forward in this article out of some inspiration, nevertheless, if one considers everything with mature counsel, it is found that the monastic vows are founded in the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, and that many holy people, who have performed miraculous signs and led a miraculously holy life, have lived in these orders with many thousands of times thousands, and that their rules have been accepted and approved by the Catholic Church for so many hundreds of years throughout the entire Christian world. Therefore, it is by no means to be tolerated that such vows are broken out of frivolity and courage, without all fear of God.

For in the Old Testament God vowed vows to the Nazarites, Deut. 6, to the Rechabites, who did not drink wine nor eat grapes, Jer. 35.

God also earnestly requires that what is vowed once shall be kept without rebuke, Deut. 23: But he that retracteth his vows afterward shall fall, Prov. 20: But the vows of the upright are pleasant, Prov. 15.

Furthermore, God also teaches through the prophet that He is especially pleased with the monastic vows, Isaiah 56: "Thus says the Lord to those who are cut off, who keep My Sabbaths, and choose what is pleasing to Me, and make My covenant firm: I will give them a place in my house and within my walls, and a better name, for the sons and daughters. I will give them an everlasting name, which shall not pass away." But to whom does God say this? To those whom Christ praises, who have made themselves uncircumcised for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, who deny their own will, take up the cross, and deny themselves, and take up their cross every day, and follow Him, Luc. 9, that they no longer live according to their own will, but according to the rule and the will of their Sovereign.

Better also, as St. Paul testifies, do the virgins who leave the world, despise the lusts, and vow and keep virginity in the monasteries, than those who submit their necks to the conjugal yoke. For thus saith St. Paul, 1 Cor. 7, "He that marrieth his virgin doeth well; but he that marrieth her not doeth better." So it follows of a widow, "Blessed is she, if she abide thus after my counsel."

None of the holy monks, Pauli Eremitä, Basillii, Antonii, Benedicti, Bernhardt, Dominici, Francisci, Wilhelmi, Augustini, Clara, Brigittä, and the like, who have all despised this world's kingdom and all its ornaments for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, is unknown. The Lampertian heresy has also recently been condemned, which the heretic Jovinianus in Rome has again tried to awaken.

Therefore all that is said in this article against monastic life is to be rejected, namely, that at the time of Augustine there were free collegia, that the vows were subsequently imposed on the monasteries; since the contradiction is true that the monasteries only arose after the vows.

Of the virgin monasteries, although they are a weak instrument, it is nevertheless sufficiently evident that the holy nuns have remained and persevered in their vows, once made, in many monasteries, even among these princes and cities, much more steadfastly than the monks have not done. To this day, they have not been able to be led away from their sacred duties by pleas, sweet words, afflictions, fears, anxieties, and troubles.

Therefore, one should by no means give in to what is here interpreted as the worst of the worst. Because it is expressed in God's Word that the monastic life, if it is kept with proper obedience, which all monastics can keep by God's grace, deserves eternal life and much more. For Christ promised them this: "Whoever leaves house, or brother, or sister, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or fields for my name's sake? he shall take it a hundredfold, and inherit eternal life," Matth. 19.

That the monasteries of old have been schools is not denied, and yet it is not unconscious that they were first schools of godliness and Christian discipline, since later the study of other arts were added.

But because no one who puts his hand to the plough and looks back is sent to the kingdom of God, Luc. 9, according to the rule of the holy Scriptures, also of the secular and spiritual laws, all marriages and vow-breaking of monks and nuns who have broken the first faith, and have their damnation, are to be considered ungodly and condemned, as Paul says 1 Tim. 5.

But that the vows are not contrary to God's order has been explained in the other article of the abuses referred to.

But that they want to protect themselves with the dispensation, no one is moved. For although the pope may have dispensed with the king of Arragon, who nevertheless, as we read, having received an heir, has returned to the monastery, or with another prince, this has been done for the sake of peace, so that a whole kingdom or country may not be put into extreme distress and devastated with wars, murders, robberies, fornication, fires, and deaths; nevertheless, such causes of dispensation cannot truly be put forward by private persons who have become apostates from their orders and have abandoned their vows.

It is also rejected that one pretends to vow in impossible things. For to abstain is not impossible, which so many thousands of men and virgins have held. For though the wise man saith, "I know that I cannot abstain, except God give me," yet Christ promised, "Ask," saith he, "and ye shall receive," Luc. 11, Matt. 18; and St. Paul, "Who will not leave you to be tried above your ability, but will give you strength in the time of your temptation, that ye may be able to bear it," 1 Cor. 10.

They also keep their things very badly by confessing that breaking the vows is criminal. Which is to be explained, that the marriages of the monks are against all rights, and again are to be broken up, C. Continsntins 27th, hnnssst. 1, as also many old imperial laws decree.

But that they attract for themselves the E. AuxUnrum, they do nothing with it. For C. does not speak of bad, but of solemn vows, which even the church has made to this day.

holds. Therefore no marriages of monks, nuns or priests have ever been right.

It is also rejected that they pretend that monastic life is a human invention. For it is founded in the Holy Scriptures by the Holy Spirit, and inspired by the godly fathers, and does not take away from the glory of Christ. For monastics keep all things for Christ's glory, and that they may follow Christ.

Therefore it is wrong for them to condemn the worship in the monasteries as ungodly, since it is the most Christian worship. For the monastics are not fallen from the grace of God, as are the Jews, of whom St. Paul says in Galatians 5 that they still seek righteousness in the Law of Moses. But the monastics take care to 1) live closer to the Gospel, so that they may earn eternal life. Therefore all that is introduced here against the monastic life is ungodly.

But the fact that it is all maliciously accused here that the monks want to be in the state of perfection has never been heard from them. For monastics do not attribute perfection to themselves, but are in the state in which they attain perfection. For their rules and practices are instruments for attaining perfection, not perfection itself. And in this way is Gerson to be understood, who does not deny that the monastic orders are states that attain perfection, as he explains in the Tractate sorāra proxristarios, in the Rule of Saint Augustine, in the Tractate ās sorisiiiiis svarimŪsis, in the Tractate ās xsrksstions sorāis, and other places. Therefore the princes and cities are to be exhorted to be at peace, that the monasteries be reformed by their proper superiors and elders, but not entirely exterminated, and that the monks be rather godly admonished and corrected than entirely exterminated; as also their godly forefathers, the Christian princes, have done.

But if they do not want to believe the godly and holy fathers of monastic vows, let them hear the high imperial majesty, namely the Emperor Justinianus in antUsnāsa ās Nonasiis, shall. I.

Of church power.

Although there is much interweaving of ecclesiastical power here, even much more ugly than would be necessary, it is nevertheless to be declared that the most reverend bishops and priests, and the entire clergy, are left free and inviolate in all their ecclesiastical power, which is due to them by right or custom. That they may also exercise all may retain their liberty, privileges, sovereignties, and prerogatives given to them by the godly Roman emperors and kings. And it is not to be suffered that what has been given to the ecclesiastics by imperial clemency should be weakened and diminished by some princes or others subject to the Roman Empire.

1) Here we have erased "after".

For it can be sufficiently proved that the power of the churches in spiritual matters is founded in divine law, of which St. Paul says: "Though I boast more of our power, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your corruption," 2 Cor. 10. And it follows: "For therefore I write these things in absentia, lest at present I should act more harshly according to the power which the Lord hath given me, for edification, and not for your corruption," 2 Cor. 10.

The same St. Paul also shows a constraint of judgment, saying, "Which will ye? Shall I come to you with a rod, or in love and in the spirit of gentleness?" 1 Cor. 4. As he writes of judicial matters to Timothy, "Against an elder take no complaint, save two or three witnesses," 1 Tim. 5.

From which it is evident enough that the bishops not only have power in the office of the divine word, but also have power to govern, to compel, and to punish, to the end that they may guide their subjects to eternal blessedness.

But the power of government includes the power to judge, to conclude, and to order those things that are useful and beneficial to the aforementioned end. For this reason, everything that has been objected against the priests' and churches' immunity from the law is futile and null and void.

Therefore all the subjects of the Roman Empire are to be enjoined not to bring ecclesiastical persons before secular tribunals against their privileges granted by the Empire. For Clement the Pope and Martyr says: "If priests have matters among themselves, they are not to be judged by secular judges, but what occurs is to be decided by the elders of the churches. Therefore Constantine Magnus, the Christian emperor, in the holy Nicene Concilio, did not wish to judge the bishops even in secular matters: Ye are gods, said he, and by GOD truly set before us. Go and settle the matter among yourselves, for it is not fitting that we should judge the gods.

As far as the statutes of the church are concerned, enough has been said above.

Nor will it help them the Christian liberty they pretend to have, because they are not a free-

The Christian liberty is not the same as the Christian freedom, but a cruel and abominable presumption, which, when it is imagined by the mob, arouses it to the most harmful and dangerous sedition. For Christian liberty is not contrary to the church statutes, because they serve for good, but opposed to the servitude of the law of Moses and sins. For "he that committeth sin is the servant of sin," saith Christ Jn. 8. Wherefore they that break fasts, eat meat freely, and forbear their horas canonicus, do not confess at Pascha, and do the like, and forbear, do not use liberty, but abuse it, contrary to St. Paul's admonition. Paul's exhortation, which he had diligently warned them before: "But ye, brethren, are called to liberty; only see that ye by liberty give no place to the flesh, but by charity serve one another," Gal. 5. Therefore let no man cover up any sin under a semblance of evangelical liberty. Which also St. Peter forbade: "As free men, and not as having liberty to cover wickedness, but as the servants of God," 1 Peter 2.

But what they have objected to concerning the abuses, all the princes and estates of the empire know without a doubt, that neither the imperial majesty, nor some princes, nor any Christian man, vows even the slightest abuse, but all wish that the princes and estates of the empire will endeavor with common counsel and united will, that the abuses be abolished and improved, and that what happens too much or too little in both estates be completely done away with, or reformed for the best, and that finally the spiritual estate, so much weakened, and the Christian religion, which in many has grown cold and desolate, be restored and brought back to its former glory and honor. In this Imperial. Maj., as all are aware, has so far had much work and care, and has graciously promised that she will not let her diligence and effort be lacking in this matter.

Because now Imperial Majesty has heard from the Confession and the answer now read that they, the Elector, Princes and Cities, agree in many articles. Majesty has heard from the Confession and the answer now read that they, the Elector, Princes and Cities, agree in many articles with the Catholic and Roman Church, and do not agree with the ungodly doctrines which are otherwise publicly blown up and spread about in booklets in Germany, but reject and condemn the same: the Imperial Majesty is confident and hopeful that the Elector, Princes and Cities, now that they have heard this answer, will also agree with the Catholic and Roman Church in other matters. Majesty is confident and hopeful that the Elector, princes and cities, having heard and accepted this answer, will also agree with the Roman Catholic Church in other matters in which they may have been at variance.

will henceforth agree with one heart, and also in all other things will obediently conform to the holy Catholic and Roman Church and the Christian faith and religion, as they have hitherto been held in unison by common Christendom, and will most humbly obey their Imperial Majesty. Maj. most humbly. Which will be especially pleasing to Her Imperial Maj. Maj. will be especially pleased, and will recognize and reward with special graces against them all in general, and, as occasion may give, against each one in particular. For, since God is in favor, if this Christian and entirely gracious remembrance is not given, they, the Elector, Princes and cities, can think that one can give Imperial Majesty the necessary cause for this. Majesty that they, as befits a Roman and Christian Emperor, and a patron and advocate of the Catholic and Christian Church, and that their Imperial Majesty has ordered them to exercise their office and conscience. Maj.'s commanded office and conscience, they must provide for and preside over these matters.

1015 Some pieces of the papist supposed refutation of the Augsburg Confession, as such have been caught under the reading.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 421; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 95 d; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 221; and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 229.

Kaiserl. Majesty has heard the confession of the princes and princes, together with that of two cities, in which she herself has personally seen, and after having held council with many nations 1) respectable and reasonable 2c. has found this opinion, and has previously sent it to the princes and princes, upon which her Imperial Majesty rests as follows. Majesty, as follows. The following answer may be given to the articles held up.

The first article is right and acceptable, because it is founded in Scripture, and confirmed by Concilia, before Mesnum 2c. And the princes condemn the heresies contrary to this article.

The II. article is admitted, but sonder appended explanation. For the sins of not fearing God, not believing Him 2c. are not original sins, but 2) real sins, and Luther's opinion that sin remains after baptism was also condemned earlier.

The III Article is rightly founded from Scripture, and confirmed by the Church.

1) "of many nations" put by us instead of: "many nation," in the editions.

2) Added

IV. is right where it is understood with a meager explanation. For it is true that all our works are nothing without the grace of God; but merit is not to be set aside, for where there is reward there is also merit. Many sayings have been reported here that are based on merit, and this Pauli: "I have done a good work, and my reward is ready, which the Lord will give me at that day" (2 Tim. 4:7).

The v. is right, [what] is said of the merit [of Christ] 1). The princes here also condemn the Anabaptists, by whose seditious doctrine so much turmoil has arisen as five years ago, and bloodshed has been caused.

The VI, in so far as it annuls merit, is not right. So also the saying, "If ye have done all things, say, we are unprofitable servants," is of no avail; for if they are counted unprofitable that have done all these things, how much more are they counted unprofitable that omit them? 2) So this is the right understanding of the saying, that our works are useless, though they are useful to us.

VII, that the church is the assembly of the faithful, 2c., is condemned among other articles of the Church of Costnitz, and contrary to Scripture, where the church is compared to a threshing-floor, wherein the angels gather the good corn of the chaff, 2c. (Matth. 3, 12. Luc. 3, 17.), and the net (Matth. 13, 47.), and the ten virgins (Matth. 25, 1. ff.).

The eighth is right, first of all, because it also condemns the Donatists. Note: In the articles or points that are accepted as right, there is always a special and long probation and explanation attached, so that the unbelievers would not be believed.

The IX is right.

The X. is right, but that it teaches how the essence of bread and wine ceases, and is changed into the true body and blood of Christ. Thus princes know, or ought to know, that under every form of the holy sacrament is the true body and blood of Christ; if not, the body would be without blood, and therefore dead, contrary to the saying of Paul, "Death shall not henceforth have dominion over him" (Rom. 6:9).

The XI is right in declaring that, according to the chapter Omnis utriuZyus ssxus, the

1) Added by us.

2) This is incomplete and therefore misleading. Before: "who refrain from it" it should read: "who alone believe and do it". The following is also not in accordance with the Confutation, but should (as can be seen in No. 1029, §11) read: "Say: useless servants of the dear Lord, not ourselves. Compare also No. 1029, s. 16.

Subjects are to be held and admonished to confession and reception of the sacrament, so that they may, as much as possible, confess all sin. But if, after such diligence, they still forget something, they believe they are absolved from it.

The Second Vatican Council did not divide repentance properly into two parts, and Pope Leo also condemned Luther's article on this subject: 3) Faith precedes repentance, for he who does not believe cannot do true repentance. Thus in the Synodo Nicene by oanoiiss posnitsutialss form and measure of true repentance are given. Here they have cited much loca of Scripture, and before that from the Psalms; the princes are also to be praised for rejecting the invading heresies, as Novatianorum 2c.

The XIIIth is right, provided it is taught that there are seven sacraments, and the subjects are required to confess them.

The XIVth is right, but this is understood, that the calling is done by public spiritual authority, and not by mob or violent intrusion. Where such preachers are found, they should be abolished.

The XV. is to be praised; but in rejecting the laws of the Church, not right, nor to be admitted.

The XVI is quite good.

The XVII is right.

The XVIII is right; for yes to confess that of our own powers we may not please God, and yet nevertheless have a free will. And this is only further attracted with much words, and proved with sayings, than, L66l68^ig.8ti6U8^: IZUSNI st gHuani (Sir. 15:16.). Item, Hos. 13:9. "Israel, out of thee thy destruction, but out of me thy salvation"; item, that the Manichaei wholly abrogate free-will. And this would be the right way between Pelagians and Manichaeans, so that neither too much nor too little would be added to free will.

The XIX is right. 4)

The XXth is right, provided one understands that of faith working through love. Here many words are made, and, in that the main part lies, they are left with circumlocutions.

The XXI is not right. For though Christ be the Mediator, yet he is not alone, and the saints are to be called. Here they have led many examples, as 2 Macc. 15, 12-14., 5) that Onias and Jeremias prayed for Israel 2c. Item,

3) Here we have erased "And".

4) This is missing in the editions and has been added by us. Walch has erroneously entered XIX and XX in the two following articles.

5) In the editions wrongly "as Macha. 1".

That the angels pray for us. Item, how Cyprianus Cornelio wrote that whoever among them dies sooner prays for the other, which, of course, the holy bishop would not have done, since he considered the intercession of the saints to be void or unjust. Item, there is mentioned how Job prayed for his friends, and God spared them (Job 42:8. f.), and thus subsequently a great deal was introduced about the living intercession of the saints. Item, much has been said about holy honor, as if someone did not teach it to be honored. Christ is the head, and the saints the members; therefore, because the head prays for us, the members also pray.

It has been said of both forms that it is unreasonable for princes to consider it an abuse that the sacrament should be administered to the laity under one form alone, and that it would be rather an abuse for the laity to be given both forms. Here it is to be proved that in the first church it was also held thus, and from the Actis Apostolorum: "They continue in the breaking of the bread"; and how Christ broke the bread to the disciples at Emmaus, which all according to the interpretation of the teachers was understood of the body of Christ. There is also a story told here of Heli (1 Sam. 2), in which it is written how his descendants, cast out of the priesthood, would desire a portion and morsel of bread, which is the one figure to be given to the laity.

Nor does it help them to read: Lidits sx Uoe 01111168, for this was spoken to the apostles who were priests. There is also a distinction drawn from the spiritual laws between the priestly and lay communion, from which it is proved that the two have always been distinct, and that they alone have received the sacrament in one form. So popes, cardinals, bishops, and priests, in time of their sickness, take the sacrament, which Meorm calls LMockus vrentreum, as do the laity. Therefore they do not have to complain at all that they have been deprived of the One Form, since the whole Christ has come among everyone.

There have been told many disgraces which might befall the holy sacrament, if the blood of the Lord were administered to the laity, and so to a great multitude; namely, that it might be spilled, and that it might not be known in what kind of vessel it should be kept; from which the use of administering to the laity in both forms was tacitly discontinued in the Roman church, though in the Corinthians and in those at Carthage both forms might have been retained. And the Concilium of Costnitz and Basle have confirmed this custom of the 2c. one form. in the presence of many bishops, 2c. also of the emperor, princes and lords. Thus also the Procession Corporis Christi was unreasonably stopped, by which the holy Sacrament was greatly honored, and before that, because the same in every form is whole and unholy.

Of the Mass. In this article, what is in accordance with the usage of the Roman Church is accepted, and what is contrary to it is rejected. It is not to be tolerated that a special (private or corner) mass be dismissed. For this would destroy the foundation, diminish the service, and deprive souls of their consolation. Item, the mass should not be said in German, because the priest is a common person of the Roman church; so there are also all those who speak for the congregation: Amen.

Item, the Latin mass causes more and greater devotion. The mass is to be celebrated in Hebrew until the time of Adrian. If an abuse should occur, the princes are to believe completely that no one likes it, and that the abuse will be stopped. But this is no abuse at all, that he who serves the altar also lives from the altar, according to the Scriptures. Nor would it be a purchase of the mass, which is on endowment 2c. Item, the mass is a sacrifice; for so it is kept more than a thousand years ago; so Hebrew and Greek N188U is called an altar; <sup>1)</sup> Dog Christ saith, Hoo kueito. But in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, kueors is to sacrifice.

Of spiritual vows. Spiritual vows are founded in the Old and New Testaments. The vows were made before the monasteries. It has never been heard that the clergy are taught to be in a state of perfection, but that the clergy are an instrument of perfection. The king of Arragon answered that he was dispensed with because others avoided much misfortune and bloodshed. This is not the opinion of some bad persons. Item, he went back to the monastery after the birth of his son. Item, it is not impossible to keep the vows, especially to accomplish everything well by praying and fasting, and before that by fleeing the cause, and that one smashes the little children, that are the first thoughts, against the rock, that is, Christ. It is also written, "Ask, and it shall be given you." Let it also be known, that so many thousands of persons,

Man and woman have kept their monastic vows aright, and have been saved thereby; neither is it because of the weakness of women 2c.

For many virgins have been found more constant in their monastic vows, above all that is repugnant to them at this time, than some monastics.

Of clerical marriage. It has always been called supposed clerical matrimony, and it is wonderful to hear that Her 1) Imperial Majesty desires such a thing, since it has never been in use since the time of the apostles. Item, the priests, because they are always to perform and pray the sacrament, are also always to be pure. Here it is reported how in the old marriage the priests had to abstain three days before the service (Ex. 19, 10. 22.), and from Zachariah (Luc. 1, 5. 8. 9.). This is not a commandment: "Grow and multiply" (Gen. 1, 22), which constantly binds, but was only valid at that time, when there were still few people, and no longer now, when one pressed upon another because of the multitude. Otherwise many saints (2) and virgins would have done wrong by remaining outside of marriage. Item, the saying, unusquisque habeat uxorem suam sicut seipsum (1 Cor. 7, 2. 8.), they have interpreted according to their opinion, not according to the teachers, before Hieronymo. Item, Episcopus sit uxoris vir (1 Tim. 3, 2.), is not to be understood that a bishop must have a wife, otherwise Martinus, Nicolaus, Titus, and Christ himself would not have been bishops; but it is said that he should not have had more than One Wife, as is to be clearly noted hereafter of the widow who is to be received. Item, the marriage is vowed and honored with them, also held for a sacrament, but not theirs, who surrender and vow chastity, to take to the supposed marriage state. Here is much that is indicated from the spiritual rights.

It is reported that this article would be quite ugly if it were about the power of the clergy 2c. Item, the clergy have power to govern. For Paul saith, "Having been given power to build, and not to tear down," 2c. If they have power to govern, they have also power to punish, and to make laws, forbidding all eating of flesh on certain days, which it is the duty to observe, and transgressing the same, is not called Christian liberty, but rather a wantonness, thereby giving cause to sedition. Among other things, it is told how, through Daniel.

1) "their" put by us instead of "E".

2) In the old edition: "heathens" instead of: "saints".

prophesies that in the time of Antichrist the continual sacrifice should cease; that would be the mass and worship, for it is seen how some have laid waste the churches, torn up the altars, broken the images, sung or read nothing, burned no candles, called the holy sacrament baked bread. And all these are to be prevented, lest there be cause for the prophecy to be fulfilled.

Decision: Because [Imperial Majesty] now hear that the Prince and Princes compare themselves with the Christian Church in some matters, and also condemn many erroneous doctrines which have gone out in print before, and because some of the articles they have handed over are quite repugnant to the Christian Church, and are by no means to be admitted: Her Imperial Majesty hopes that they will compare themselves on such erroneous points. ...that they will concur in such erroneous points... This the Imperial Majesty will graciously acknowledge, not forget in good, and be your gracious Emperor. But where not, that imperial Maj. did not hope, her Electoral and Princely Grace would have to consider that the Emperor would not forget it. and princes to consider that the Emperor. Majesty, as a bailiff and supreme protector of the Holy Christian Church, would do well to show himself in this matter as a Christian Emperor is officially responsible to do.

1016 Contents of the Confutation as Cochläus had it printed immediately after the Diet.

This writing was printed in 1531 by Wolfgang Stöckel in Dresden under the following title. Cyprian included it in the Supplements to the Hist. of the Augsburg Conf. Conf., p. 196.

Summarium of the imperial answer to the five princes and six cities' confession to Augsburg at the next Imperial Diet.

The first article: of the Holy Trinity, is wholly admitted in all points.

The other: of original sin, is admitted in part, namely, in that original sin is truly sin 2c., and in part not, namely, in that they say that original sin is without fear of God and without trust in God, and that it fei the desire which remains in children after baptism.

The third: of two natures in Christ, that he should be true God and man, is admitted in all things.

The fourth, of the merit of good works, is admitted in that we may merit nothing by our own efforts. And therefore the Pelagians are damnable heretics. But is rejected in that they do not confess with us the merit of good works done by divine grace.

1070 Cap. 13. of the Diet of Augsburg 1530. w. xvi, 1275-1277. 1071

The fifth, of the word and sacraments, is admitted, that thereby, as by an instrument, the Holy Ghost is given. But that they should speak of faith alone, and not of love and hope, is rejected.

The sixth, of good works, is admitted in that faith should bring good works, and rejected in that they say faith alone makes righteous, in which they wrongly understand the words of Christ Luc. 17, Pauli and Ambrosii ad Rom. 3. 4. 2c.

The seventh, of the church, is rejected, because they would understand that the church is the assembly of the saints alone; for in the church are gathered together both good and evil. But this is admitted, that the church may abide for ever.

The eighth: of ministers of the church, that even the wicked may preach and minister sacraments, is admitted in all things.

The ninth: of baptism, is also altogether admitted, that infants should be baptized, and Anabaptists not admitted.

The tenth: of the reverend Sacrament of the Altar, is also admitted, but with this appendix, that one should firmly believe under every form of the Sacrament the whole of Christ, and that the substance of the bread be truly changed into the body of Christ.

The eleventh, confession, is also permitted, with two requirements. First, that one confess at Easter time, according to Cap. Oniriis utriu8<^u6 86xu8. Second, that one remember beforehand to confess all the sins of which one's conscience knows oneself guilty, and not to conceal any of them with one's own will.

The twelfth, of repentance, is allowed, that a sinner, if he be converted, may be forgiven his sin as often as he sins. But it is rejected, first, in that they do not put more than two parts of repentance. Secondly, in that they say that faith is one part of repentance. Third, in that they do not confess repentance, which is the third part of repentance.

The thirteenth: of the use of the sacraments, is entirely admitted, namely, that the sacraments are not only signs among men, but also testimonies of the divine will toward us.

The fourteenth, of the ecclesiastical estate, is allowed, that no man shall preach, or minister sacraments, unless he be duly called, with this

Addendum, that such appointment shall be made according to the old order of Christian churches, not whom the secular authorities or the mob shall choose, but whom the bishop, or whoever else by right or custom has to do it, shall call or appoint.

The fifteenth, of the customs of the churches, is also admitted, that they should be kept, if they may be kept without sin. But they are rejected because they say that such customs are contrary to the Gospel, if they are done to propitiate God or for sin.

The sixteenth: of secular authority, is altogether admitted, with condemnation of the Anabaptists, who do not wish to suffer any authority among Christians.

The seventeenth: of the last judgment, is also altogether admitted, with rejection of the Anabaptists and others, who would at last admit salvation and blessedness to devils and the damned.

The eighteenth: of free will, is also admitted, namely, that we have a free will in human things; but in divine things we may accomplish nothing without the grace of God.

The nineteenth: of cause of sin, is also admitted, namely, that not GOD, but man's will is the cause of sin.

The twentieth, of faith and good works, is rejected. For they will not confess that by good works one may obtain remission of sins.

The twenty-first: of honouring and calling upon the saints, is also rejected, because they confess the error of the Vigilantii, the Waldenses, Picards 2c. and do not want to call upon the saints, in which they act against the Scriptures of both Testaments and against all teachers 2c.

End of article.

The other part of princely confession of abuses.

In this part no piece is admitted, for they are called abuses, which is not abuse.

Of the two forms of the Sacrament

Scripture and ancient sacred teachers indicate that it has always been the custom in the Christian Church to receive this sacrament outside of the Mass under one form, namely bread, and that it is rather an abuse to offer both forms to the laity, contrary to the order of the Church and without God's command.

Of the priests and monks marriage

It is also proved here from Scripture, from ancient teachers and many conciliarities, that not priestly purity, but rather lewd marriage of monks and priests is an unpleasant abuse, for eleven hundred years ago such was condemned in the heresy of Joviniani, and all their arguments are justified and resolved with good reason of Scripture.

From the fair

First, it is condemned that they hold the German mass contrary to the custom of the common churches. Second, that they consider it an abuse that he who serves the altar must live from the altar, because Scripture permits this in Luc. 10 and 1 Cor. 9 2c. Thirdly, that they have sacrificed many instituted masses against the glory of God, and against the last will and testament of the donors, for a sacrilege. Fourth, that they deny the sacrifice of the mass, which is an ancient heresy (as St. Augustine indicates), Arianorum, and Sacrificium Missae, proved in many writings, as well as in the most ancient teachers and councils, for which reason the mass should by no means be denied.

From confession

First, it is considered an abuse that so few people in Luther's sect confess. Second, that they are silent about repentance and satisfaction for sin. Third, that they wrongly understand and interpret Chrysostom's words about oral confession. Fourth, that they do not confess all secret sins of which they are aware, which is an old heresy of Montanorum, who were ashamed to confess all sins.

From the difference of the food

First, that they despise the statutes and authority of the church against Christ, Luc. 10, and Paul, 1 Thess. 2 2c. Secondly, that they regard such statutes as useless. Third, that they say it is contrary to faith, contrary to the gospel, contrary to the commandments of God. Fourth, that they consider it impossible. Fifth, that they wrongly understand Christ and Paul from such statutes. Sixth, that they would have all these things free and unbidden.

Of monastic vows"

First, that they would take such vows, contrary to so many writings in both Testaments. Second, that they consider the monastic life unseemly, contrary to so many thousands of holy People who have lived and been saved in it from the beginning of Christianity until now. Third, that they would have such vows free, contrary to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Fourth, that they say such vows are impossible, contrary to so much Scripture and the promise of Christ. Fifth, that they say that monks and nuns should not be separated in marriage. Sixthly, that they say such a life is contrary to the gospel, when it is evident that it is according to the gospel, and for Christ's sake leave father and mother, house and home, according to his counsel, Matt. 19, Luke 9, and 14, 2c.

From the church power

First of all, they reject the jurisdiction, authority, liberties, and privileges of the clergy that have come to them from emperors and kings. Secondly, that they do not permit the writings of the clergy to be used, and that they suppress their jurisdiction. Third, that they despise the freedom of the consecrated against the Scriptures and imperial laws. Fourth, that they want to subject the clergy to the secular courts, which is also contrary to Scripture and imperial law. Fifthly, that they have, contrary to the commandments of the church, reproached them for their wanton liberty, as if they were not obliged to keep them. Sixth, that they want to throw away even good order for the sake of the abuses of the clergy. Finally, His Imperial Majesty desires that they again come to Christian unity, and help to bring all abuses into proper order. Amen.

1017 Melanchthon's letter to Camerarius from the Confutation before it had been handed over.

This letter is found in Melanchthon's epist. ack Camerar., p. 139 and in Cyprian's Beilagen zur Hist. der Augsb. Conf. p. 192. also in the 6orp. Kek. Vol. II, 229, dated July 26, 1530.

Translated into German.

The opponents have not yet answered, but I hear that their confutation is ready, and will appear within two or three days. It is said that the Emperor will give orders that everything should be set in the previous state until the disputes are examined in a concilio. The council shall come to that. And if this pronouncement be not mitigated, ye may easily he-

...what unrest it will bring about. Our Prince's cousin is said to have put this harsh opinion on the track; if he would let go of his great stubbornness, which, as you know, is quite iron, everything would go better here. That is it all with each other. Capito has come here from Strasbourg, but is still in silence, and the other day asked the one at Mainz that he might be admitted for consultation. Since the statement described above was made against us, the man from Mainz did not want to be present, because he had already argued very vehemently the day before and could not bring our prince's cousin to softer thoughts; but the theologians at the court of Mainz have been excluded by Eck from the meeting that is being held against us. Arnold, whom I recommend to you, will tell you the most salutary advice of the Spanish noble heads in our cause. Philip.

(9) Now I have had a letter from Strasbourg that the French and Lorraine are in great armor, and the king has commanded in Alsace that the French should be accepted and allowed to live on their pennies until further notice. There is talk that the king wants to use them against the Swiss and the cities.

010 This is certain, that Eck and Faber are very urgent, that we should do it by force, and yield nothing; and the Hispanics are not pleased that our people should thus advise war, neither have they provided that so many princes should be opposed to us.

(11) The great chancellor Mercurinus spoke to the king at Bononia about the Concilii, and when the king said that the pope did not want it, the great chancellor answered again and admonished the king not to let it go, and to remember that he was lord.

1018 Philipp Melanchthon's news about the Confutation of the Confession before its reading, and conjectures about the attacks of the opposite.

In Cyprian's Supplements to the Hist. of the Augsb. Conf., p. 194, from Melanchthon's autograph. Also in the Oorp. Rsk. There Bretschneider remarks that it is not a "concern" (as Walch calls it), but a leaf belonging to a letter, in which Melanchthon communicates news.

1. we shall be read the confutation, not in the name of the theologians, but of the emperor.

002 And for this cause is healed by the emperor's men.

(3) It also looks to me as if the reading will be followed by the question whether we may suffer the Lord to judge us?

(4) But it was said, that the king would offer to change abuses, provided that the statutes of the church remain.

005 It is advised that we stop for the sake of the council.

(6) The pope has urged hard that the emperor should not take any action, but should straightway lead his army into Germany and suppress the cause by force.

7th And may the popes not hear talk of the Concilio.

008 The Hispanics have advised that both forms should be allowed to those who ask them, but the legate will not.

1019 Imperial speech delivered by Count Palatine Frederick to the protesting estates before the reading of the Confutation on August 3, 1530.

From an unnamed nnalor npoloZins raunu86riptu6 recorded in Müller's Historie von der evang. Stände Protestation, lib. III, eup. 24, p. 698.

Let it be remembered that the five princes, the 1) Elector, the four princes and related cities have presented their opinion and confession, as they called it, to Imperial Majesty and requested to be read publicly. Majesty, and requested to hear it read publicly, which was done; whereupon Her Majesty graciously requested to consider the same Confession further on Her Majesty's occasion. Now that Her Majesty has had a counter-answer drafted by scholars of many nations and experienced men, which also pleases Her Majesty, the same should now be publicly read out; with the request that the reported Electors, Princes, 2) and cities with the Pope and Her Majesty, as well as other Christian kings, potentates, Electors, Princes, and Estates, should compare themselves in a Christian manner, so that in the event of a counter-case Her Majesty would not be forced to use Her Majesty's imperial office. Imperial Office.

1) So put by us instead of: "the five Churfürsten, princes" 2c.

2) In our original: "Churfürsten und"; in the original probably: "Chur-, Fürsten und".

1020. notice of Count Palatine Frederick made on account of imperial majesty after the reading of the confutation to the Elector of Saxony and his followers.

This writing, besides the locations given in the previous number, is found in Cölestinus, toru. III, x. 17, and in Chyträus, p. 213 according to the Latin, and p. 312 according to the German edition.

Because the Imperial. Majesty has so considered the Scripture read to him, and has found it to be Christian and so arranged that it cannot be refuted or rejected: Her Majesty's gracious and very serious request is that the Elector of Saxony and other princes and cities of this part, together with their prelates, should adhere to the same document equally and unanimously, as the Imperial Majesty would certainly want to do, and would be willing to rely on it.

1021: The protesting Estates, after the reading of the Confutation, by the Chancellor Brück, in which they request the copy of the same.

Both this and the next following scripture are found in Cölestin, Chyträus and Müller at the places indicated in the previous number.

Their Electoral and Princely Grace Together with the cities related to this matter they have listened to the document read out, and as much as their electors and princes have heard. They have noted that some of the articles of confession previously read and presented by them have been displaced by the sayings of the Scriptures and the fathers, and by the statutes of the rights and councils of those who have compiled such writings. So that their sovereign and princely sovereigns may decide on such a most important matter, concerning the salvation and harm of souls, and that they, together with their subjects and relatives, may satisfy their consciences on it, their sovereign and princely sovereigns, as well as the towns and cities, would like to have this article published. Their nobles and princes, as well as the cities, have an unavoidable need to receive such a document, or a copy of it, and to examine it with the best diligence, and to consider whether their previously submitted articles have been thoroughly transposed with the indicated reasons of the Holy Scriptures, and also how and in what manner the sayings of the fathers, together with the relevant conciliation, would be implemented against it. For it would be known that a special rule would apply to those who are to be given to their Imperial Majesty. Maj.

The only thing that could be said is that the rights described by the laws of the Church of Saxony and her Majesty are not to be believed in their advice and sayings, for as far as the rights that are attracted by them would confirm and prove their pretence. On the contrary, the Elector of Saxony and his Electorate wanted to have their rights confirmed and proven. Gn. Rather, it would be necessary for the Elector of Saxony, and his kinsmen, to get hold of the mentioned scripture, and to actually and diligently consider how the scripture, along with the fathers' sayings and conciliarities, which are referred to in such scripture, would be conducted. For this purpose, her Majesty's decree for this Imperial Diet clearly states that every opinion and view should be heard, and that it should be discussed and considered in love and kindness what has not been rightly interpreted on both sides; which discussion in love and kindness, and consideration of what has not been rightly interpreted on both sides, requires that the reasons and views of one part of the other part should not be withheld, but revealed and delivered, so that it may be determined what has not been rightly interpreted by each part. Thus to those to whom the Imperial Majesty of the Elector Majesty of the Elector of Saxony and his co-relatives, would have been just as little able as they to actually take up the matters in dignity, where such a confession, after having been read out, would have been put on the agenda of the Imperial Majesty of Saxony. Majesty. Majesty's request. In addition, Imperial Majesty Majesty, together with the attending Electors, Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, also Princes and Estates of the Empire, that such would not be refused in much lesser legal matters, but that Oopia proäueti cmni eonipstsnti törrnino äsliftrunäi would be decerned and recognized. Therefore it would be the most humble request of the Elector, the Princes and cities of this part that Imperial Maj. Maj. would graciously, for the sake of all these and similar most important circumstances and opportunities of the trade, let the read consultation document, or a copy of it, come to their hands, so that their Electors and Fathers and the cities would overlook and move it, and let their need again be heard in a Christian manner against their Maj.

1022 The Emperor's answer given by Count Palatine Frederick to the Estates to the request and plea that one should send them a copy of the read Confutation.

See the previous number. Also in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. II, p. 179, from Ansbach's Acts at Nuremberg, No. 18, likewise in Brück's Geschichte des Reichstags zu Augsburg, p. 72. The Palgrave read this answer from a note.

Imperial Roman Maj. Maj. our most gracious Lord, at the request of the Elector of Saxony and the other Princes and two cities, have resolved to hand over to them the read imperial document, as such has been presented orally and further on their behalf, namely thus: so that it may be felt by men that Imperial Maj. Maj.'s gracious mind and opinion do not stand otherwise than to comply with the writ graciously and with all due diligence. Her Imperial Majesty wished to have the document sent to them, but in such a way that Her Majesty would not enter into any further correspondence with them by handing over this document. For the matter has now been sufficiently introduced in all parts of the writ. And is the Imperial Maj. Maj.'s gracious request that they consult with their Imperial Maj. Maj. and the same Princes, Princes, and Estates, as the resolution of the document read to them contains and is capable of doing.

Imperial Maj. Maj. is also of the opinion that, in view of their relationship to Her Majesty, they will not allow the reported or any other of their writings to be printed, nor will they allow them to come out of their hands or give them; Her Majesty wishes to provide them with this entirely. This Her Imperial Maj. Maj. does not wish to restrain them at their request and plea of gracious opinion.

1023 Spalatin's news of the above circumstances.

This writing is found in the collective editions: in the Wittenberg i 1569, Vol. IX, p. 423; in the Jenaer (1566), Vol. V, p. 98; in the Altenburger, Vol. V, p. 224 and in the Leipziger, Vol. XX, p. 232. Where Walch got knowledge that it was Spalatin's message is unknown to us.

Thereupon D. Brück of the Elector and Princes also of related cities requests to deliver to their electors and f. gn. the read document, that then their high necessity has required 1) to see themselves in it.

Thereupon by reason of Imperial Majesty. Duke Frederick of Bavaria, after having held council, answered: because it was now late and the matters were important, Imperial Majesty wanted to consider them and to know the answer in time. Maj. would consider it, and in due time give her beloved an answer. Quinta Augusti we have received an answer from Imperial Maj. Maj. that the princes and princesses, together with their own, should be bound by their oaths.

1) So set by us. In the editions: "have required themselves" ic.

to undertake against Imperial Maj. Maj. that they would not give their Confutation to anyone nor have it copied, nor would they answer it, and then they would be given a copy of the Confutation. Whereupon ours argued that Imperial Maj. Maj. would graciously remember the letter, as it would be unseemly to say to Imperial Maj. Maj. would be to say that they were thus treated unkindly.

Soon after this Archbishop of Mainz, Joachim Margrave, Elector, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and others stood up and asked Imperial Maj. Maj. asked that her Maj. graciously permit them to take action with the protesting churons and princes. Maj. has permitted; likewise also ours.

Melanchthon's Letter to Luther of the Confutation Read. August 6, 1530.

This letter is found in Melanchthon's epict., lib. I, f. 16; in Cölestin, tom. III, p. 25; in Chyträus according to the Latin edition, p. 215, and according to the German, p. 317; in Cyprian in the Beilagen zur Historie der Augsb. Conf., p. 195, and in the Oorp. Uet., vol. II, 253.

The postmen are coming much more sparingly than we would have liked, especially at the time when our cause is being severely attacked. We finally heard the papists' confutation on the third of August, along with the Emperor's declaration, which was quite harsh. For before the Confutation was read, the Emperor said that he wanted to stick to the opinion that he had written down, and that he wanted our princes to agree with him. If not, then he, as a patron of the church, would no longer tolerate such division in Germany.

This was the sum of the speech. Although this was very harsh, nevertheless, since the Confutation was very childish, our people became quite cheerful after reading it. For this Confutation is the most outstanding of all of Faber's childish and ludicrous books. Of both, he drew on the story of the sons of Eli, that they would ask a morsel of bread from the priest, and from this he proved that the laity alone should receive the form of bread. They defended the mass with particularly cold and lame antics. When Joachim 2) came back after the reading of the Confutation (for I was not present), he said that it was a great mistake for me to have been so much concerned about the various disputations of human tradition.

...that I'm worried about... For such thoughts would never enter their minds.

The Bavarians have requested a copy of the Confutation, but the Imperial Majesty has taken it into consideration. Maj. took it into consideration, and the following day again admonished our Princes to unite and compare themselves with their Imperial Majesty by means of the Confutation. Maj. by means of the Writ of Confutation. Let also their Imperial Maj. Maj. should have the document sent to them, but in such a way that it would not be printed or copied. There has been a long dispute about this, until finally the Archbishop of Mainz and his brother, the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Duke of Brunswick have decreed to our Princes and requested that they not press further, so that Imperial Majesty would not be moved more violently. Maj. would not be moved more violently. They wanted to think of convenient ways and means by which the whole matter could be amicably settled and reconciled. So we have not yet been able to see the same confutation, and today we are waiting to see what means those princes will propose. There you have all our news.

(4) All good-hearted and understanding people are now much more courageous and joyful after they have heard the confutation so childishly made. Our princes could more easily obtain peace if they would diligently ask the Emperor himself and some more understanding princes for it, and if they would ask for it in an official manner; but they are quite negligent in this, and, as I think, secretly indignant that they do not do so. The whole matter is in God's will, and is not governed by human diligence. Meanwhile, I am impatient with our negligence, and I think that God is depriving us of this human help, so that we do not trust in ourselves. Therefore, you will pray diligently that God will preserve and keep us and give us peace. The Landgrave is keeping himself quite well and moderate; he has expressly told me that for the sake of peace he also wants to accept very burdensome conditions, as long as they can be tolerated without disgrace and harm to the Gospel. Hereby commanded by God. August 6, 1530.

1025 Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. August 8, 1530.

In Cölestin and Chytraeus, in the places given in the preceding number, and in the 6orp. Uek., vol. II, 259.

After the Emperor had earnestly and steadily urged that ours should compare with the confutation made by Faber, and ours, on the other hand, vehemently urged that we should be given the Confutation, and it was not possible to come to an agreement about it, several princes have admonished ours to desist from this diligent request and promise that they will think of a reasonable peace and unity by means and ways. This I indicated in the next letter. But behold, soon the next day the Landgrave secretly departs, even though he has left orders behind him. The Emperor, as soon as he hears of it, requests of our people that they not depart, especially because their Imperial Majesty has allowed the Prince to leave. Majesty has permitted the princes to deal amicably with our people. This demand of the Emperor seemed just. To this the nobles replied that they would not leave without the knowledge of their Imperial Majesty. Imperial Majesty's knowledge. What the Landgrave's concerns and intentions are, I cannot say with certainty. But it seems to me that the inequity of the actions that had occurred had moved him to the point where he no longer had any hope of obtaining peace. But to say what I think, the pretence of moderation in such dealings was suspicious to me.

Now the princes, who took up the negotiation, have not yet given anything that would particularly serve peace. The entrance has been from the Imperial Majesty's gracious and paternal will. Maj.'s gracious and paternal will, and that Her Majesty desires that they settle with Her Majesty and other princes and chieftains, and prevent their own, as well as the common German nation's, damage and harm that might arise from their stubbornness and division. The Elector of Brandenburg has done this extensively to deter ours from their doctrine. We do not yet know whether they will propose other painful means. The ghost of the Speier monks, of which Eisleben writes, undoubtedly means a terrible noise. God be with us always. Aug. 8, 1530.

1026 Melanchthon's Letter to Luther (?). Aug. 6, 1530.

This letter is found in Cölestin, tom. III, p. 28 and in 6orp. Lei. vol. II, 252. Burkhardt, p. 183, remarks on it that, because of the letter preceding it here, he hardly believed it to be to Luther, since Melanchthon would in any case have written to Luther at greater length. We have given the time determination according to Burkhardt.

Translated from the Latin.

We have at last once heard the refutation of our confession; only merely heard it, for we cannot obtain that it will give us is given into the hands. However, according to my understanding, it is done with the good sense of those who understand that it is not written accurately, and that it would be highly detrimental to the reputation of Imperial Majesty, who would be able to present it to us in her name. Majesty, who would be able to present it to us in her name, if it were to come to light. The false and perverse theologians wanted to protect themselves with this lion's skin, so that they would make themselves even more fearful to us. But methinks that all honest men, having heard such refutation, would have fallen still more in with our party, and that the opponents, who have sense, should have felt great displeasure that such ravings should have been forced upon the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty.

Now we await what they will do with us. The emperor makes his opinion clear, but well-meaning princes still have proposals for peace. May the Lord Christ grant us the same. In the month of August 1530.

1027 Luther's Letter to Melanchthon. Aug. 15, 1530.

This letter is found in Buddeus, p. 183, after the Jena manuscript; in Cölestin, toni. III. x>. 28 d; in the Latin collection of letters of Flacius, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 133. German in the Wittenberg edition, < 1569, vol. IX, p. 432; in the Jena (1566), vol.V, p. 120 d; in the Altenburg, vol.V, p. 248, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 191. We have translated according to De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his exceedingly dear brother in the Lord, N. Philipp Melanchthon, confessor of Christ at Augsburg.

Grace and peace in Christ, who is a Lord even over his enemies! We have received all your letters, and I praise God, who has made the refutation of the adversaries so limpid. - But "fresh through!" Before, I had heard it, but did not want to believe it. But after I had read Eisleben's letter first of all, which at the same time deals with riots and devils 1), I was very frightened, because I feared that terrible horrible things would happen. However, at that very hour I was quite moved by other things. But Chri stus lives and reigns. After all, the devils (if they so choose) may become monks or nuns. No form is more suitable for them than the one under which they have sold themselves to the world for worship. I have interpreted this entirely to mean that there is some unrest in Augsburg, for the winds and the downpours have been raging here in such a way that I was almost frightened by the roar, and the clear weather has not yet returned. I begin to bear desire for you, and wish that the Lord may bring you home shortly, amen. "It may well" this delay and unjust treatment 2) "make another landgrave weary."

I hope that Caspar Müller has arrived and has delivered our letters. Did I not also predict that you would torture yourself in vain over the statutes, because this matter is too much beyond the comprehension of the sophists? There has been an eternal dispute about the laws, even among the greatest men, and it is something entirely apostolic to judge about them purely and certainly. For there is no writer except the one Paul, who has written completely and perfectly about this matter, because it is the death of all reason to judge about the law; the Spirit alone is the judge here. What, therefore, can the sophists, who are also deprived of reason, do here? "Well, we have done him enough." Now is the time for the Lord alone to do it, who ruleth and keepeth you, amen.

I have finally also put down Ezekiel out of weariness, not only because of the illness of the head, and in the meantime I am translating the minor prophets and will finish these within a week, God willing; for there are only Haggai and Malachi left. I am occupied with these more for the sake of comfort than for work. Greet all of us respectfully. Farewell. From the desert, August 15, 1530.

Luther's letter to his wife to tell Pomeranus and others what he had heard about the reading and refusal of the copy of the Confutation. August 14, 1530.

This letter is found in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXII, p. 557; in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 186; and in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 131.

Grace and peace in Christ. My dear Kätke! This messenger passed by in such a hurry that I could not write anything more without wanting to let him go without my handwriting. You may tell Mr. Johann Pommern and everyone that I want to write more soon. We have nothing from Augsburg yet, but wait all hours for message and writing. We have heard that our opponent's answer is to be read publicly, but no copy has been given to ours so that they can answer it. I know not if it be true. Where they shun the light so, ours will not stay long. I have been almost well since St. Lawrence's day, and have not felt any buzzing in my head; that has made me very happy to write, for up to now the buzzing has been a nuisance to me. Greetings to all, and everything; another time. God be with you, amen, and pray confidently, for it is well laid out, and God will help. Given on the Sunday after St. Lawrence's Day [14 Aug.] Anno 1530. Martinus Luther.

G. From the Apology of the Augsburg Confession.

The first and still imperfect apologia.

First draft of the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, which was presented to Emperor Carl on Sept. 22 at the Imperial Diet of 1530, but was not accepted.

This writing had Chyträus printed after a manuscript of Spalatin in the Latin edition of his Uist. XuZ. aont., p. 337. it is then reprinted in the appendix of Pfaff's edition likr. "odesia" "vanASlioatz dolio, p. 94. Another Latin recension from The first edition of the Margravian Brandenburg Neichstag Acts of 1530, No. 19, is found in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. II, p. 483. A third redaction is in the ducal library in Wolfenbüttel. It consists of 57 leaves in folio format, thirty of which are written by Spalatin, but 21 by Melanchthon's own hand. Among the latter, ten or twelve pages are blank. That written by Spalatin is a fair copy, but here and there with corrections by Melanchthon, while that written by Melanchthon is a concept, often crossed out and changed. Reprinted in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 357-380. - But also in German language the Apology in its first draft is already published in 1577 by the provost of Berlin Georg Cölestin in his first edition of the German Augsburg Confession. He gives the text "faithfully copied according to Philippi and the theologians and hand present at the time". Bertram has published this text in his litterar. Abhandlungen, Theil III, p. 56. Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, Vol. II, p. 530, has another edition of this writing, not significantly different from this one, from a volume of acts of the Hessian secret state archives at Casfel. The imprint in Cölestin was so unknown that even Salig did not know about it and had Walch retranslate it from the Latin of Chyträus. We leave it at the old translation, and limit ourselves to making the most necessary improvements according to Förstemann.

Translated from the Latin by M. A. Littet.

1. Majesty will immediately see that those who wrote the refutation of our confession acted not only without understanding, but also without honesty. For they attack in vain the description of original sin when they say: The fear of God and trust in God are effects (avtww), and thus if original sin were not well described, that it would be an absence of such effects, because not even the nature of children in the state of innocence would have had such effects in itself. But the German Confession says that we are not speaking of the effects, but of the gifts which nature had in the state of innocence. For this is the description there: "Further, it is taught that after the fall of Adae all men who are born naturally are conceived and born in sins, that is, that they are all full of evil desire and inclination from their mother's womb, and can have no true fear of God, no true faith in God by nature." Here the words show that we are not speaking of actual sins, but of the faculty, namely, that men, being born naturally, cannot by natural powers bring forth a true fear of God and a true trust toward God. And this is nothing new, that fear and trust are not only effects, but also gifts. And we have spoken with diligence in such a way that we have the ge-explained my description of original sin, which is somewhat obscure. For they otherwise describe it thus: original sin is a lack of inherent righteousness. But we prefer to take the parts that there is a lack of the fear of God, a lack of trust in God 2c. For inherent righteousness would have put the fear of God and trust in God in the children who are born. And we have counted these things because, when others speak of original sin, they only touch on the most base desires against the other table, but do not mention the much worse vices of nature, namely, how in nature there is contempt for God, distrust of God, and such spiritual harm and corruption. They think nothing of this in schools. In the meantime, they argue in vain whether the tinder (of original sin) is a property of the body; whether it came in through the infection of the apple or the poisonous blowing of the snake?

002 But that they add that this is also a damned article of Luther, that original sin remains after baptism, is an unnecessary blasphemy. For they know well that Luther, rightly taught, that guilt was forgiven through baptism, although the matrigns of sin, as one speaks, still remains. This Luther calls sin. For so also speaketh the Scripture and Augustine. Others call it tinder; and, according to philosophical opinions, dream that the nature of man, though it may be weak, can yet of its own ability produce the fear of God, trust in God, and such like impulses. And because they left the Gospel aside and introduced Aristotle into the church, who wrote that the affections (or movements of the mind) were mean things, they also judged that tinder (or the lust for blood) was a mean thing. So the school teachers kept the name of original sin, but did not explain the matter properly. Therefore Luther had to explain what original sin is, and how guilt is taken away and sin begins to be put to death by the Holy Spirit, but that it is not yet entirely taken away. Likewise the law of sins, which is in the members of the body, is remitted in spiritual regeneration, and yet remains in the mortal body; remitted, because the guilt is abolished by the sacrament in which believers are born again. From this her Imperial Majesty will easily see that Majesty will easily see that we speak and believe of original sin just as the Catholic Church believes.

1) In Latin vitia; with Förstemann in German: Lüste.

From the IVth and VIth articles.

(3) In the fourth and sixth articles there is a great deal of controversy about merit, but it is not really stated how far the works of men are meritorious. And those who do not explain this, with their praise of works, completely obscure the righteousness of faith, which is of great need to the pious, and which must especially prevail and be preached in the church.

004 But how modestly they speak now of merit! Before this, when they spoke of the remission of sins, and of justification, there was no thought of faith; works only were thought of. They also said, that works without the Holy Spirit merited grace, but afterwards, with grace, they merited eternal life. So the whole Christian doctrine was nothing but a human worldly wisdom of civil morals. For this also they evidently wrote: A good work done without grace, and a good work done with grace, are of the same kind, and grace contributes only so much that eK is regarded as merit.

005 They so emphasized the ability of human nature, that they thought there was no need of the Holy Ghost. Yes, some were still in doubt as to whether grace does anything in the justified. They also taught that man could keep God's commandment by human ability, according to the nature of the thing (or deed), although the appearance of merit would be removed.

(6) Such blasphemies were not punished by popes at that time, but rather were freely taught in schools. But since there were doubts about indulgences, and also about the tyrannical rule of the pope, they were first made into intolerable heresies, and they were considered worthy of being made terrible examples of.

(7) But where there have been more thoughtful theologians, they have gradually improved much in such scholastic teaching. They recognize that more than reasonable philosophy has crept into Christian doctrine; they see that the human faculty has been exalted too high; they admit that the commandments of God do not only command civil duties, which reason can still meet to some extent, but also spiritual emotions, such as faith, hope, invocation of God, love of one's neighbor, killing of the flesh 2c.

008 They also now gladly add faith, when they speak of justification and remission of sins, that sins are not imputed unto them for faith's sake, who believe that they are forgiven for Christ's sake.

009 But they make a little of the merit of works, and confess that it is small. They say that works done in grace deserve eternal life, but minus principaliter. Out of such a heap of evil opinions they have kept this little piece.

010 And even if works were to some extent meritorious, yet our article is quite rightly and catholically worded, that the works commanded by God are indeed necessary to be done, but yet in such a way that we do not defy them, as if we thereby merited grace and righteousness, but merely and solely by the merits and voluntary promise of Christ. So much is written in our article. And there is no doubt that all Catholics confess and preach this; for thus saith the Prophet in the Psalm, "Thou wilt not enter into judgment with thy servant, for there is none living that is righteous before thee." Likewise, "If thou wilt impute sin, O Lord, who shall stand?" And Augustine says, "God does not bring us to eternal life by our merits, but by His mercy. So our Article commands us to do good works because of the divine will and command, and yet rejects reliance on works. This all pious and catholic men have always rejected, and it is a grievous blindness of the adversaries to be so defiant about merits, when they themselves confess that all our good works are impure, as the Scripture saith, "Who can say, I am pure in heart?" Fie! that we still boast of merits in such impurity of heart, since even the saints complain that they do not trust God, are angry with God's judgment, are plagued by many evil desires.

(11) The adversaries destroy Christ's saying with a fictitious interpretation, of which wise men can easily see what men will judge when it comes to light. "When ye have done all things, say, We are unprofitable servants;" they interpret it thus: Unprofitable servants to the dear God, not to ourselves.

012 What might not all things be said against this paltry interpretation, if I spared not your imperial majesty, our most gracious lord? For since the adversaries would put their names before their writing, they ought to have written with more diligence and accuracy.

(13) Ambrose has explained this passage much better, when he says: "It follows, therefore, that no one has to boast of works, because we owe obedience to God by right. And Soon after: Grace must be praised, but the weakness of nature must not be forgotten. But let us briefly prove that this word of Christ condemns merit and the confidence of merit. Christ has this very thing in view, that he would draw us away from ungodly confidence in our works. But he makes a conclusion of the same thing, that we could not make God our debtor. As a servant who does his duty does not make his master his debtor, so you also, he says, cannot make God your debtor, since you are servants. But since God is not a debtor, it necessarily follows that we cannot boast that works are meritorious. For how do they merit, since God owes them nothing?

014 To which is added, that he calleth us unprofitable servants. He that understandeth the manner of speaking, seeth easily that it is called unprofitable servants. For who fears God enough? who believes him as he should? Who loves God enough? Who is patient enough in tribulation? Who loves his neighbor rightly? Who does in all things as his profession requires? So he calls them "useless" korinulitsr, for one must speak to the sophists in a dialectical way. So Paul teaches that works are unclean: "I do not the good that I will, but the evil that I will not." Likewise, "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit." For sin, lust, contempt of God, distrust of God is in nature. These infirmities also trouble the saints and hinder good works. This is the true and louder opinion of the words of Christ.

(15) So the conclusion follows, which removes the confidence of works: Since God is not a debtor, nor are our works sufficient: who then can boast of merit? Will even a servant boast, if he has tilled the field very badly?

016 Finally, even the interpretation of the adversaries does us no good. For if the works of God are of no use, it follows that he owes them nothing. If he owes them nothing, how can they have the glory of merit?

017 But let us put aside these apparent subtleties, since every one sees that in this very saying Christ wished to punish confidence in works. And yet the adversaries seek to destroy such testimony by a false and deceitful interpretation. But there is no need for further argument. For it is clear that the Scriptures everywhere declare that we do not boast of ourselves, that we do not rely on our works or our abilities.

defy. Therefore we have rightly said that the works commanded by God must be done, and yet one must not rely on such works, but on the grace of Christ.

018 But, say they, the scripture requires the word "reward," therefore good works are meritorious. What do the adversaries bring forward but such childish and paltry contrivances, and want to appear to argue according to right reasoning, since they do not understand the language of Scripture? But that we may not endure and trouble any one too long with the refutation of such petty sophisms (for they are so obscure on account of their pointed nature that they are scarcely understood even in schools), we will only briefly say that it is called "reward," not for the sake of the worthiness of works, but for the sake of the promise of God. But the promise, as Paul teaches, is received by faith, not for our works, but for the merit of Christ. Now as the promise requires faith according to Paul, so the reward requires faith because it is a promised thing. But the cause of the promise is not the value of our works, but the merit of Christ.

(19) All this would be understandable enough, if the philosophical quarrels had not suppressed Paul's doctrine of the promises, of grace, of justification, of faith, in the church. Therefore, in our confession we have been content with these two sayings and sentences: 1) that we must necessarily do good works because of the commandment of God; 2) and that we must not rely on our works, but on the gracious promise of God. For though the righteousness of the law merits rewards of the law, yet we do not merit grace and righteousness before GOD by our works. For those who attach such glory to our works diminish the glory of Christ, as Paul says, "If righteousness comes from the law, Christ died in vain."

20 And in this way we say that we are justified by faith alone, because faith grasps the grace and mercy of God, seeing that God is gracious to us for Christ's sake. This faith is counted as righteousness before God. And because he receives the Holy Spirit, the Spirit renews the hearts and impels them to do good; as it is written in the prophet, "I will put my law in their hearts"; thus good works are the fruits of faith.

021 Meanwhile, faith recognizes that for Christ's sake, not for our works, we have a gracious God. Therefore Faith is righteous, and not works, because faith looks to Christ, for whom we are saved.

022 Otherwise men would have no sure and certain comfort against sins, if we obtained grace because of our works, because we always have something frail in us. But faith giveth a sure consolation to the conscience, in that it perceiveth that for Christ's sake we are surely accepted unto grace, though works be worthless.

023 The adversaries dispute about the word "alone," and would have it their jest. For they have made up a new name, that they may pass through us, and call us solarios, because we teach that men are justified sola fide, by faith alone; they also cry out that such a word ("alone") is not found in Scripture. They complain that the sacraments are excluded from this way. But we hold that a man is justified by faith, not because of works, either antecedent or antecedent. This faith is awakened by the Word and the Sacraments. So the sacraments are not excluded, but the merit of works. This also Paul does when he speaks, "It is the gift of GOD, not of works." This negation clearly excludes works. He also often speaks, "We are justified by grace through faith." Is not then "by grace" (or in vain) also an exclusionary word? And is it not just as much as if it said, we are justified by faith alone, when it is said, we are justified by grace (or freely)? Are not works thereby excluded? Here the imperial majesty sees Majesty, that once again a quarrel has arisen over a word, and that the adversaries interpret and misuse this word sola (alone) in a treacherous way, since all Catholics have always confessed that forgiveness of sins takes place by grace. And the adversaries themselves do not deny it. But they have their delight in childish bickering and quarreling over words. If the word sola is so annoying to them, why do they not scrape it out of the old books? for ours did not first speak in this way. In the Confession we have drawn on the words of Ambrosius: "Thus it is ordained of God, that whosoever believeth in Christ should be saved without works, by faith alone, and receive forgiveness of sins freely. Hilarius also says in Matt. 8: "It vexed the scribes that a man should forgive sins (for they regarded Christ as merely a man), and that that should be forgiven which the law could not remit; for the law is the law."

Faith alone (sola) makes righteous. Do these severe judges then wish to blot out the word sola even in the books of these, which have now been read so many hundred years? But the adversaries are ashamed of nothing. This whole matter of justification has been diligently and extensively treated by Augustine against the Pelagians, and by Ambrose in several books, and since they know that we follow their opinion, they yet catch a word which they can take about.

(24) In the seventh article they intend to make us hateful by mentioning John Hus, since we soon after clearly confess that in the church in this life there are many wicked and hypocrites mixed in. These adversaries are also called dead members of the church. Therefore, when we describe the church, we understand by it the living members. And lest any one think that we are dreaming of a Platonic church (or civil society), we add the outward marks by which the church is to be recognized, namely, unanimity (or agreement) in the gospel and use of the sacraments, as the gospel teaches. That assembly is the church in which such marks are. But among those who have these marks, some are holy; who rightly use such marks, others hypocrites and wicked, who abuse such marks. What can be said of loud-mouthed men? or what godly man 1) has spoken otherwise? But the adversaries have not shunned to report their imperial. Majesty evidently false. Does not Paul say Eph. 5: "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it, and cleanse it by the washing of water in the word" 2c. ? Here he calls the church a church, not of all, but of those who are being cleansed, and adds the outward signs, baptism and word.

025 That they say that the general (universal) ordinances of men are necessary for the right unity of the churches, we constantly deny. For the ordinances of men are not the ordinances of God, which are necessary to righteousness. Therefore equality in such laws is not necessary. As other nations have different lengths of days, so they may have different customs in the church. The Scriptures teach this in many places, Rom. 14: "The kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit"; Gal. 3: "You are all children of God through the Holy Spirit.

1) Chytraeus offers: plus instead of: xius.

Believing in Jesus Christ. For as many of you as have been baptized have put on Christ. For there is neither Jew nor Greek here, neither bond nor free, neither male nor female." But hereafter.

026 In the tenth we do not say that the dead body of Christ, or a body without blood, or blood without a body, is taken, but that the whole and living Christ is present in every part of the sacrament.

27 In the eleventh, although we consider confession and absolution to be right, as is known, we do not want to bind anyone's conscience to keep the chapter: Oinriis utrius'us ssxus them. All men and women 2c. because it is an impossible commandment that one confess all sins. It is not only impossible to remember all deeds, but also impossible to know all sins. For the heart of man is evil and unsearchable; human nature is full of evil desires, wickedness, and contempt for God. These sins are so inherent in nature that they cannot be seen or understood unless the Holy Spirit shows them in our hearts. But it is necessary to teach the consciences that even sins which are not told are forgiven believers.

028 And since the people ought to have been taught of absolution, and of the faith: the one care of all them that wrote, and taught in the churches, was to accustom the people to keep a register of sins. Meanwhile all was quiet from the faith.

029 Wherefore we will not lay this burden of the chapter, All of Both Sexes 2c. upon pious consciences, since it is burdensome enough in itself, without what they have added of innumerable and most dangerous cords of glosses.

030 In the twelfth, that they say that certain works must be laid upon the confessors for satisfaction, cannot be proved from Scripture.

031 And that they should say that the punishment of eternal death is changed into a temporal punishment, which is the expiation of the power of the keys, cannot be proved. And this opinion is too near to the glory of Christ's merit and satisfaction, because Christ is the sacrifice for sin, as the Scripture says, "He is the propitiation for our sins."

032 And what wickedness is this, to think that the guilt is taken away because of the merit of Christ, and the punishment because of our works, seeing Christ is the conqueror of death and sins, as it is written in Hebrews 2,
 "that he destroyed by death the one who had the dominion of death, that is, the devil, and delivered those who through fear of death had to be slaves all their lives."

033 Likewise, since the gospel preaches the forgiveness of sins by grace, it is false that sin is forgiven partly because of the death of Christ, and partly because of our atonement and repentance.

034 But though God may exercise the saints through divers afflictions, yet these cannot be put away nor taken away by the power of the keys.

035 David was punished after adultery; this punishment for sin was not necessary. But it pleased God both to humble him and to set an example to others. As he himself says, "It is good for me that thou hast humbled me, that I may learn thy statutes."

036 But when penitential canons (rules) were made in the churches, they had nothing to do with the forgiveness of sins, but were only a public chastisement, which served for an example, or that they might be tested who converted again to the church. It was a human custom that was not necessary for the forgiveness of sins or punishment.

(37) But it is not necessary to argue at length here. All pious men in all places testify that our doctrine of repentance has delivered many godly consciences from despair, and shown the true and certain consolation according to the Gospel. None of the school teachers ever set forth how sins are forgiven. This whole matter has remained unknown.

038 In the thirteenth article they require that we confess that there are seven sacraments. Of this number we have said nothing in our confession. For no one ever believed in the Church that it was necessary to count seven sacraments, when by sacraments we understand such ceremonies as Christ commanded to be kept, and to which he added the promise of grace. It is known that two such ceremonies are baptism and the Lord's Supper. Meanwhile we readily admit that absolution also may be called a sacrament, for it is a commandment and promise of Christ. We are also willing to accept that this name be given to the ordination of priests, if it is understood to mean the office of preaching, for it is God's command. Likewise also when it is given to marriage, for that also has God's command. But this (scil. Sacrament of Marriage) does not belong to the New Testament alone. Confirmation and the last rites are church customs,

But they have no express command from Christ. For this reason, these customs are to be regarded as necessary to salvation, just as other ordinances of men.

(39) And it is to be wondered at that they did not include prayer among the sacraments, since Dionysius includes it among them, and it can truly be called a sacrament, because it has a commandment from God and glorious promises. This name of a sacrament would have elevated prayer, as it were, and attracted it the more to prayer and faith.

040 But here again the adversaries lack sincerity. They do not quarrel with us about the number of the sacraments for any other cause than that they cast hatred upon us of the unintelligent. For they know well that this number has nothing dangerous in it, and yet that the simple are incensed when they hear that the sacraments are, as it were, mad. But they are strange to themselves, and do not want to know what errors they taught before, not only about the number of the sacraments, where there is no danger at all, but also about the use of them, which the Sophists have entirely perverted. For they taught that the sacraments conferred grace, and that mere works conferred grace by themselves (ex opere operato).

041 And this also is something more inconsistent, that a good disposition is not required for the reception of grace through the sacrament; who does not see that this is spoken quite blasphemously?

042 Wherefore this doctrine hath cast down all the faith of righteousness, and the right spiritual exercises of faith, and hath set up confidence in works, which falleth away in death and in the judgment of God. And afterwards consciences have had no consolation, because the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins and of righteousness by grace was not known. Now, however, even most of the adversaries recognize the usefulness of the doctrine which has driven ours from the use of the sacraments, namely, that the sacraments do not confer grace for the sake of mere action or deed, but that they are instituted to awaken faith, and are of use when faith is present; by which the timid consciences are raised up, and believe that God cares for them and accepts them for grace, and that they are heard by God for Christ's sake. For the word and the sacrament have the same effect, as Augustine also indicates when he writes: the sacrament is a visible word, that is, a sign that falls on the eyes, so that it moves the heart to faith.

(43) In the fourteenth, they demand that the ordination (or consecration) of bishops take place. Here we shall briefly reply that we desire to preserve the government of the church, and believe that it is conducive to the tranquility of the church. For this reason we would not accept ecclesiastics without the authority of bishops, if only the bishops were kinder and did not persecute true doctrine. But they ordain no one, and admit no one to the ecclesiastical office, to whom they do not lay before them the very severest points, namely, that he should not practice the doctrine of the Gospel, nor marry. And there are others that are just as hard.

44. But because our priests cannot in good conscience accept such points, they do not ask for the authority of the bishops. For "one must obey God more than men. If the bishops were to put an end to this tyranny, we would gladly give the bishops what they have to give, so that the wisely ordered scales in the Church would be preserved.

(45) And let the bishops see how they will give account to God, that they are the cause of the destruction of the obedience of the church by their stubbornness. Such tyranny does not befit shepherds, to whom, as Paul says, power has been given for edification and not for destruction.

46 In the fifteenth we find this exposed, that we have said that the doctrines of men (statutes) are not the services of God necessary to salvation. But such an article has been confirmed in our confession with many testimonies. And because we shall say more of it below, we will now only set forth one testimony, which Christ holds up to us: "In vain do they serve me with the commandments of men" [Matt. 15].

047 Since the Scriptures at such a stroke everywhere condemn the opinion that we deserve grace by services which are devised by ourselves without the word of God, what impudence is it to require these services as necessary?

(48) Of the invocation of the saints we admit that the angels and saints in heaven pray to God for the church, as the Scripture also says: that there is joy in the angels over one sinner who repents. But this serves nothing for the invocation. The invocation is uncertain and dangerous. For it has no testimony from the Scriptures; therefore we do not accept it, nor do we want to put the glory of Christ beside the glory of the saints. Christ alone is such an intercessor and mediator that he also is a reconciler. Other saints are not reconcilers. We have the command and the Promise of Christ: "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, that shall he give you." Therefore we must call upon Him in Christ's name, and hold up this High Priest and Reconciler to deck Father. This honor cannot be transferred to other saints.

The other part.

49. This doctrine, which we have confessed, not only brings about the correction of some abuses in outward things, but also has many other and higher goods, wherefore we have embraced it, and will abide in it to the glory of God. The whole church was before pressed with the works doctrine, and the glory of the merit of Christ and the righteousness of faith lay buried in darkness. In the sermons some taught of nothing but certain statutes of men, certain fasts, feasts, ceremonies, indulgences, certain orders, certain devotions to the saints, and the like. Of faith in Christ, of the righteousness of faith, nothing was heard. But this is the main part of Christian doctrine, the righteousness of faith.

050 And one of the most precious things is the doctrine of repentance. How much it has been defiled, not only by those who have sold indulgences, but also by other hypocrites who have forgotten the faith and taught that our sins are forgiven for our own merits, who have made our consciences despair through the reckoning of sins (in confession) and through ungodly pardons.

011 Therefore, since these things of repentance and the righteousness of faith have been purified in this doctrine which our people are practicing, and the glory of Christ has been promoted, we perceive that God is offering us great gifts. We see that the consciences have received a certain and firm consolation. We see in what the right service of God consists. We see what works and ways of life are pleasing to God.

022 The knowledge of these things hath first made this doctrine of ours dear unto us. From this the adversaries make much use of themselves, though they thank those who have taught them ill.

(53) Subsequently, some changes were made in the external customs of the church, which came primarily from the above-mentioned most important article, so that we did not want to act contrary to the word of God. And yet we have moderated such changes in such a way that we have mostly remained with the Catholic customs. In addition, we have also offered, out of love, to keep the general mine 1) To hold ceremonies with, which may be accepted without sin.

(54) But all such moderation, which we hope will help us with God, does not help us with the adversaries, who want us to accept by force all the old abuses against our conscience. But since we cannot be at their beck and call in this matter, we want to respond with a little to what, as far as we remember, has been read to us in the refutation of our confession. Maj. with due deference that she may deign to hear the reasons that require us to adhere to our opinion. For we have never lacked the will to obey Your Imperial Majesty in everything. Maj. in everything that can be done and accomplished without offence to conscience.

55 But now we cannot, without dishonoring Christ, approve of the old abuses. But if it should seem that one is speaking harshly, it is not in the least due to your Imperial Majesty, whose virtue and piety are known to the whole world. Maj. whose virtue and piety are known to the whole world, and whom we most humbly venerate as our most gracious Lord, but this whole quarrel concerns those who falsely accuse us before your Imperial Majesty of being contrary to Christian doctrine.

Of both shapes.

056 First of all, they reprove us for including among the abuses the fact that the laity are not given both forms of the sacrament, and they wish to enforce that it would be more of an abuse if the laity were given both forms.

(57) We have been asked to agree with this writing. And if it were nowhere but in this some piece objectionable, we should have high cause not to accept it. For with what mouth or insolence can we call the institution of Christ an abuse? It is known that this Sacrament was instituted by Christ for the whole Church. But how may any man dislocate the ordinance of Christ? Paul says, "No man may change a man's testament," but why do these not only change the testament of Christ, but also call it abuse? "I received it of the Lord," saith Paul, "which I gave unto you." But he had given to the whole church the use of both forms. Therefore both kinds of form are infallibly ordained for the whole church.

058 But as to the adversaries of the breaking of bread, which are found in Lucas and the Acts of the Apostles, thus

1) universales. This is well given in Förstemann's translation: "der gemeinen christlichen Kirche Gebräuche." They do not prove that in such places the sacrament was spoken of. And if it were so, they do not prove that only one form of the Sacrament was administered.

(59) They also refer to the story of Eli's descendants, to whom God threatens that he will expel them from the priesthood if they beg bread from priests. But everyone can easily see how beautifully such a story rhymes with the matter. Formerly the holding about Christ's institution was called an abuse; but now they conclude as if to indicate that the people should have been so punished as to receive from the priests only one form of the Sacrament, as the sons of Eli had to beg bread, since they were punished by God. In our opinion, those who call the preservation of the institution of Christ an abuse, and who consider the sacrament instituted for the consolation of consciences a punishment, taking away the other part, do not speak reverently of the sacrament.

060 But it is not necessary to answer this story of the descendants of Eli, since every one sees that it is drawn quite wrongly to this matter.

011 They also bring forward other proofs why it is good to give only one figure to the people, namely, that the blood may not be spilled; likewise, because it cannot be kept in vessels.

(62) But for these reasons or causes it is not necessary to abrogate Christ's institution. Therefore we maintain that it is not an abuse to use both forms of the Sacrament. For we dare not call Christ's institution an abuse.

(63) But when the testimonies of the Conciliar of Costnitz and the Conciliar of Basel are cited, neither of them calls it an abuse to use both forms. And in the decision of the Concilii of Basel it is clearly written: those who used both forms used the Sacrament rightly. Since this is so, it is rather an abuse to weigh down the consciences of men by prohibiting one form of the Sacrament.

From the priest marriage.

(64) It is to be wondered at that the canons should be insisted upon so strongly in this particular matter, when the obvious necessity of it calls for mitigation, and when they are otherwise so easily mitigated or relaxed in the smallest matters. And it is not to be denied that this prohibition of marriage is of human right only. It is also

The old canons allow priests to marry, but they do not allow them to remain in office. The old canons allow priests to marry, but they do not allow them to remain in office, yet they do not banish them. The newer canons, which should be more lenient in view of the great number of priests, are less lenient. 1)

For a time the deacons were allowed to marry in office, so that they were not forced to give up their office if they had not vowed "chastity"; but they were not forced to vow. This has subsequently been changed.

(66) For a long time it was customary for priests to keep the wives they had married before the priesthood. This was changed, but with the opposition of the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Councils.

(67) If at that time one did not resent the novelty, since a change was made against the authority of the conciliation and against divine law, why does one resent the novelty now, since it is evident that nothing is done against God's commandment when the married state is granted to this class, especially in these last times, since with nature the powers of men also decrease and vices increase? therefore do not disdain the means of recovery ordained by God.

68. Yea, the divine right compels them that have not the gift of chastity to marry. For thus Paul commands, "For the sake of fornication, let every man have his own wife." This commandment absolves from the canons those who are not fit for single status, for "one must obey GOD more than men."

069 But that the adversaries suppose that the priests must be pure, because it is right that the sacraments should be administered by the pure, is well concluded. For neither is marriage unfaithfulness. For the Scripture says that marriage is honest, and the holy martyr Paphnutius, with the assent of the whole Nicene Council, said that marriage is honest, and that intercourse with one's lawful wife is chastity. This is not to be called purity, when consciences are defiled either by fornication or other rutting of lust. And Paul would rather that husbands and wives should come together again, than that they should be tempted of Satan. So he thinks it a better purity for husbands and wives to attend one another, than the pretended continence is, where the gift is not present. But there is not much of this is to be disputed. All Scripture praises marriage, and teaches that it is God's order and appointment. Therefore, it is sanctified by God's word. There is, then, a marital purity, namely, faith, since husbands and wives are assured that this way of life is pleasing to God, and see to it that they walk according to God's commandment in this state, and neither fornicate nor commit adultery.

(Seventy) And the celibate state is not to be exalted with fancied praise, so that the consciences of married persons are burdened thereby, as if they lived in an impure state. Our opponents accuse us of following the heresy of Jovinianus, who deprives virginity of its due praise. But we do not reproach it. She retains the praise which Christ attaches to him who intertwines himself for the sake of the kingdom of heaven. We do not speak of virginity, but of the weakness of men.

(71) Virginity is praiseworthy in those who have this gift. But if some do not have the gift, it is not necessary to press them with the hard canon that commanded the celibate state. This is also the opinion of Ambrose, who says: "Virginity alone can only be advised, but not commanded; it is a matter that is based more on vows than on commandments.

Seventy-two: but they say that one should seek to obtain it by prayer and other exercises. Why then do not those do this who fight for the celibate state? For their shameful deeds are all too well known, but they are not to be told here before the chaste and honorable emperor. Rather, we answer thus: This is not praying, but tempting God, when one has experienced his weakness in battle, and yet does not want to need God's order. There are books by great men who lament the rut of these people who have resisted temptations with all earnestness, and show sufficiently how much these temptations have wounded their consciences. For Christ Himself says, "Not all grasp this word." Therefore God wants some to need His order. Therefore we must pray that the ordinance of God may not be despised, which he wants to be used by those to whom he has not given the gift, just as he wants us to need food and other creatures, since he does not preserve our life without the use of them.

Seventy-three But it is ridiculous for them to say that this word of God, "Be fruitful and multiply," applies only to the same time when there were few people, and not to ours.

Seventy-four We hold, then, that the same words create and order nature as it will be afterwards.

And it cannot be otherwise than other words of this kind, than, Let the earth bring forth green herbs. "This word clothes the fields, produces fruit yearly, brings forth food and fare for all animals. Thus this saying, "Be fruitful and" 2c. contains not only a commandment, but also the nature of nature in itself, which to change is not our, but God's work.

75. And the virgins, if they have truly kept virginity, have not done contrary to God's commandment, because they have been free from the aforementioned nature, and therefore the aforementioned commandment has not affected them, as far as the nature of nature is concerned. For a special gift and work of God made them free.

Seventy-six: But let us suppose that it is easy for every man to keep continual chastity. Who then gave the popes authority to interpret this law to the churches? especially since Paul reminded us beforehand that such laws are the doctrines of devils.

This and much more might be said in this matter if one knew nothing about it. Now, however, there is such an obvious need to mitigate this Canon that there is no need for much discussion. Those are guilty of all the lewdness and fornication of this state who defend this canon against God's commandment. Therefore we cannot agree with those who condemn the marriage of priests.

From the fair.

78. The adversaries confess that there are many abuses of the Mass. Therefore they will forgive ours, who have punished these defects, which would not have crept into the Church if the bishops had been vigilant.

(79) But it is easy to judge whether this is an abuse, if they hold a certain number of masses against their will at certain times for a reward and out of a certain compulsion of the laws of the foundations, when they are not at all skilled to do so.

80. These infirmities are so common and so well known that they cannot be disguised. But there are some others not so well known to the inexperienced, which the adversaries have touched upon above. They maintain that the mass is a sacrifice, because it was so kept a thousand years ago, and because the Greeks call it liturgy (or the sacred office, service). Likewise because Misbeach is called an altar in Hebrew, and Thysiasterion (or place of sacrifice) in Greek. Finally, because Christ says, "This doeth," but to do means as much as to sacrifice. They add that it is an Arian heresy if anyone believes that the mass is not a sacrifice.

81. And these reasons they deem sufficient that they put before them the title of their Imperial Majesty. Maj. What the people will judge of these, if they should be printed, clever people can soon see.

82. They think that the most important and highest matter of all, which is now being argued about, is sufficiently protected if a few words are brought forward which have been taken from some schoolmaster. But what do they add to the matter? Let alone that these same scribes, if they tore themselves apart, would not be able to give any derivation of their words.

83. May not such words be countered with as many others, which are much better to be heard? The Church calls it a synaxis, a communion; and the Canon itself says that many take (or enjoy) from the altar. But since this is not appropriate for silent Masses, we see from this that the use of silent Masses is quite new.

But such a great thing is not to be judged by mere opinions. And the quarrel is not about the name. We know that the mass was called a sacrifice by the ancients, because it was a memorial of the sacrifice of Christ, as Irenaeus says. And we readily admit that the holy fathers so call it. For we do not dispute with them, but with the moderns, who wrongly understand the name sacrifice, and have introduced into the Church opinions and services which are not at all in harmony with the Gospel.

85. We dispute about merit and dedication, whether the Lord's supper is a work that merits grace by the mere performance of it? Likewise, which, being performed for others, and appropriated to them, merits grace by the mere act?

86. Although the books of the adversaries are full of such things, yet no testimony can be brought forth from any ancient church scribes, that the mass, by the mere doing (or keeping) of it, obtains grace for others. For these strange and outrageous opinions or words are new, and devised by the monks, who have abused the Mass for a shameful gain. The doctrine of the opus operatum, and of the bestowal (or application) of the same, evidently conflicts with the Gospel and with the righteousness of faith. For Scripture teaches that we are justified by faith, and not by works. But if the mass merits grace for the sake of mere deeds, it must follow that righteousness is of works without faith. And the adversaries do not deny that they hold this opinion.

They have publicly written, not only of the holy supper, but also of sacraments in general, that no good disposition is required for the reception of grace through the sacrament. And they do not only think that he who holds or performs it is justified, but also those to whom it is administered (or for whose benefit it is administered). These, they say, necessarily attain to grace, if they do not advance a bar. Is not all this contrary to the doctrine of faith? And with this single reason we will leave it in this piece, because the matter is quite evident and well known.

(87) We receive the merit of Christ by faith. But they confer the merit of the mass on others, even without faith. So they make more of the merit of the mass than of the merit of Christ.

(88) These opinions have crept into the Church since the doctrine of the righteousness of faith was extinct, and the right use of the sacraments and ceremonies cannot be kept unless the righteousness of faith is known.

89 We therefore reject the merit of the opus operatum, and the consecration of the same. And since the Masses of silence have been done in the opinion, we cannot restore them, or accomodate those who defend them, but let it be a common Mass, where the Sacrament is administered to those who need it, for the consolation of the wicked consciences. For this purpose, as we are taught in the Confession, the Sacrament was instituted. And of this use of the Sacrament the Fathers of the Church have written. And we must not be thought Arians, because we do not approve of such a devotion, which is contrary to the Gospel.

90 This also is a false pretence, that we have done away with the continual sacrifice. For if the mass were represented by the daily sacrifice, we would certainly not abolish the mass, but only improve its abuse.

91. We hold to the usage of the ancient church. Those who require the body and blood of Christ take it from some one. The people are urged to the communion and custom of the Sacrament. With the adversaries the people very seldom need the Sacrament, only some few who are urged need it. So we hold more above the use of the Sacrament and daily sacrifice, as they call it, than the adversaries.

022 But because the adversaries are so set upon this change of the still mass, and accuse us that we, like one Antiochus, are abolishing the continual sacrifice, it is necessary to say something more of it.

93. Numbers 28 describes the daily sacrifice. A lamb was burned, and bread sprinkled with oil was offered. Then came the drink offering, a certain measure of wine. This was a constant ceremony. Now if any man will that this signifieth the mass, let it be so, but that it may comprehend the whole mass, that is, the supper with the preaching of the word added to this ceremony, as Paul saith, "As often as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord, until he come. "

(94) Now as there was a perpetual ceremony, which also signified that Christ would come, and that this people would remain until Christ was born: so we have the Lord's supper, which is justly called an everlasting testament, because it testifies that Christ has appeared, and that no other new word is to be expected from God, which he will send to the world. And this new testament also means that the Church will always remain. But to the ceremony must also come the word and the preaching of the Gospel, through which Christ is made known and the sacrifices are slain, and they give thanks and praise to God. These are the sacrifices of the New Testament.

95. These sacrifices were presented in the Old Testament; namely, that after Christ had appeared, the gospel would remain and be taught in the world forever, so that continually some would be converted and become a sacrifice to God, and receive eternal life, and give thanks and praise to God, and testify that the teaching of the gospel is true, that God is truly angry with sinners, that He truly forgives believers, truly hears them, truly makes them blessed, and thus also entices others to believe. Thus Paul interprets the sacrifice of preaching, faith, and thanksgiving, Rom. 15: "That I might be a minister of JESUS CHRIST among the Gentiles, offering the gospel of GOD, that it might be a sacrifice of the Gentiles, acceptable and sanctified by the Holy Ghost"; and Phil. 2: "But I also am offered for the sacrifice and gift of your faith." For the burning of the lamb signifies the putting to death of Christ and all his members; the bread roll, the giving of life by faith in the preaching of the gospel, which comforts consciences terrified by the preaching of repentance; the drink offering, thanksgiving and preaching. This sacrifice of preaching faith and thanksgiving must always remain in the church. But the ceremony itself, without doctrine, is dumb.

96. the ancients called the supper "thanksgiving," to imply that this ceremony was that therein the benefits of Christ might be extolled, and the sore consciences raised up, and the confidence or assurance, knowing of the forgiveness of sins, strengthened, and grace dispensed.

97. Now let us see who shall destroy and abolish the continual sacrifice? The gospel is taught in very few places by the adversaries. In many great countries there are often no sermons preached, and when they are preached, some monk tells his dream, or, if it goes well, some worldly saying from the worldly wisdom. Of Christ, of faith in Christ, that through him we have a reconciled God, that through him we obtain all good things from God, not because of our merits; of the exercise of faith in all tribulations, of every man's calling, of love, etc., of such things one hears nothing at all or little, where nothing is so much in vogue as fine masses. But the ceremony, which is instituted for the preaching of Christ, is used for a quite different custom, that it may purchase grace for others by the mere doing of the work. There the continual sacrifice has been quite abolished, where the right use of the sacrament has been entirely perverted, and all is silent from the preaching of the gospel. For thus it is written of the ungodly sacrifice, Proverbs 15: "The sacrifice of the ungodly is detestable to God, but the prayer of the sincere is pleasing to Him." Here the Holy Spirit requires faith and prayer; does not accept the mere work without word and faith, as the fine Mass is. And in Jeremiah GOD says, "I commanded you not of burnt-offerings in the day that I brought you out of the land of Egypt, but this have I said unto them, Hear my voice, and I will be your GOD" [Jer. 7]. Here the prophet evidently condemns mere works, and wants to have word and faith, that we may take hold of grace in faith, and believe GOD. In the realm of the popes, however, who want either to set aside the teaching of the Gospel or to persecute and destroy it, the ceremony remains, but they do not hear the voice of God; they do not ask that the Gospel be taught by the doctrine of faith, but defend the merit of mere works and other ungodly services. Therefore it may be better for them to abolish the continual sacrifice.

98. There are also many other signs that this rule of the popes was foreshadowed by the kingdom of Antioch. Do not the popes worship their god with gold, silver, and precious stones, and contend with us that we do not approve of these ungodly services? They accuse us that we do not approve of the ceremonies that we desecrate the altars and monasteries. They exhort the most gracious emperor to inflict severe punishment on us. These are Antiochi examples that do not concern us. For with us, thank God. the custom of the Church and the lawful administration of the Sacrament still remain, and the preaching of the Gospel resounds from the true service of God, from faith, from hope, from the Cross, not from human statutes or school dreams.

99. They also pervert the words of Malachi to the fair: "From the going forth of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name shall be great among the heathen; and in every place incense shall be burned unto my name, and a pure offering shall be offered: for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the LORD of hosts. The same kind of fanciful expressions are found in other prophets, who, when they speak of the gospel, are wont to use words of the law, and thereby, of course, indicate a spiritual, but not another, outward service of God. For the epistle to the Hebrews also teaches that after Christ's death no sacrifice for sin is necessary. Therefore Peter teaches that we are the holy 'priesthood,' to offer spiritual sacrifices. We must therefore take the passage from Malachi in such a way that incense and sacrifice are understood there not from mere ceremony, but from preaching, faith, and thanksgiving. For without this the ceremony itself is not a sacrifice, for the sake of the mere work, as they speak, as it is written in the epistle to the Hebrews, "Through him we offer the sacrifice of praise to GOD always, that is, the fruit of the lips that confess his name."

001 And the words of Malachi themselves sufficiently indicate that the mere ceremony is not to be understood, because the incense is not a model, which actually signifies the supper, but prayer. Likewise it is added: "My name will be great among the Gentiles. This goes to the preaching, because the name of God is widely spread and proclaimed through the preaching of the Gospel. And people learn to recognize, fear and believe in God.

(101) In this way also the ancients explain this passage of Malachi. For thus saith Tertullian, "In every place a pure offering," that is, a pure prayer out of a pure and clean heart. And Jerome: This is a rule of Scripture, where a manifest prophecy of things to come is involved, let not that which is written be weakened by uncertain similitudes. They that offer the blind and the lame ought to know that spiritual sacrifices follow carnal sacrifices, and not the blood of goats or of oxen, but incense, that is to say, spirits.

The Holy One will be sacrificed to God, and not only in the Jewish land, nor in the one city of the Jewish land, Jerusalem, but in all places.

102 Finally, though the adversaries boast as they will of the meaning of the continual sacrifice, and put on the words of Malachi, yet they will not bring out that the Lord's Supper is a continual sacrifice by mere act (ex opere operato), without preaching and faith, and that when it is administered to others it procures them grace and righteousness.

103. Neither the words of Malachi, nor the image of the continual sacrifice, help them to strengthen or establish these ungodly opinions. And as it goes, one error always spreads another. Since one has once been entrusted with the dedication of the mass, one has begun to ask whether the merit of the mass is finite or infinite? whether it is divisible? whether one mass is worth as much to many as one is to each person? Good profit was to be made from this. In all danger, people took refuge in this work, as in an idol. But Christ wants to be called upon in faith; he wants all goods to be expected in faith, not because of our merits or works.

104 But since the opponents have not given any reasons for the merit and dedication of the Mass, but only refer to the name of sacrifice, and that from the Fathers, but not from the canonical Scriptures, no further answer seems necessary.

055 Neither can they, either from the scriptures, or from the fathers, bring forward anything so certain, or so certain, as to overthrow the reason we have given. For this is a certain proposition: that if righteousness be of faith, it cannot be of a mere work done. Therefore the mass does not justify. 1)

(106) We have also heard that the opponents make much ado that something of the Canon of the Mass is omitted with us. This is a great disadvantage to us, because the Canon is universally held in high esteem.

(107) We most earnestly beg that Your Imperial Majesty will not think that we have changed anything in the Canon out of contempt for religion or the sacraments. Our brethren present great and important reasons why they have omitted something from the Canon, and say that they were compelled to omit some things out of reverence for the Sacrament,

1) This sentence is missing in the old edition.

obvious abuses have arisen from it. And that one does not think that hereunder something happens against the Catholic Church, so is

(108) To begin with, it should be noted that the same canon of the Mass is not used everywhere. For the Greek Canon is different from the Latin, and in some places even the Latin ones do not agree with each other. And even honest scribes confess that Christ taught only the words of the blessing, after which the bishops added the rest, always one more than the other, for adornment and more celebration; for so speaks the gloss in the Decrees. Just as before such diversity did nothing to the Catholic faith, so now we must be of the opinion that the Catholic faith is not challenged, even if we omit something from the canon of the Mass, if we retain only the words that contain the blessing. And in this we holily persevere. We also retain the prayer and the thanksgiving. And the Canon itself sufficiently shows that at times something has been added to or taken away from it. For it is well to be seen that some pieces do not quite hang together; and some words of Scripture are quite wrongly twisted on the sacrifice. And since the nature of the sacrifice has not been rightly understood, the scribes have afterwards corrupted the Canon still more. For we have not yet seen any of the Adversary's writings (of which we have seen great volumes) that could have rightly described the sacrifice. They are so foolish and clumsy that, when they argue about the sacrifice, when they defend the canon of the Mass, they cannot describe or define what the sacrifice actually is, what difference there is between the sacrifices of the Old and New Testaments, and what difference there is between the sacrament and the sacrifice. The adversaries do not take offense at this, since wise men especially inquire about it in this controversy.

(109) Some in the Canon omit that he calls the still unblessed bread the sacrifice of salvation; that the priest prays and supplicates for Christ, that God may graciously accept this sacrifice, which comes out just as if the priest were the mediator between Christ and the Father. Likewise, he asks that this sacrifice please God, as did the sacrifice of Abel, as if other sacrifices had been more than Christ. Now this is inconsistent, but there are other things of which ours are more disapproving; for example, that the same part of the canon assigns the mass to the living and the dead, that they may be saved by such a work. This dedication is obviously contrary to the Gospel and the righteousness of faith.

If this were not clear, one could doubt whether this part of the canon would be justly censured. But it is so obvious that one can not only see it with one's eyes, but also grasp it with one's hands, that men do not become righteous through the appropriation of another's work or merit, without faith. Wherefore it is also evident that the part of the canon in which it sets forth such an assignation of the masses for the living and the dead, departs not only from one or another saying of the gospel, which is not of much consequence, but from a principal part of the gospel, namely, the whole doctrine of the righteousness of faith. And since this is so, ours will be justly forgiven for holding the word of the Gospel higher than the word of the canon, especially since all confess that the same part of the canon has been added by human power or decree, and that unequal canons of the Mass have always been in the church. But a clear and certain testimony of Scripture must always be accepted more than a human decree.

(110) What can the adversaries say, though they are quite insolent, against such manifest truth? The matter is so clear that it is impossible even to make a pretence of objecting to it. Since faith makes righteous, it is an ungodly and heretical opinion that the mass, which is imputed or appropriated to another in mere deed, makes him righteous. And therefore, since such an appropriation cannot be proved, there is a high and important reason why that part of the canon in which such an appropriation is contained is omitted. 1)

Of vows.

111) If we are not mistaken, these words were included in the refutation, that the vows had their foundation in the Old and New Testaments. Of the Old we shall answer soon after; but where they are in the New Testament we know not, except in these passages, "In vain do they serve me with the commandments of men," 2c. and, "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up," 2c. These passages are quite appropriate to vows. And we shall find many such sayings also from the monks. For example, Matt. 23: "Woe to you, Christian scholars and Pharisees, you hypocrites, you are like the tombs that are whitened, which from without shining beautifully, but inwardly full of dead men's bones and uncleanness; just as you outwardly appear righteous before men, but inwardly are full of hypocrisy and unchastity." If there are other passages in the New Testament which are more suitable for vows, let the monks bring them forward, and we will gladly answer them.

(112) But now we only answer in general: The vows, which are made in the opinion of earning righteousness and grace by such work, are an ungodly service, and are not approved either in the Old or New Testament. For St. Paul's saying is, "Ye are empty of Christ (have lost him), who are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace." Therefore they rather are fallen from grace who seek righteousness by vows, who are wholly without command and word of GOD. The holy men, as Bernard, Franciscus, Bonaventure, and the like, so lived in such (religious) rules that they believed they did not merit grace by such exercises, but knew that they were justified by faith. But they lived in such rules as in schools, because these bodily exercises seemed convenient to them. But this was a common error, that the monastic vow was another baptism, and that the monastic life merited grace and was sufficient for sin. So ours teach that these opinions are ungodly, and that vows of this opinion are useless and futile. Against this doctrine of ours the adversaries raise nothing. This is the question in dispute, and we do not know whether the opponents have touched it.

113. If they admit to us that the vows do not merit grace; that the monastic service is a vain service, as Christ says, "In vain do they serve me with the commandments of men," they will also readily admit that the vows themselves, which are made in an ungodly mind, are useless and vain.

(114) But they cite a passage from the Gospel: "Whosoever shall leave house, or brethren, or sister, or father, or mother, or wife, for my name's sake, the same shall receive it a hundredfold. This is truly to deceive the simple-minded, when one forcibly drags a quite unseemly place into the monastic life. It is a twofold leaving: one is without profession; the other with profession. Of the latter Christ speaks. For nothing must be done without a profession, contrary to the commandments of God. The opinion therefore is this, that in persecution we should rather lay down our lives and all, than deny and forsake the gospel.

Therefore he adds, "For the sake of the gospel (my name)." For it is not necessary to interpret the saying in such a way that it conflicts with other commandments of God. Now other commandments forbid to leave wife and child. But if we are forced by force to leave wife and child, if we are driven from house and home, if we are killed and strangled, we are excused. Of such persecutions Christ speaks, that we patiently suffer the wrong. But the adversaries do not interpret it of persecution or violence, but of a fleeing or leaving without profession, even contrary to God's commandments. For they give way that he who is betrothed may leave the bride and go into a monastery.

115. Then this leaving is not because of the gospel, or the ministry, or the confession of the word, but because of the holding of certain services which are rejected in the Scriptures. So they do not leave house, or father, or mother, for the name of Christ, but because of the wrong opinion they have formed of such useless worship.

016 And perhaps many leave, not for the glory of the gospel, but for the service of their bellies, a small fortune, that they might receive an hundredfold, that is, that they might have idleness and good cooking.

(117) The monks also refer to this saying because of perfection: "If you want to be perfect, go, sell everything you have and give it to the poor, and follow me. This saying contains a special calling, which concerned only the same person, but not everyone. For he commanded that he should follow and go about with them, as the other apostles did. And just as he was to follow the calling, so we also must first wait for a calling. And we must not run away from our goods without a profession, or leave our family. Then we shall be perfect, if we follow our profession. From this it will be known that we believe in God. Perfection must be understood in such a way, not that leaving makes one perfect, but that obedience proves that faith is perfect, that is, honest and uncolored. The monastic life, however, is first accepted without profession, and then it also has such services as are not commanded by God.

This is why almost the entire work is in conflict with the profession. But it is a most dangerous life to live without profession and the word of God. But where there are some who serve the gospel in it, we do not reject them, if they only teach and understand faithfully and truthfully,

That they have upon them a way of life and service pleasing to God, not because of the monastic life and services, but because of the ministry of the Word.

(119) But if the adversaries will not confess that the monastic life has ever been called a state of perfection, Gerson may answer for it. For he has written a special book to refute such an ungodly opinion, and he assures us that some call him so. But it is not needful to seek witnesses. We have mostly all heard monks preach such things in churches. Some intelligent people have wanted to correct the common error, but still keep the common and common words, which is why they wrote: the monastic life is a state of attaining perfection. This is wisely said, if only the people understand it rightly. But what state or way of life is not a state of attaining perfection? In marriage, in all occupations, we must strive for perfection, and believe that God has called each one to a certain office, in which He will exercise him, that he may learn to believe. This faith is the perfection of each one.

(120) Perhaps it would be better to say that the monastic life was a school, a discipline, and a teaching for children, the ultimate end of which was not the same spiritual perfection as in other orders, but scholarship and science, by which young men were sent to govern and teach churches. Such were the collegia of Basil and Augustine in the beginning, where the students were together and practiced the holy Scriptures and were taught honest morals, so that they could later preside over churches. And there the consciences remained free from vows. If there were still such monasteries, no one would blame them. Now in monasteries mostly lazy bellies are fed, who, under the pretext of religion, splurge on the common alms.

121 And when the adversaries exhort us that we should reform the monasteries according to the example of our ancestors, they admit that the morals of the monks have become worse. But we consider this the best reformation, that we imprison no one in it against his conscience. However, we want to establish schools of the Holy Scriptures in our countries according to our ability, and when they are established, we want to decorate them.

(122) Finally, the adversaries conclude that constant chastity is not impossible for man. And since it is difficult, it must be asked for with prayer. Of this conclusion we have said above: one must pray in such a way that we may, however, obtain the chastity given by God.

We must not spurn the means when our weakness requires it: "For he that loveth danger shall perish within. " But who knows not what danger is in this weakness of human nature, under the most vexatious persecutions of the devil? And it has been rightly said by holy men, that it is a constant strife and a rare victory. Therefore, we do not want to prevent those who cannot bear the burden of monastic life from marrying according to God's word and order.

Of church power.

(123) In this article the opponents have not made much mention of what church authority actually is, according to the Gospel. They have almost only spoken of the liberty of the spiritual estate, which they have by human right. We, however, have often said that we would gladly do all honor and duty both to others and to this estate.

124. The bishops have their goods and dominions by human right. We take nothing from any of them. But they should not only take care of their property and power, but also of their office and duty, that the churches have pastors, that priests are appointed, that the pure doctrine of the Gospel is preached in schools and churches, so that faith and love arise in the minds of the people; That the sacraments be administered sacredly, and public vices be punished and corrected by ecclesiastical excommunication; that the church ordinances be established for edification and not for destruction, and church discipline be so maintained that the consciences of the pious not be burdened with unjust burdens; that the schools of good arts, which are useful to the church, be preserved.

(125) The bishops have long since abandoned this care, and if there have been some more pious ones, they have been more troubled by insisting on the statutes of men than by teaching the gospel. But even this discipline is no longer kept in Rome, but is mocked.

(126) The popes war with the kings over the dominion. As the winds stir up the sea, which is in itself calm, so the popes stir up all the kingdoms as often as they please.

(127) This is not only contrary to the Gospel, but also to the canons. Meanwhile they demand of others the canons as strictly as they can, since no one holds less to the canons than the bishops themselves, and yet they want their reputation and fortune to be defended, since they ask nothing of the churches, and of the Canons forget that the beneficium (or church property) is given because of the direction of the office.

(128) To deplore this at this time is considered a deadly crime and heresy. And we would not have come to this if the adversaries had not caused it.

By the way, we have often testified that we not only highly honor and respect the ecclesiastical power instituted in the Gospel as the highest gift of God, through which we may know God and be delivered from sin and the power of the devil and attain eternal life, but also very much approve of the ecclesiastical government and scales in the Church, and, as much as is in us, want to have them preserved. We do not refuse the authority of the bishops, if only they do not force us to act contrary to the commandments of God. This sense will acquit us before God's judgment, and before all our posterity we will be found innocent, that we did not cause this division, which was first caused by the unjust condemnation of Luther's teaching, but is now increased by their defiance, who cannot be moved to soften one or the other church order, in which we would give way to their tyranny, if we could do so without offense to our conscience. But now we must obey God more than men.

130 But now let us come to the controversy of the statutes of the church, which the adversaries have here touched.

(131) In our confession we have indicated what we consider to be church authority according to the Gospel. It is a command to teach the gospel, to administer the sacraments, and to forgive and retain sins. This authority is called partly the authority of the priestly office (ordinis), 1) and partly jurisdiction.

(132) These great benefits of God are obscured when some add to them the power to establish laws and new services. For when the mind conceives that Christ has commanded the church to institute some new services and ceremonies apart from the gospel, the doctrine of the grace and righteousness of faith and the forgiveness of sins is immediately obscured, and men think they are justified by the righteousness of works, that is, of such services, but not by faith in Christ. And because such statutes are never kept right, consciences are in constant fear. This, then, remains a matter of dispute: whether the

1) That is, to preach the gospel, to reach Sacrammt 2c. Cf. J. T. Müller, 1. e. p. 288.

Bishops have power to establish new services and laws apart from the Gospel? The opponents conclude, then, that since the gospel gives the bishops power of jurisdiction, it follows that they have power to give laws. But this must not follow. For it is true that the Scriptures allow them to exercise jurisdiction, to loose and bind; but not according to new laws, but according to the Gospel itself. For they have not a tyrannical power without certain laws, or a kingly, above the law which they have received. For thus saith Paul, "We can do nothing contrary to the truth."

(133) In the confession, however, we have not entirely taken away the power of the bishops to make ordinances in the church. But we have made a distinction among the laws. There must be ordinances in the churches, that the people may know at what time they are to meet together, that there may also be order in the offices, as Paul saith, "Let all things be done orderly and honestly."

(134) Another kind of ordinances is when certain services, differences of food, days, celibacy, and such customs are instituted. Likewise, when these ordinances themselves, which were made, not that such works should propitiate God, but that there should be no confusion in the church, are held to be necessary services. And what we believe of both kinds we have shown in the confession.

(135) A man may use any exercise he pleases, if he does not otherwise seek to merit grace by it. But to ordain such a work, and yet to bind the conscience, and to make of it a work necessary to salvation, is, as Peter says, to tempt God, and is contrary to Christian liberty, which teaches that we are justified freely by faith in Christ, and not by our works, and forbids the ordaining of any such services as necessary to salvation.

(136) But the adversaries cannot deny that such practices have been given out for meritorious services. For St. Thomas also writes expressly, "Fasting is for the expiation and prevention of guilt. This blasphemous opinion is by no means to be tolerated in the church, that human ordinances are good for the expiation of guilt, since all Catholics confess that the forgiveness of sins is by grace. If, therefore, there are some ordinances which can be kept without sin, and serve for good discipline in the church, one may Hold them thus, that no man be offended. But do not consider them necessary to righteousness or faith, as they commonly say; and do not think that consciences will be defiled if they are allowed to stand without offense. As, then, most have been made, not to trouble the consciences, or to introduce services, but only to prevent disorder in the churches, and vexation. For we are not speaking here of secular and judicial laws, but actually of church ceremonies and church customs.

137. The adversaries vehemently reproach this doctrine of Christian liberty; but let them know that they do not thereby blaspheme us, but the word of God. For if such works are regarded as necessary services to Christian righteousness, the righteousness of faith and grace is entirely obscured.

(138) But this doctrine must of necessity prevail in the church, that we are not justified by our works and services, but by faith in Christ, through grace. It is necessary to know and recognize that for the right unity of faith it is not at all necessary that everywhere there should be one and the same human order. But all this is thrown away, if the doctrine of Christian liberty is not practiced.

(139) And what should it not be to pious souls an unheard-of torment to have to deal with the innumerable heap of such statutes and ceremonies, if this consolation and cheap moderation were not used? As Gerson also says, "It is also known (these are his words) that there are so many such statutes that, if they had to be kept most strictly, the greatest part of the church would be condemned, and love, which is the end of the whole law, even of the divine law, would be violated.

140. And wise and godly men have always complained greatly of these troubles, seeing that first of all the doctrine of faith and grace, and likewise the commandments of God, were darkened and left undone, because the people were united and anxious only that they should not let men's faults stand; as Gershon saith: The simple and fearful subjects, when they are thus enjoined by their rulers to take heed of so many statutes, what wonder is it that afterwards they become the more unfit thereby to discern the divine commandments?

141 Although it is not only the common rabble, but also the scholars who feel this way. So-

Then they saw that the consciences were in many snares and dangers, since there was no one to keep so many statutes. Therefore it is necessary to teach such reasonable moderation in and because of the ordinances of men.

(142) And although savage men generally abuse such indulgence, yet the church and the pious must be regarded more than they. Thus Gerson also judged, when he says: "Although contempt arises in some from such indulgence and leniency, yet some others, who get a right understanding from it, will give thanks for it. There are already authorities who can punish wild and unruly people when it is necessary. And a prudent preacher will also remind both of liberty and of the avoidance of offences, as Paul is wont to do in this matter.

(143) Nor did ours speak of this trade first or only, but others have already written about it. Gerson has no hesitation in speaking of it: The prelates of the churches have as little power to bind their subjects to some things which the evangelical rule, which is accepted and recognized by all Christians, does not prescribe, as the elders have power to bind their monks to anything except their religious rule. For it is the unanimous opinion of St. Thomas and other teachers that the abbot cannot impose or command a monk to do anything more than he has understood and agreed to do in his rule.

144 We have therefore wished at this time to answer that which was still in our memory, and we do not refuse, on account of this confession of ours, to answer to him who requires reason of us.

145 If we had seen the rebuttal that was read to us in the name of the imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, we would have been able to answer most things more appropriately and better.

The other and more complete apologia.

Mid-April 1531.

Since the draft of the Apology (the previous writing) had not been accepted, the necessity arose to publish the Apology. For this purpose, Melancthon completely revised the draft, and the more complete Apology appeared in quarto in mid-April 1531. The Latin text derives entirely from Melancthon, but the German text by Justus Jonas is not a mere translation, but since Melancthon was involved and, in his own way, made additions, changes, which the Latin text did not contain, it has an independent meaning. We have placed the title that Melancthon gave to this writing above it in the following. For the rest, we refer to J. T. Müller, "Die symbolischen Bücher," Introduction, p. UXXXIII ff. - The editions of this writing are innumerable. The first Latin edition is printed in Cölestin, üist. eoruit. XuZust., torn. IV, toi. 1: in Melancthon's Works, tom. I, x>. 58, and in the Jena edition of Luther's works (1570), tora. IV, col. 203d. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 319; in the Jena (1568), vol. VI, p. 378; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 46, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 28. We give the text according to J. T. Müller. The Wittenberg edition, of which Melancthon was the editor, offers a text so much altered that one can hardly recognize the Apology. The Jena edition, whose text Walch has printed, agrees almost word for word with Müller.

Apologia of the Confession

translated from Latin by Justum Jonam.

Preface.

Philippus Melancthon to the reader.

When the confession of our most gracious and gracious lords, the Elector of Saxony, and the princes of that part, was publicly read before the Imperial Majesty and the estates of the empire at Augsburg, some theologians and monks made a reply and a referral against this confession and confession, which Imperial Majesty then had read before Her Majesty, the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, and requested that our Princes henceforth believe in such opinion, and also agree to teach and hold it.

But because ours heard that in such an answer of the theologians many articles were rejected, which they could not let be rejected without burdening their consciences, and with God, they asked for a copy of the answer or confutation, so that they might actually see and consider what the opponents were about to condemn, and answer again all the more correctly to their cause and reasons put forward.

And in this great and most important matter, which concerns not temporal things, but a common religion, all salvation and welfare of consciences, and in turn also great danger and burden to them, ours have certainly considered that the adversaries would hand over such a copy quite willingly and gladly without any burden, or would also offer it to us.

But ours have not been able to obtain this in any other way than with almost arduous efforts.

After this a negotiation and several ways of goodness or atonement were made, since ours offered most gladly to bear, tolerate, and do everything that could be done without burdening our consciences. But the adversaries have stood firm on this alone, that we should consent to some public abuses and errors. And if we were neither able nor willing to do so, the Imperial Majesty again requested that we be allowed to do so. Majesty again requested that our lords and princes agree to believe and hold as the theologians' confutation reads, which our princes rejected outright.

For how should their chur- and princely graces, in so high a matter of the utmost importance, concerning many and their own souls and consciences, consent to a writing which they were not permitted to hand over, nor to read over, or to hand over, especially if they heard in the reading that such articles were rejected, which they neither wished nor could yield to, for they wanted to act publicly against God and respectability?

For this reason, Their Royal and Princely Graces have ordered me and others to make a protective speech or apologia of our first confession, in which the Imperial Majesty would be shown the reasons why we do not accept the Confutation and why it is not founded. For even though we were denied a copy and a copy of our plea, request, and highest request, our people still had the sum of the arguments in the reading of the confutation almost in a hurry, and as if caught in flight, and distinguished, on which we had to present the apologia this time, if a copy was finally denied to us. This same Apology was finally handed over to the Emperor's Majesty by us when we left Augsburg, so that Her Majesty would understand that there was a very important reason why we would not have agreed to the Confutation. But the Imperial Maj. Maj. has refused to accept the delivered Apology.

After this, however, a decree has gone forth, wherein the adversaries boast with unreason that they have removed our confession from the holy Scriptures.

But everyone has our apology and defense, from which he will see how and what the adversaries have judged. For we have actually told here how it happened, and not otherwise; God knows! Thus we have also clearly shown here how they have condemned some articles against the public, bright Scriptures and clear Word of the Holy Spirit, and may never again

Saying with truth, that they have answered a tittle out of the holy scriptures against us.

Although I had begun this Apology at Augsburg with the advice and concerns of several others, I have added something to it now that it is to go out in print. That is why I am writing my name here, so that no one may complain that the book has gone out without a name.

I have hitherto refrained, as much as I could, from speaking and acting of Christian doctrine in the ordinary way, that in time we might the more easily draw together and compare ourselves; though I might have conducted these things with fugues farther from their ordinary way.

But the adversaries deal so unkindly with this matter, that they make it sufficiently evident that they seek neither truth nor agreement, but only to drink our blood.

Now this time I have also written in the gentlest way possible; but where there is something swift in this book, I do not want to speak against Imperial Majesty or the princes, whom I like to show due honor, but against monks and theologians. Majesty or the princes, to whom I gladly show due honor, but against the monks and theologians. For I only recently got to read the Confutation, and I notice that much of it is written in such a dangerous, poisonous, and envious way that it could even deceive pious people in some places.

However, I have not dealt with all the quarrelsome, wanton intrigues of the adversaries, for there would be innumerable books to write about them. I have taken their best, highest reasons, so that among the high and low classes, among the present and our descendants, among all native Germans, also otherwise to all the world, to all foreign nations, a clear testimony may be before the eyes and remain forever, that we have taught purely, divinely, rightly of the Gospel of Christ. Truly we have no desire or pleasure in disunity, nor are we so stiff-necked or stony-hearted that we do not consider our fare.

For we see and perceive how the adversaries in this matter seek us so with great venom and bitterness, and have sought us hitherto in body, life, and all that we have.

But we know the public, divine truth, without which the church of Christ cannot be or remain, and the eternal holy word of the gospel not to be denied or rejected.

Therefore, if for the sake of the Lord Christ, and for the sake of this most high and important thing, in which the whole holy Christian faith, the whole Christian church, is concerned, we should give even greater weight to it, we should not be able to do it.

If we have to wait for or endure opposition, travel, or persecution, we will gladly suffer it in such an entirely divine, right cause, and we put ourselves off completely, certain also that this will please the holy, divine Majesty in heaven and our dear Savior JESUS CHRIST, and after this time there will be people and our descendants who will judge of these things much differently and with more confidence.

For the adversaries themselves cannot deny nor deny that many and the highest, most necessary articles of Christian doctrine, without which the Christian church together with the whole Christian doctrine and name would be forgotten and perish, have been brought to light again by ours. For with what quarrelsome, futile, useless, childish teachings many necessary articles were suppressed a few years ago among monks, theologians, canonists, and sophists, I will not relate here this time. It is yet to come.

We have (praise God!) testimony from many, high, honest, upright, God-fearing people, who thank God from the bottom of their hearts for the unspeakable gifts and graces, that in the most necessary parts of the whole Scripture they have from us much clearer, more certain, more real, more correct teaching and consolation of the consciences, than is always found in all the books of the adversaries.

Therefore, if the bright truth we have known is ever trampled underfoot, let us entrust this matter to Christ and God in heaven, who is the father of orphans and widows and the judge of all the forsaken, JsPs 68:6, and who will (we truly know) judge this matter and set it right. And thou, O Lord JESUS Christ, thy holy gospel, it is thy cause to look upon many an afflicted heart and conscience, and to preserve thy churches and multitudes that suffer anguish and distress of the devil, and to strengthen thy truth. Put to shame all hypocrisy and lies, and so give peace and unity, that your glory may prevail, and your kingdom grow strong and increase without ceasing against all the gates of hell.

Apologia of the Confession.

Article I. From GOD. 1)

001 The first article of our confession the adversaries leave to them, in which it is declared how we believe and teach that there is an eternal, one, undivided divine being,

1) Like J. T. Müller, we have numbered all the articles of the Apology according to those of the Confession and provided them with superscriptions. Only those articles which had been rejected by the opponents have been and yet three distinct Persons in One Divine Being, equally powerful, equally eternal, God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit. We have always taught and defended this article in a pure manner, and we hold and are certain that it has such a strong, good, and certain foundation in Holy Scripture that no one is able to reproach or overthrow it.

002 Therefore we freely conclude that all those are idolatrous, blasphemers, and outside the church of Christ, who hold or teach otherwise.

Article II. (I.) Of original sin.

003 The other article, of original sin, the adversaries also suffer them to accept; but they contend, as if we had not rightly understood it, when we said what original sin was, when by chance we only spake of it in that place.

(4) Then the imperial majesty will soon find at the entrance that our adversaries often neither notice nor understand anything at all in this highly important matter, and in turn also often misuse our words maliciously and with diligence, or ever interpret them to misunderstand. For if we have spoken in the most simple and clearest manner of what original sin is or is not, they have, out of vain venom and bitterness, interpreted the words which they themselves have spoken rightly and wrongly, with diligence evil and unjustly. For thus they say: You say that original sin is this, that such a mind and heart is innate in us, in which there is no fear of God, no trust in God, that is ever a real fault and even a work or aetnali8 eulpa, therefore it is not original sin. It is easy to notice and accept that such enviUntio comes from theologians, not from the emperor's council. Although we know well how to avoid such envious, dangerous, and wanton interpretations, yet that all honest and honorable people may understand that we teach nothing unskillful in this matter, we ask you to look at our previous German Confession, delivered to Augsburg, which will sufficiently indicate that we teach nothing new or unheard of. For in it is thus written: "Further, it is taught that after the fall of Adae all men who are born naturally are conceived and born in sins, that is, that they are all from their mother's womb full of evil lusts and inclinations, having no true fear of God, no true knowledge of the law, and no true faith in God.

in the süitio xrinaexs a superscription, but no number. Now where the first number, which refers to the confession, is followed by a second number in brackets, the latter indicates the articles which have a superscription in the confession.

005 In this it appears enough that we say of all who are born of the flesh that they are unfit for all things of God, not heartily fearing God, not believing in him, nor trusting in him. There we speak of innate wickedness of heart, not merely of aetuali culpu, or of real guilt and sins. For we say that in all the children of Adam there is an evil inclination and desire, and that no one can or is able to make for himself a heart that knows God, or heartily trusts God, heartily fears God.

006 I would gladly hear what they will or would reproach. For pious, honest people, who love the truth, see without a doubt that this is right and true. For in our Latin confession we say that my natural man is not capable of potsutia, that is, of so much deceit, not even in innocent children, who even from Adam are incapable of always heartily fearing God and heartily loving God. But in the elderly and adults, beyond the innate evil nature of the heart, there is also aetus and real sin.

007 Wherefore, when we call inborn evil desire, we mean not only the actus, evil works, or fruits, but inwardly the evil inclination, which ceaseth not until we be born again by the Spirit and faith. But after this we will show in more words that we have spoken of original sin, namely, what it is or is not, also in the usual old way of the scholastics, and not so unusually. But I must first indicate the reasons for which I have primarily used such words in this place, and not others.

008 So the adversaries themselves speak of it in their schools, and confess that the matter or material of original sin, as they call it, is evil desire. Wherefore, if I have said what original sin is, it is not to be passed over, especially at this time, when some speak of this inherent evil desire more paganly from philosophy, than according to the divine word, or according to the holy scriptures. For some say that original sin in human nature is not an inherent evil, but only an infirmity and an imposed burden, which all the children of Adam must bear for the sin of others, because of Adam's sin, and therefore are all mortal, not that they themselves all inherit sin from their mother's womb.

009 Moreover they say to it, that no man is eternal. Let them be condemned for original sin or original sin alone, but, just as bondwomen and bondmen are born of a bondwoman, not because of their own fault, but because they must pay for and bear their mother's misfortunes and miseries, But if they themselves, like other men, are born without change, let original sin also not be an inherent evil, but only an infirmity and a burden, which we bear from Adam, but for ourselves therefore are not in sins and inherited graces.

010 Now that I might shew that we are not pleased with such an unchristian opinion, I have used these words, "All men from the womb are all full of evil lusts and affections;" and for this cause also I call original sin a pestilence, to signify that not one part, but the whole man, with his whole nature, is born with an hereditary disease of a kind in sins. Therefore we call it not only an evil desire, but also say that all men are born in sins, without fear of God, without faith. We do not add these things without cause. The scholasticists speak of original sin as if it were only a wicked, little affliction, and do not understand what original sin is, or how the other holy fathers meant it.

011 When the sophists write what original sin is, or what sin or evil inclination is, they speak of it, among other things, as if it were an infirmity of the body, as they are wont to speak of things in a childish way, and put forward questions, whether the same infirmity came from the poisoning of the forbidden apple in paradise, or from Adam's blowing on the serpent? Item, whether it makes the medicine the longer the worse with the affliction? With such quarrelsome questions they have confused and suppressed this whole matter, and the most important question, what original sin is.

(12) Therefore, when they speak of original sin, they leave out the greatest and most necessary thing, and they do not even think of our true greatest misery, namely, that we humans are all born in such a way that we do not know God or God's work, do not see or notice God, despise God, do not sincerely fear or trust God, and are not subject to his judgment or sentence. Item, that we all by nature flee from God as a tyrant, are angry and grumble against His will. We do not leave nor dare to trust in God's goodness, but always rely more on money, goods, and friends. This swift hereditary disease, by which the whole of nature is corrupted, by which we all inherit such a heart, mind, and thought from Adam, which is straight against God and the first, highest commandment of God, the Scholastics pass over.

(13) And they speak of it as if human nature were uncorrupted, able to respect God greatly, to love above all things, to keep God's commandments, 2c., and do not see that they are contrary to themselves. For to be able to do this by our own strength, namely, to esteem God great, to love Him dearly, to keep His commandments, what would that be but to be a new creature in paradise, even pure and holy? If we are able to do such great things with our own strength, to love God above all else, to keep His commandments, as the scholastics may bravely say, what then would original sin be? And if we were justified by our own efforts, the grace of Christ is in vain. What would we need of the Holy Spirit, if by human strength we could love God above all things and keep His commandments?

014 Here every man seeth how unskillfully the adversaries speak of this high commerce. They confess the small infirmities of the sinful nature, and they do not remember the greatest of all the earth's bombs and miseries; for the apostles all complain about them, as all the Scriptures everywhere report, and all the prophets cry out about them, as the fourteenth Psalm and many other Psalms say: "There is none that is righteous, neither is there any; there is none that seeketh after God, neither is there any that doeth good, neither is there any. Their mouth is an open sepulchre; viper's poison is under their lips; there is no fear of God before their eyes." [Rom. 3:10-13, 18] Yet the Scripture also clearly says that all these things are not fled to us, but are inborn.

015 But because the scholastics have mingled much philosophy with Christian doctrine, and speak much of the light of reason, and of the aotidus elieitis, they hold too much of free will and unrighteous works. Moreover, they have taught that men become pious before God by an outwardly honorable life, and have not seen the inherent impurity within the hearts, which no one becomes aware of except through the word of God, which the scholastici act almost sparingly and rarely in their books. We also say that to live outwardly honorably is to some extent within our ability, but to become pious and holy before God is not within our ability.

(16) These are the reasons why, when I said what original sin is, I thought of the innate evil desire, and said that by natural powers no man is able to fear God or to trust in Him. For I have wanted to show that original sin also contains this misery, namely that

No man knows or respects God, no one can heartily fear or love Him or trust Him. These are the greatest pieces of hereditary pestilence, by which all of us, out of Adam, have been turned against God, against the first table of Moses, and against the greatest, highest divine commandment.

017 And we have said nothing new there. The old scholastics, if they were rightly understood, said the same thing. For they say that original sin is a defect of the first purity and righteousness in paradise. But what is justitia oriAinalis, or the first righteousness in paradise? Righteousness and holiness in Scripture do not mean merely keeping the other table of Moses, doing good works, and serving one's neighbor; but Scripture calls him righteous, holy, and just who keeps the first table, who keeps the first commandment, that is, who fears God with all his heart, loves him, and relies on God.

(18) Therefore Adam's purity and unchanged nature was not only a fine perfect health and all over pure blood, untainted powers of the body, as they speak of it, but the greatest thing in such a noble first creature was a bright light in the heart to know God and fine work, a right fear of God, a right hearty trust in God, and all over a righteous certain mind, a fine good cheerful heart towards God and all divine things.

(19) And this is also attested by the Holy Scriptures, when they say that man is created in the image and likeness of God. For what is this but that divine wisdom and righteousness, which are of God, are formed in man? by which we know God, by which God's clarity is reflected in us, that is, that these gifts were first given to man when he was created, right clear knowledge of God, right fear, right trust, and the like.

020 For thus also Irenaeus, speaking of the image and likeness of God, and Ambrose, speaking of all things concerning the opinion, say among other things: The soul is not made in the image of God, in whom God is not always. And Paul to the Ephesians and Colossians sufficiently indicates that God's image in Scripture means nothing else than knowledge of God and righteousness and justice before God. ^Col. 3, 10. Eph. 4, 24.]

(21) And Longobardus says freely that the first-created righteousness in Adam is the image and likeness of God, which is formed in man by God. I am recounting the opinions and sayings of the ancients, who were interested in the

The same is the case with the teachings of Augustine, who speaks of the image of God. Therefore the ancients, when they say what original sin is and say that it is a lack of the first acquired righteousness, are of the opinion that man is not only corrupt in the body or in the lowest, basest powers, but that he has also thereby lost these gifts: right knowledge of God, right love and trust toward God, and the power, the light in the heart, which makes him love and delight in all these things. For the scholastici or theologians themselves teach in schools that this inherent righteousness would not have been possible for us without special gifts and without the help of grace.

022 And these gifts we call the fear of God, the knowledge of God, and confidence in God, that it may be understood. From all this it appears sufficiently that the ancients, when they say what original sin is, agree with us, and that their opinion is also that we come into misery through original sin, born of the fact that we do not have a good heart that loves God rightly toward God, and that we are not only unable to do or accomplish pure good works.

(23) Augustine also means the same thing, since he also wants to say what original sin is, and he uses to call original sin an evil desire, because he wants to indicate that after Adam's fall, instead of righteousness, evil desire is innate in us. For from the fall, since we, being born sinful, do not fear, love, or trust in God, we do nothing but rely on ourselves, despise God, or are terrified and flee from God.

024 And so in Augustine's words is also the opinion comprehended and understood of those who say that original sin is a defect of the first righteousness, that is, the evil desire which instead of that same righteousness clings to us. And the evil lust is not only a corruption or corruption of the first pure bodily health of Adam in Paradise, but also an evil lust and inclination, since according to the very best, highest powers and light of reason we are nevertheless carnally inclined and minded against God. And those do not know what they are saying who teach that man is able to love God above all things out of his own strength, and yet at the same time must confess that evil desire remains as long as this life lasts, insofar as it has not been completely killed by the Holy Spirit.

025 For which cause we have mentioned and expressed both these things, when we would have taught what original sin is, both the evil desire, and also the sin which is the original sin.

They say that the same defect is that we, the children of Adam, do not trust God with our hearts, nor fear Him, nor love Him. The evil desire is that all our mind, heart, and strength naturally go against God's word, since we not only seek all kinds of pleasures of the body, but also trust in our wisdom and righteousness, and forget God and pay little or no attention to Him. And not only the ancient fathers, as Augustine and the like, but also the most recent teachers and scholastics, who have had some understanding, teach that these two things are all original sin, namely, want and evil desire. For thus St. Thomas says that original sin is not only a defect of the first righteousness, but also a disordered desire or lust in the soul. Wherefore it is (he says) not alone vainly deficiency, but also uli^uiä positive. And St. Bonaventure also clearly says, If it be asked what original sin is, this is the right answer, that it is an unprovoked evil desire; also the right answer is, that it is a defect of righteousness: and one thing gives another.

026 The same is the meaning of Hugh, when he says, Original sin is blindness in the heart, and evil desire in the flesh. For he wants to indicate that we children of Adam are all born in such a way that we do not know God, despise God, do not trust Him, and even flee and hate Him. For this Hugo wished to briefly comprehend, since he says: I§iimntin in insntö, blindness or ignorance in the heart. And the sayings also of the newest teachers agree with the holy Scriptures. For Paul calls original sin under times in plain words a lack of divine light 2c. 1 Cor. 2:14: "But the natural man heareth not of the Spirit of God;" and in other places he calls it evil lust, as in Romans 7:23, where he saith, "I see another law in my members," 2c. which lust bringeth forth all manner of evil fruits.

(27) I could probably bring up many more sayings of Scripture of both these things, but in this public truth it is not necessary. Every man of understanding will easily see and perceive, that therefore without the fear of God, without confidence in the heart, are not only aotus or real sins, but an inherent want of the divine light, and of all good, which remaineth, until we be born again of the Holy Ghost, and enlightened by him.

028 Therefore as we have hitherto written and taught concerning original sin, we teach nothing new, nothing but the holy scripture, the common

We do not believe in the holy Christian church, but in such necessary, brave, clear sayings of the holy Scriptures and the Fathers, which have been suppressed by the clumsy quarrels of the Sophists, and we would like to have the Christian doctrine pure again. For it is ever in evidence that the Sophists and the school-baiters have not understood what the Fathers meant by the word "lack of first righteousness."

029 But to teach this thing truly and correctly, and what original sin is or is not, is of great need, and no man can heartily desire or long for Christ, for the unspeakable treasure of divine mercy and grace, which the gospel sets forth, who knoweth not his miseries and pestilences, as Christ saith, "The same have no need of a physician," Matt. 9:12. 9,12. Marc. 2,17. All holy, honorable life, all good works, as much as a man may do on earth, are vain hypocrisy and abomination in the sight of God, for we first recognize that we are wretched sinners of a kind, who are in disgrace to God, neither fearing nor loving God. Thus says the prophet: "Because you have shown it to me, I am terrified," Jer. 31:19, and the Psalm: "All men are liars," that is, they are not rightly minded by God, Ps. 116:11.

030 Now here the adversaries cry out vehemently against Doctor Luther, because he wrote that original sin remains even after baptism, and say in addition that the same article was justly condemned by Pope Leo the Tenth.

(31) But the imperial majesty will here publicly find that they do us quite wrong. For the adversaries understand almost well what opinion Doctor Luther meant when he said that original sin remains after baptism. He has always written clearly that holy baptism takes away and eradicates the whole guilt and hereditary obligation of original sin, although the material (as they call it) of sin, namely the evil inclination and lust, remains.

32 In all his writings he adds of the same material that the Holy Spirit, who is given through baptism, begins to kill and quench inwardly the other evil desires daily, and brings into the heart a new light, a new mind, and a new courage. Augustine also speaks of this opinion when he says: "Original sin is forgiven in baptism, not that it is no longer, but that it is not imputed."

033 Then Augustine openly confesses that sin abideth in us, though it be not imputed unto us.

is reckoned. And this saying of Augustine's was so well received by the teachers afterward, that it is also referred to in the decree. And against Julianum Augustine says: "The law which is in our members is done away by spiritual regeneration, and yet remains in the flesh, which is mortal. It is taken away, because the guilt is entirely removed, through the sacrament, by which believers are born again; and still remains, because it works evil lusts, against which believers struggle."

(34) That Doctor Luther thus holds and teaches, the adversaries know almost well, and if they cannot dispute it, but must confess it themselves, they maliciously pervert his words, and falsely interpret his opinion to suppress the truth and innocently condemn him.

035 But further, the adversaries contend that evil desire is a burden and punishment laid upon it, and is not such a sin as is guilty of death and damnation. Against this Doctor Luther says that it is such a damnable sin. I have said above that Augustine also reports this, that original sin is the inherent evil desire. If this be evil spoken, let them fight it out with Augustine.

036 Paul saith concerning this, "I knew not sin without the law. For I knew not of lust, where the law had not said, Be not lascivious." There ever Paul says arid out: I knew not that lust was sin 2c. Item: "I see another law in my members, which opposeth the law in my mind, and taketh me captive unto the law of sin, which is in my members" [Rom. 7:7, 23].

037 These are Paul's bright, certain words, and plain sayings; against them no gloss, no crafty little thing, can avail. These sayings all devils and all men cannot overthrow. He clearly calls evil desires a sin, but he says that such sin is not imputed to those who believe in Christ; nevertheless, in itself it is truly a sin, guilty of death and eternal damnation. And there is no doubt that this was also the opinion of the ancient fathers. For Augustine disputes and fights vehemently against those who held that the evil inclination and lust in man was not sin, and neither good nor evil, just as having a black or white body is neither good nor evil.

038 And if the adversaries shall pretend that fomes, or the evil inclination, is neither good nor evil; then shall not only many sayings of the scripture be against it, but also the whole church and all the fathers. For all experienced Christian hearts know, that these things, alas, do not make us in the skin.

039 Whereof all men feel how easily their heart is kindled, now and then with ambition, than with wrath, and with anger, than with fornication.

041 But the sophists in the schools have spoken against the plain public scripture in this matter, and have devised their own dreams and sayings out of philosophy; saying, that for the evil pleasures we are neither evil nor good, neither to be reproached nor praised. Item, that lusts and thoughts inwardly are not sin, unless I consent to them altogether. The same speech and words in the books of the philosophers are to be understood of outward respectability before the world, and also outward punishment before the world. For it is true, as the lawyers say, Leotutionis: Thoughts are free from duty and punishment; but God searches the hearts, with God's judgment and sentence it is different.

(43) For this reason Doctor Luther wanted to teach and explain from the Scriptures how a great mortal guilt original sin is before God, and how we are born in great misery, and that the remaining original sin, which remains after baptism, is not in itself inäkkrsns, but requires the mediator of Christ, so that it is not imputed to us by God, and without ceasing the light and effect of the Holy Spirit, by which it is swept out and put to death.

(45) The lack of first righteousness and evil desire are sin and punishment; but death and other bodily evils, the tyranny and dominion of the devil, are really the punishment and punishment of original sin. For human nature, through original sin, is given over to the power of the devil, and so is imprisoned in the kingdom of the devil, who deceives and seduces many a great wise man in the world with terrible error, heresy, and other blindnesses, and otherwise drags men away to all manner of vices.

(47) It is seen and found in all history from the beginning of the world that the kingdom of the devil is an unspeakably great power. It is seen that the world, from the highest to the lowest, is full of blasphemies, of great error, of ungodly doctrine against God and his word. In the strong fetters and chains the devil holds captive many wise people, many hypocrites, who seem holy before the world; the others he leads into other gross vices, avarice, pride, and so on.

048 If Christ therefore be given unto us, to take away the same sins, and the grievous punishments of sin; sin, and death, and death, and death, and death, and death, and sin, and death, and death, and death, and sin, and death, and death, and death, and death, and death.

If the devil's kingdom overcomes us too well, no one can heartily rejoice in the great treasure; no one can recognize the abundant riches of grace, for he first feels the same burden of our innate great misery and sorrow. Wherefore our preachers have taught of this necessary article with all diligence, and have taught nothing new, but only plain words of the holy scriptures, and certain sayings of the fathers, Augustine, and others.

(49) This, we think, the imperial majesty should allow to be just enough against the loose, childish, unfounded arguments of the adversaries, by which they challenge our article without cause, quite unreasonably. For they sing, say, how much, what and how long they want, so we actually know that, and are truly certain that we teach Christianly and rightly, and agree with the common Christian church and hold. If they should continue to make a wanton quarrel about this, let them see, God willing, there shall not be lack of men here who will answer them, and still maintain the truth.

50 For the adversaries know not what they speak. For how often do they speak and write things repugnant to themselves? nor do they understand their own dialectics from the formality of original sin, that is, what actually is or is not original sin in its essence, what also is the defect of first righteousness. In this place, however, we have not wished to speak more subtly or further of their quarrelsome disputation, but only to relate the sayings and opinions of the holy fathers, whom we also teach in the same way, in clear, common, intelligible words.

Article III From Christo.

051 The third article the adversaries leave to them, because we confess that in Christ there are two natures, namely, that the Son of God took on human nature, and therefore God and man are One Person, One Christ, and that He suffered and died for us to make atonement for us to the Father, and that He rose from the dead to possess an everlasting kingdom, sanctifying and justifying all believers, as the first apostles teach, and 8^m1)o1urli Mcasrium.

Article IV. (II.) How to become pious and righteous before GOD.

052 In the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles, and afterwards in the twentieth, the adversaries condemn our confession, that we teach that believers receive forgiveness of sins through Christ without any merit by faith alone.

And we reject them both in spite of ourselves. First, that we say no to men's sins being forgiven by their merit. Second, that we hold, teach, and confess that no one is reconciled to God, no one obtains forgiveness of sins, except through faith in Christ alone.

(53) But because such a dispute is over the highest, most noble article of the whole Christian doctrine, so that a great deal depends on this article, which also serves primarily for a clear, correct understanding of the whole of Holy Scripture, and points the way to the ineffable treasure and the right knowledge of Christ alone, and also opens the door to the whole Bible alone, without which article also no poor conscience can have a right, constant, certain consolation or recognize the riches of Christ's graces, we ask, Imperial Majesty, to hear us about this great, brave, highly important matter according to necessity and grace. Maj. will hear of this great, brave, highly important matter according to necessity and graciously. For since the adversaries neither understand nor know at all what is to be understood by these words in Scripture, what is forgiveness of sin, what is faith, what is grace, what is righteousness, they have miserably defiled this noble, highly necessary, most distinguished article, without which no one will know Christ, miserably defiled, and even suppressed the high, precious treasure of the knowledge of Christ, or of what Christ and his kingdom and grace are, and miserably robbed the poor consciences of such a noble, great treasure and eternal consolation, in which they had great need.

054 But that we may confirm our confession, and lay aside what the adversaries have brought forward, let us first show the reason and cause of both doctrines, that each part may be heard more clearly.

055 All scripture, both old and new testaments, is divided into two parts, and teacheth these two parts, the law and the divine promises. For in some places it keeps us from the law; in others it gives grace through the glorious promises of Christ. For in the Old Testament the Scripture promises the Christ who is to come, and imparts eternal blessing, grace, eternal salvation, righteousness, and eternal life through him; or in the New Testament, when Christ, who has come to earth, promises in the Gospel forgiveness of sins, eternal righteousness, and eternal life.

056 But here, in this place, we call the law the ten commandments of God, where they are read in the scriptures. We will not speak here of the ceremonies and laws of the courts.

057 Now of these two things the adversaries take the law before them. For since the natural law, which agrees with the law of Moses, or ten commandments, is innate and written in the hearts of all men, and therefore reason is able to grasp and understand the ten commandments to some extent, it wants to think that it has had enough of the law, and that through the law one can obtain forgiveness of sin.

(58) Now the ten commandments require not only an outwardly honorable life or good works, which reason is able to do to some extent, but they require something much higher, which is above all human powers, above all the faculties of reason, namely, the law wants us to fear and love God with all earnestness, from the bottom of our hearts, to call upon him alone in all our troubles, and to put our trust in nothing else.

(59) The Law commands us not to waver or waver, but to conclude in our hearts with the utmost certainty that God is with us, that He hears our prayer, and that our sighing and supplications are yes. Item, that we should still expect life and all kinds of comfort from God in the midst of death, that we should completely surrender to His will in all temptations, that we should not flee from Him in death and tribulation, but rather be obedient to Him, gladly bearing and suffering everything as we are able.

(60) Here the scholastics have followed the philosophers, and when they want to say how one becomes pious before God, they teach only a righteousness and piety in which a man outwardly leads an honorable life before the world and does good works, and invent this dream to the effect that human reason, without the Holy Spirit, is able to love God above all things. For it is true that when a man's heart is idle and not in temptation, and because he does not feel God's wrath and judgment, he may invent such a dream as if he loved God above all things and did much good and much work for God's sake, but it is all hypocrisy. And in this way the adversaries have taught that men deserve forgiveness of sins when they do as much as is in them, that is, when reason makes it sorry for sin, and devises a will to love God.

011 And this opinion and erroneous doctrine, because people are naturally inclined to think that their merit and work are worthy of respect and merit in the sight of God, has caused innumerable abuses of worship in the church, such as the monastic vows, abuses of the masses, as such things are innumerable, always a God's service over the other is conceived from this error. And that only such confidence in our merit and work should be ever extended, 1) they have been allowed to say impudently, and to conclude: God the Lord must of necessity give grace to those who thus do good works; not that he is compelled, but that this is the order, which God neither overrules nor changes.

(62) And in these pieces, in this very teaching, many other great, quite harmful errors and terrible blasphemies of God are concealed and hidden, all of which it would be too long to mention by name now. But let every Christian reader consider this for God's sake. Can we become pious and Christians before God through such works, I would like to hear (and try your best to answer here), what difference there would be between the philosophers' and Christ's teachings, if we could obtain forgiveness of sins through such our works, or "uetu" "slieito"? What good is Christ to us? Can we become holy and pious before God by natural reason and our own good works, what may we do with the blood and death of Christ, or that we may be born again through him? as Peter says [1 Ep. 1,18.ff.]. And from the annual error (because such was publicly taught in schools, and practised in the preaching-chairs) it has, alas, come to pass, that even great theologians at Louvain, Paris 2c. have known of no other Christian piety or righteousness (though all the letters and syllables in Paul teach otherwise), but of the piety which philosophy teaches; and if it should be strange to us, and we should laugh at them, they laugh at us, and even mock Paul himself.

(63) Thus the shameful and abominable error has come to pass. I myself have heard a great preacher who did not think of Christ and the gospel, and preached Aristotle's Ethicorum. Is this not called childish, foolish preaching among Christians? But if the adversary's teaching is true, the Ethicorum is a delicious book of sermons, and a fine new Bible. For it is not easy for anyone to write better about an outwardly respectable life than Aristotle.

044 We see that certain learned men have written books, wherein they show that the words of Christ and the sayings of Socratis and Zenonis agree well together; as if Christ had come to give good laws and commandments, by which he would not have been able to give them.

1) J. T. Müller: "worden"; Latin: auZsrnt.

which we ought to merit forgiveness of sins, and not rather to proclaim the grace and peace of God, and to pour out the Holy Spirit by His merit and blood.

065 Therefore, if we accept the doctrine of the adversaries, that we may merit forgiveness of sins by the power of natural reason and our works, we are already Aristotelian, and not Christian; and there is no difference between respectable heathen life, between Pharisaic and Christian life, between philosophy and the Gospel.

66. Although the adversaries, lest they should be silent about the name of Christ as ungodly and crude heathen, speak of faith in such a way that they say it is a knowledge of the history of Christ, and although they also say something about Christ, namely, that he has earned for us a liudituiri, or, as they call it, priirmiri zratiam, the first grace, which they regard as an inclination by which we can nevertheless love God more easily than otherwise, it is nevertheless a weak, small, little, bad effect which Christ would thus have, or which would occur through such udituiri.

67 For they say, nevertheless, that the works of our reason and will, before the same uditus is, and also after, when the same uditus is, are ssu8äsiri 8pssisi, that is, before and after one and the same thing.

68 For they say that our reason and human will are able in themselves to love God, but that the ulitus brings an inclination that reason, which it is well able to do before, may do the more gladly and easily.

069 Wherefore they also teach that the same hadith must be merited by our previous works, and that by the works of the law we merit increase of such good affections, and eternal life.

070 So men hide Christ from us, and bury him anew, that we cannot know him to be a mediator. For they say not at all, that it is by grace alone, without merit, that we obtain forgiveness of sins through him; but they make up their dreams, as if by good works and the works of the law we might obtain forgiveness of sins, when the whole Scripture saith, that we are not able to fulfil or keep the law. And if reason does nothing by the law, but only outward works, and fears not God in its heart, it does not believe that God is aware of it. And although they speak of the haditu in this way, it is certain that without faith in Christ there can be no true love of God in anyone's heart.

also no one understand what God's love is, without faith.

(71) But that they invent a difference between the mrito LoriZrui and irisrito sonäiKni, between the due merit and the right whole merit, they play and quarrel only with words, lest they be publicly known as Pelagians. For if God of necessity must give grace for due merit, it is not due merit, but a right duty and whole merit, though they themselves know not what they say. For they invent and dream that if the Uaditu8 of God's love (said above) is there, then man duly or äs sonZruo deserves the grace of God, and yet they say that no one can be so sure whether the same Uaditii8 is there.

How do they know, or when do they know, whether they deserve our Lord God's grace in full or in part, or whether they deserve it entirely through merit? But oh, dear Lord God, these are just cold thoughts and dreams of idle, hopeless, inexperienced people, who do not practice the Bible much, who neither know nor experience what a sinner's heart is like, what the temptations of death or the devil are, who do not know how pure we forget all merit, all works, when our heart feels God's wrath, or our conscience is in anguish. The secure, inexperienced people always go along in the delusion that they earn grace with their works;

73. For it is natural to us, without this, that we should like to think much of ourselves and our works. But when a conscience really feels its sin and sorrow, all jesting and playful thoughts are over, and there is great, true earnestness; then neither heart nor conscience can be satisfied, seeking all kinds of works and misdeeds, and would gladly feel certainty, would gladly feel grounded, and would surely rest and rest on something. But these frightened consciences feel well that nothing can be earned either by this or by that; they soon sink into despair and despair, if another word is not preached to them than the doctrine of the law, namely, the gospel of Christ, who was given for us.

Seventy-four: Hence it is known in some histories that the monks of the Barefoot, when they had pledged their order and good works to some good consciences at the hour of death, were at last obliged to keep silent of their order and of St. Francis, and to say this word: "Dear man, Christ is for you.

died for thee. That hath refreshed and comforted in anguish, giving peace and comfort alone.

075 So the adversaries teach nothing but an outward godliness of outward good works, which Paul calls the godliness of the law; and so, like the Jews, they see the hidden face of Moses, and do nothing but strengthen assurance and hardness in certain sure hypocrites, and lead men to a sandy bottom, to their own works, whereby Christ and the gospel are despised, and give many a miserable conscience cause of despair. For they do good works under uncertain delusions, never knowing how great and powerful faith is, and finally falling into despair.

76. We hold and speak of outward godliness in this way, that God requires and wants such an outwardly honorable life, and for the sake of God's commandment one must do the same good works that are commanded in the Ten Commandments. For the law is our disciplinarian [Gal. 3, 24], and the law is given to the unrighteous [1 Tim. 1, 9]. For God the Lord wills that gross sins be increased by an outward discipline; and to maintain the same, he gives laws, ordains authorities, gives learned, wise men to serve for the regiment. And so reason is able to lead an outwardly respectable life and conduct by its own powers, though it is often hindered by inherent weakness and the wiles of the devil.

(77) Although I gladly give such an outward life and good works as much praise as they deserve, for in this life and in the worldly being there is nothing better 1) than honesty and virtue. As Aristotle says that neither the morning star nor the evening star is more lovely and beautiful than honesty and righteousness, and as God also rewards such virtue with bodily gifts, so good works and such conduct should not be so highly exalted that it brings dishonor to Christ.

078 For thus I conclude, and am sure, that it is imaginary, and not true, that by our works we should merit forgiveness of sins.

79. It is also a lie and not true that a man can become righteous and godly before God by his works and outward piety.

80 Neither is it groundless, nor true, that human reason, out of its own powers, should be able to-

1) Müller: "nichts-besser". But the Latin says: nutluni was us donum, and the Jena offers: "nothing better," therefore we have assumed the latter.

to love God above all things, to keep His commandments, to fear Him, to be certain that God will hear prayer, to give thanks to God, and to be obedient in tribulations and other things commanded by God's law, as not to covet other people's goods 2c. For reason is not able to do all this, even though it is outwardly able to live honorably and to do good works to some extent.

011 Neither is it fancied, and not true, and a blasphemy against Christ, that they should be without sin who keep the commandments of God outwardly only, without spirit and grace in their hearts.

82. I have testimony to this decision of mine, not only from the holy Scriptures, but also from the ancient Fathers. Augustine speaks and acts most abundantly against the Pelagians, that grace is not given because of our merit. And in the book de natura st Arutiu, that is, Of Nature and Grace, he says thus: If the faculty of nature, through free will, is sufficient both to know how to live, and thus to live rightly, Christ died in vain.

(83) Why should I not cry out and shout with Paul here? I may justly cry out, "Ye have lost Christ, who would be justified by the work of the law, and are fallen from grace" [Gal. 5:4]. "For ye know not the righteousness that is before God, and seek to establish your own righteousness, and are not subject unto the righteousness that is before God" [Rom. 10:3]. For as the end of the law is Christ, so also the Saviour of the corrupt nature is Christ. Item, Joh. 8, 36. "If the Son shall make you free, ye are justly free."

(84) Therefore we cannot be freed from sins or earn forgiveness of sins by reason or by our good works. It is written in John 3:5, "Except a man be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

(85) Therefore, if this means that we must be born again through the Holy Spirit, then our good works or our own merit will not justify us before God, so we cannot keep or fulfill the Law. Item, Rom. 3, 23: "They are all sinners, and lack the glory which they ought to have in God," that is, they lack the wisdom and righteousness that is valid in the sight of God, by which they should rightly know, esteem, and praise God. Item, Rom. 8, 7.8: "To be carnally minded is an enmity against God, since it is not subject to the law of God, nor is it able to be. The but are carnally minded may not please God."

(86) These are such clear and bright sayings of Scripture that they do not require such a sharp understanding, but only that one read them and take a good look at the clear words, as Augustine also says in this matter. Now if reason and being carnally minded is an enmity against God, no man can warmly love God without the Holy Spirit. If the carnal mind is against God, then truly the best good works are unclean and sinful, which an Adam's child may always do. If the flesh cannot be subject to God's law, then a man also truly sins, even if he does noble, beautiful, and delicious good works, which the world esteems great.

(87) The adversaries see only the commandments of the other tablet of Moses, which also speaks of outward honesty, which reason understands better, and want to think that with such outward good works they are keeping God's law. But they do not look at the first tablet, which commands us to love God with all our heart, not to waver or doubt, not to be angry with God because of sin, not to fear God with all our heart, not to doubt in our hearts that God is not far away and that He hears our prayer.

(88) Now, before we are born again by the Holy Spirit, we are all of the Adamic kind, in that our hearts are sure to despise God's wrath, judgment, and forbearance, and to be hateful to His judgment and punishments. Now if all the children of Adam are born in great sins, that we all of a kind despise God, put his word, promise, and forbearance in doubt, then truly our best good works, which we do before we are born again by the Holy Spirit, must be sinful and condemned works before God, though they are beautiful in the sight of the world. 1) For they proceed out of an evil, ungodly, unclean heart, as Paul saith Rom. 14:23, "Whatsoever proceedeth not from faith is sin." For all such works saints do works without faith, despise God in their hearts, and believe as little that God will take care of them as Epicurus believed. The contempt of God inwardly must ever make the works obscene and sinful, even if they are beautiful before men; for God searches the hearts.

019 Last of all, this is ever most foolishly and unskillfully spoken by the adversaries, that men, who are also guilty of everlasting wrath, should be forgiven.

1) Müller has replaced "his" with: "be". In Latin: et-iuru Huuni ōuestu Opera iaoiunt.

The Lord is the one who has the power to give forgiveness of sins through love, or aetum elioitunr äileotionis, since it is impossible to love God if the heart has not first grasped forgiveness of sins through faith.

(90) For a heart that is in anguish and rightly feels God's wrath cannot love God, unless he gives breath to the heart, comforts it, and shows himself merciful again. For since he terrifies us and thus attacks us, as if he wanted to push us away from him in eternal disgrace to eternal death, the poor weak nature must lose heart and courage, and must tremble before such great wrath, which terrifies and punishes so horribly, and can then, before God himself comforts us, not feel a speck of love.

(91) Idle and inexperienced people may well invent for themselves a dream of love, which is why they speak so childishly that one who is guilty of a mortal sin may nevertheless love God above all things. For they do not yet know what a burden sin is, what a great torment it is to feel God's wrath.

(92) But pious hearts, which have experienced it in the right fight with Satan and right anxieties of conscience, know well that such words and thoughts are vain thoughts, vain dreams. Paul says: "The law only causes wrath", Rom. 4, 15. He does not say that through the law people deserve forgiveness of sins. For the law always accuses and terrifies the conscience.

Therefore the law makes no one righteous and just before God, for a frightened conscience fears God and His judgment. Therefore, those who want to earn forgiveness of sins by their works or by the law are mistaken.

(94) Let this be said enough of the righteousness of the saints of works, or of the reason which the adversaries teach. For soon after, when we shall speak of the piety and righteousness that is valid before God, which comes from faith, the thing itself will bring about the introduction of more sayings from Scripture, all of which will serve equally well to overthrow the above-mentioned errors of the adversaries.

95 For since no man is able to keep the law of God by his own strength, and all are under sin, guilty of eternal wrath and death, we cannot be freed from sin by the law, nor become righteous in the sight of God, but are promised forgiveness of sin and righteousness through Christ, who was given for us to pay for the sin of the world, 2) and is the

Some mediator and redeemer. And this promise is not thus: Through Christ you have grace, salvation, where you deserve it, but purely by grace he offers forgiveness of sin, as Paul says: "If forgiveness of sin is of works, it is not grace"; and in another place: "This righteousness, which is before God, is revealed without law", that is, forgiveness of sin is offered in vain.

006 And therefore it is not of our own merit that we are reconciled to God. For if it were of our own merit that we should be forgiven of sin and reconciled to God out of the law, it would be lost, and if we were truly wickedly united and reconciled to God, because we do not and cannot keep the law, it would follow that we would never obtain the grace and reconciliation promised.

97 For thus Paul saith unto the Romans, in the fourth chapter, v. 14, If the inheritance be of the law, faith is nothing, and the promise is made void. Now if the promise was based on our merit and on the law, it followed, because we could not keep the law, that the promise was in vain.

98 But if we become righteous and just before God by grace and mercy alone, which are promised in Christ, we shall not become righteous by our works. For what need would there be of the glorious, divine promise, and why should Paul exalt and praise grace so highly?

99. Therefore the gospel teacheth, exalteth, preacheth, and exalteth the righteousness that cometh by faith in Christ, which is not the righteousness of the law. So also the law teacheth nothing of this, and is much more righteousness than the righteousness of the law. For the law requires of us our works, and would have us to be inwardly godly in heart, and wholly righteous. 1)

(100) But the divine promise offers us, as those who are overcome by sin and death, help, grace, and reconciliation for Christ's sake; which grace no man can obtain by works, but only by faith in Christ. This same faith neither brings nor gives to the Lord any work or merit of its own, but builds only on grace alone, and knows neither how to comfort itself nor how to rely on anything, but only on mercy, which is promised in Christ. Now this same faith, when every man believeth for himself that Christ is given for him, obtaineth alone.

1) Müller: "are"; Jenaer: "be".

Forgiveness of sin for Christ's sake, and makes us righteous and just before God.

101) And because this same faith, being in righteous repentance, restores our hearts even in the terror of sin and death, we are born again through it, and through faith the Holy Spirit comes into our hearts, who renews our hearts so that we may keep God's law, love God rightly, fear Him with certainty, not waver nor doubt, that Christ is given to us, that He hears our cries and supplications, and that we may rejoice in God's will even in the midst of death. So this faith, which by grace freely receives and obtains forgiveness of sin, is righteous, which sets not its own merit or work against the wrath of God, which would be a feather against a whirlwind, but which represents Christ the Mediator, and this faith is a right knowledge of Christ.

022 He therefore that believeth knoweth the great benefits of Christ, and is made a new creature: and until such faith be in the heart, no man can fulfil the law. Of the same faith and knowledge of Christ there is not a syllable, not a tittle, in all the books of the adversaries.

013 Wherefore we also reproach the adversaries, because they teach the law only of our works, and not the gospel, which teacheth that a man is justified if he believe in Christ.

What is the faith that makes pious and righteous in the sight of God?

014 The adversaries suppose that faith is this, that I know or have heard the things concerning Christ: therefore they teach that I may believe, though I be in mortal sin.

055 Wherefore of the true Christian faith, which Paul speaketh of so often in all places, that by faith we become righteous in the sight of God, they know or speak nothing at all. For those who are considered holy and righteous in the sight of God are not in mortal sin. Therefore, the faith that makes one righteous and just before God is not only this, that I know the history of how Christ was born, suffered, and died. (the devils know this also), but is the certainty, or the certain, strong confidence in my heart, since I believe with all my heart the promise of God to be certain and true, by which is offered to me, without my merit, forgiveness of sin, grace, and all salvation, through the Mediator Christ. And lest any one think that it is a mere knowledge of history, I add this: Faith is that my whole heart may take hold of the same treasure...

And it is not my doing, nor my giving, nor my work, nor my preparation; but that a heart may be comforted, and wholly confident, that God giveth us, and giveth us, and we not unto him, that he will lavish upon us all the treasures of grace in Christ.

016 From this it is easy to perceive the difference between faith and godliness, which is by the law. For faith is such a service and righteousness, that I give and receive. But the righteousness of the law is such a service of God, which commends our works to God. So then God will be honored through faith, that we may receive from him what he promises and commends.

107) Now that faith is not the only knowledge of history, but that it holds fast the divine promise, is sufficiently signified by Paul, who saith unto the Romans in the fourth chapter, v. 16: "Therefore must righteousness come by faith, that the promise may stand fast."

(108) There Paul attaches and connects the two so that where there is promise, there must also be faith 2c. And again corrlutivs: where there is promise, God also requires faith.

(109) Although it is still more clear and difficult to show what the faith that makes one righteous is, if we look at our own sins and faith. For in the K'iridolo there is this article: "Forgiveness of sin." Therefore it is not enough that I know or believe that Christ was born, suffered, and rose again, if we do not also believe this article, wherefore all these things are finally done, namely, I believe that my sins are forgiven me. The other thing must be drawn from this article, namely, that for Christ's sake, not for my own merit, our sins are forgiven. For what need is there that God should give Christ for our sin, if our merit could suffice for our sin?

010 Therefore, as often as we speak of the faith that justifieth, or of the faith that maketh righteous, these three things, or okjseta, are always with one another. First, the divine promise; secondly, that the same is free, without merit, grace; thirdly, that Christ's blood and merit is the treasure by which sin is paid for. The promise is received by faith: but that it should receive grace without merit, then all our worthiness and merit is brought to nought, and great grace and mercy are praised. But the merit of Christ is the treasure. For there must be a treasure and a precious pledge, by which the sins of the whole world are paid for.

(111) All the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, when they speak of God and faith, use much of this word: goodness, mercy, miserieorckia. And the holy Fathers in all their books all say that we are saved by grace, by goodness, by forgiveness. Now as often as we find the word "mercy" in Scripture, or in the Fathers, we are to know that there is taught of faith, which grasps the promise of such mercy. Again, whenever the Scriptures speak of faith, they mean the faith that is built on pure grace. For faith does not make us righteous and just before God because it is our work and ours in Himself, but only because it receives the promised grace offered, without merit, from a rich treasure.

(112) And such faith and trust in God's mercy is praised as the greatest and most holy service of God, especially in the prophets and psalms. For although the Law does not preach grace and forgiveness of sins as the Gospel does, yet the promises of the future Christ are grounded from one patriarch to another, and they knew and believed that God would give blessing, grace, salvation, and comfort through the blessed Seed, through Christ.

013 Therefore, when they understood that Christ should be the treasure by which our sins should be paid, they knew that our works could not pay such a great debt. Therefore they have received forgiveness of sins, grace, and salvation without any merit, and have been saved through faith in the divine promise, in the gospel of Christ, as well as we or the saints in the New Testament. Hence these words, mercy, goodness, faith, are so often repeated in psalms and prophets, as in the 130th Psalm, v. 3: "If thou wilt, O Lord, take heed to iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand?" Then David confesses his sin, and boasts not of much merit, saying also further, "For with thee there is forgiveness, that they may fear thee." Then he feels comfort again and relies on grace and mercy, relies on the divine promise and says: "My soul waits for the Lord, and I wait for his word." And yet, "My soul waiteth on the Lord," that is, because thou hast promised forgiveness of sin, I keep the promise, I rely and venture on the gracious promise. For this reason 1) the holy

(114) And if indeed every man should be greatly astonished why the adversaries teach so little, or nothing at all, of faith, when they see very plainly in all the syllables of the Bible, that faith is commended and praised for the highest, noblest, holiest, greatest, most acceptable, best service of God. So he says in the 50th Psalm, v. 15. "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will save thee." So then, and by this means, God wants to be known to us, so he wants to be honored, that we may receive and receive from him grace, salvation, and all good things, and that by grace, not because of our merit.

(115) This knowledge is indeed a noble knowledge, and a mighty comfort in all temptations, bodily and spiritual, whether to die or to live, as pious hearts know. And this same noble, precious, certain consolation the adversaries rob and take from poor consciences when they speak and teach of faith so coldly, so contemptuously, and in contrast deal with God, the high Majesty, through our miserable beggarly works and merit.

That faith in Christ makes righteous.

(116) For the first, that no one may think that we speak of a bad knowledge or knowledge of the history of Christ, we must first say how it happens, how a heart begins to believe, how it comes to believe. Then we will show that this same faith makes one pious in the sight of God, and how this is to be understood, and we will reject the adversary's reasons actually, clearly, and certainly. Christ commands Luke in the last place to preach repentance and forgiveness of sin. The gospel also reproves all men, that they are born in sins, and that they are all guilty of eternal wrath and death, and offers them forgiveness of sins and righteousness through Christ. And the same forgiveness, reconciliation, and righteousness, is received by faith.

117) For the preaching of repentance, or this voice of the gospel, "Repent ye, do penance," when it entereth rightly into the hearts, terrifieth the consciences, and is not a jest, but a great terror, because the conscience feeleth its sorrow, and sin, and the wrath of God. In this fright the hearts are to seek comfort again. This happens when they believe in the promise of Christ, that through him we have forgiveness of sins. The faith that is found in such The same strong consolation is a new birth, and a new life; for the same strong consolation straightens and comforts the heart, receives and feels forgiveness of sin, makes righteous, brings life.

118. This is ever plainly and clearly spoken. Thus devout hearts know that it is altogether; thus the examples that it has been so with all the saints from the beginning are present in the church, as may be seen in the conversion of Paul and Augustine. The adversaries have nothing certain, can nowhere rightly say or intelligibly speak of how the Holy Spirit is given. They invent their own dreams, that by badly receiving and using the sacraments ex opere operato men obtain grace and receive the Holy Spirit, when the heart is not there at all, as if the light of the Holy Spirit were such a bad, weak, null thing.

019 But if we speak of such faith, which is not an idle thought, but such a new light, life, and power in the heart, as turns the heart, mind, and spirit, and makes of us a new man and a new creature, that is, a new light and work of the Holy Ghost; understand of men that we speak not of such faith, which is deadly sin, as the adversaries speak of faith. For how can light and darkness be together? For faith, where it is, and while it is there, bringeth forth good fruit, as we shall say afterward.

(120) This is ever spoken in clear, plain, simple words, how it is when a sinner is rightly converted, what the new birth is or is not. Now, in spite of all the Bontontiaris, whether they can produce one among the innumerable commentaries, glosses, and scribes on Kontoritarium, who puts a word, a tittle, rightly, about how it happens when a sinner is converted. When they speak of love, or when they speak of their UaVitu äilootionis, they certainly bring forward their dreams, that the same UaUitum the people earn by their works, but speak nothing at all of God's promise or word, as also at this time the Anabaptists teach.

(121) Now one cannot deal with God; God cannot be known, sought, or grasped, for only in the word and through the word, as Paul says [Rom. 1:16]: "The gospel is the power of God to all who believe in it"; item, Rom. 10, v. 17: "Faith is of the hearing. And from this alone it should ever be clear enough that by faith alone we become godly before GOD. For if we come to God by the word of God alone, and if we are saved by the word of God alone, we are saved by the word of God alone.

And no man can understand the word, but by faith: therefore it follows, that faith justifieth. But there are other causes that rhyme with this.

052 This I have said hitherto, that I may shew how it is, how we are born again, and that it may be understood what the faith is, or is not, of which we speak.

(123) Now let us show that this same faith, and nothing else, justifies us before God. And first of all I will warn the reader of this, just as this saying must and shall stand, and no one can overthrow it: "Christ is our only Mediator" [1 Tim. 2:5]: so also no one can overthrow this saying: "By faith we are justified without works." For how will Christ be and remain the Mediator, if we do not by faith hold to Him as to the Mediator, and thus be reconciled to God, if we do not certainly hold in our hearts that for His sake we are esteemed righteous before God? This is what it means to believe, to trust, and thus to be comforted in the merit of Christ, that for his sake God will surely be gracious to us. Item, as this is clear in Scripture, that the promise of Christ is necessary above the law for salvation, so it is also clear that faith makes righteous. For the law preacheth not forgiveness of sins by grace. For we cannot fulfil the law, nor keep it, until we have received the Holy Spirit.

014 Therefore it must be that the promise of Christ is necessary to salvation. This no one can grasp or receive, except by faith alone. Therefore, those who teach that we are not justified and righteous before God by faith, what do they do but suppress Christ and the gospel and teach the law?

(125) But some, when it is said that faith justifies before God, may understand this from the beginning, namely, that faith is only the beginning, or a preparation for justification, that is, that faith itself is not to be considered as pleasing and acceptable to God, but that we are acceptable to God because of the love and works that follow, not because of faith. And such think that faith is commended in the Scriptures only because it is the beginning of good works, as there is always much in the beginning. This, however, is not our opinion, but we teach this about faith, that through faith itself we are pleasing in the sight of God.

126. and after the word justificari is used on

If the word "righteous" is used in two ways, namely, for being converted or born again, item, for being esteemed righteous, we first want to indicate that we are converted, born again, and become righteous from an ungodly nature through faith alone.

(127) Some dispute greatly about the word SOLA, but Paul clearly says to the Romans, 3:28: "Therefore we hold that a man is justified without the work of the law"; item, Eph. 2:8: "It is the gift of God, not of yourselves, nor of works, lest any man should boast"; item, Romans, 3:24, the like.

(128) Now if this word, and this exclusiva SOLA, is so hard against some, and so ill pleasing, let them in many places in the epistles of Paul scratch out also these words, "by grace;" item, "not of works;" item, "God's gift;" 2c.; item, "that no man may boast;" 2c. and the like; for they are quite strong exclusivae. The word "by grace" excludes merit and all works, as the names have.

019 And by the word SOLA, when we say that faith alone maketh good, we do not exclude the gospel and the sacraments, that therefore the word and sacraments should be vain, if faith alone do all things, as the adversaries make all things dangerous to us; but we exclude our merit in them. For we have said above enough that faith comes by the word; so we praise the preaching ministry and word higher and more than the adversaries. So also we say that love and works should follow faith.

(130) Therefore we do not exclude works by the word SOLA, so that they should not follow; but the reliance on merit, on works, we exclude, and say that they do not merit forgiveness of sins. And this we will show still more correctly, Heller, and clearly.

That we obtain forgiveness of sin only 1) through faith in Christ.

131 We hold that the adversaries must confess that forgiveness of sin is necessary above all things for justification. For we are all born under sin; wherefore therefore we conclude:

132) To obtain and have forgiveness of sins is to become righteous and pious before God, as the 32nd Psalm, v. 1, says: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven. But it is by faith alone in Christ, and not by the

1) This word is in brackets in Müller. But the ancients used the brackets to emphasize.

iWo. 1153

Love, not for love's sake or works, only obtains remission of sin, though love follows where faith is. Therefore it must follow that we are justified by faith alone. For to be justified is to become righteous from a sinner and to be born again through the Holy Spirit. But that we obtain forgiveness of sin by faith alone, as the minor says, and not by love, we will now make clear.

(133) The adversaries speak childishly of these high things. They ask whether they are one change, the forgiveness of sins and the infusion of grace, or whether they are two. The idle and inexperienced cannot speak of these things at all. For to feel sin rightly, and the wrath of God, is not such a bad, sleepy thing. Again, to take hold of forgiveness of sin is not such a weak consolation.

134. For so Paul says 1 Cor. 15:56, 57: "The sting of death is sin. But the power of sin is the law. But praise be to God, which giveth us conquest through Jesus Christ our Lord. "That is, sin terrifies the conscience; this happens through the law, which shows us God's earnestness and wrath against sin, but we are overcomers through Christ. How does this happen? When we believe, when our hearts are restored, and our minds are turned to the promise of grace through Christ. So now we prove this, that it is by faith in Christ, and not by works, that we obtain forgiveness of sin. For God's wrath cannot be atoned for or satisfied by our works, but Christ alone is the mediator and reconciler, and for his sake alone the Father will be gracious to us.

135 Now no man can receive Christ as a mediator by works, but only by believing the word which preacheth him as a mediator.

(136) Therefore we obtain forgiveness of sin by faith alone, when our hearts are comforted and established by the divine promise which is offered to us for Christ's sake. Item, Paul to Romans 5, n. 2: "Through him we have access to the Father," and says plainly to this, "through faith."

017 So then, and not otherwise, we are reconciled to the Father, and so we obtain forgiveness of sins, when we are instructed to hold fast the promise of grace and mercy made to us through Christ.

018 The adversaries, understanding this of Christ the mediator and reconciler, that Christ is us deserve love or the iaulfftrnn äilsetionis, and do not say that we must use him as a single mediator, but put Christ back into the grave, inventing otherwise, as if we have an entrance by our works; item, as if we deserve the inrditum by works, and after that can come to God by love.

139) That is, to put Christ back into the grave, and to take away the whole doctrine of faith. But Paul clearly teaches that we have access, that is, the reconciliation of God through Christ. And to show how this happens, he adds, "through faith we have access. By faith we receive forgiveness of sin from the merit of Christ, and cannot satisfy God's wrath except through Christ. Thus it is easy to understand that we do not earn forgiveness by our works or love.

(140) Secondly, it is certain that sins will be forgiven for the sake of Christ's propitiation, Romans 3:25: "Whom God hath set forth a mercy seat," or a propitiation, and he adds clearly, "through faith. Thus the reconciler will be of use to us, if we by faith grasp the word by which mercy is promised, and keep it against God's wrath and judgment. And the like is written in Heb. 4:14, 16: "We have one high priest, Christ," 2c. "Let us approach him with joy." He calls us to come to God, not in the confidence of our works, but in the confidence of Christ the High Priest. For this reason he clearly demands faith.

141. For the third, Peter in Histories of the Apostles on the 10th, v. 43. says, "To JEsu give all the prophets witness, that we should obtain forgiveness of sins through his name, all that believe in him." How could Peter have spoken more clearly? He says, I receive forgiveness of sin through his name, that is, through him we receive it, not by our own merit, not by our newness or attrition, not by our love, not by our own worship, not by our own ordinances or works, and adds, "If we believe in him."

142 For this cause he desireth that there should be one faith in the heart: therefore saith he, All the prophets bear witness of Christ with one mouth. This, I think, is properly called the Christian Church, or the Catholic Church allegorized. For if all the holy prophets bear witness, this is a glorious, great, excellent, strong decree and testimony. But of this saying we will speak further below.

143.                      fourth,                      forgiveness                      of                      sin                      is Promised for Christ's sake; therefore no man can obtain it, but by faith alone. For the promise cannot be grasped, nor can it be made a part of, but by faith alone, Rom. 4:16: <sup>1)</sup> "Therefore must righteousness come by faith, that it may stand fast by grace, and the promise stand fast." As if to say, If our salvation and righteousness depended on our merit, the promise of God would still be uncertain, and useless to us, for we could 2) never be sure of it, if we had merited enough. And this pious hearts and Christian consciences understand almost well, if they did not assume a thousand things, that our salvation would rest on us. With this Paul agrees with the Galatians: "God has decreed all things under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might come to those who believe." Then Paul puts down all our merit, for he says, "We are all guilty of death, and have sinned;" and remembers the divine promise, by which alone we obtain forgiveness of sin. And further adds, how we are made partakers of the promise, namely, by faith. And this reason of this argument, since Paul deduces it from the nature and character of the divine promise, namely, that if God's promise is to be sure and firm, as it cannot fail to be, then the forgiveness of sin must not be of our own merit, otherwise it would be uncertain, and we would not know if we had merited enough. Yes, this argument, I say, and the reason, is a right rock, and almost the strongest in all Paul, and is very often raised and attracted in all the epistles.

(144) Neither shall any man on earth strive, invent, or devise any thing to overthrow this one cause, if there be nothing else. Nor will pious hearts and Christian consciences allow themselves to be led astray from this, namely, that we have forgiveness of sin through faith alone for the sake of Christ's merit. For there they have a certain, strong, eternal consolation against sin, the devil, death, hell; all the rest is a foundation of sand, and consists not in temptations.

145. If then we obtain forgiveness of sin and the Holy Spirit through faith alone, faith alone makes us righteous before God. For those who are reconciled to God are righteous before God and are God's children, not because of their purity, but because of God's mercy.

1) Müller: Rom. 4, 13.

2) Müller: "can".

For the sake of the world, if they grasp and take hold of it by faith.

016 Therefore the scripture testifieth that by faith we become righteous in the sight of God. Let us therefore relate these sayings, which clearly state that faith makes us righteous and just, not because our faith is such a precious and pure work, but only because by faith, and by no other means, we receive the mercy offered.

(147) Paul, in the Epistle to the Romans, deals primarily with this matter, how a man may become righteous before God, and he instructs that all who believe that they have a gracious God through Christ may become righteous before God without merit through faith. And this mighty resolution, this proposition, in which the main point of the entire epistle, indeed of the entire Scripture, is summarized, he sets forth in the third chapter, v. 28, in dry, clear words: "So then we hold that a man may be justified without the work of the law, but only through faith.

(148) Then the adversaries would say that Paul excluded only the Jewish ceremonies, and not other virtuous works. But Paul does not speak of ceremonies alone; he certainly speaks also of all other works, and of the whole law, or ten commandments. For in the 7th chapter after this, he refers to the saying of the ten commandments, "Be not lascivious." And if by other works, which are not Jewish ceremonies, we could obtain forgiveness of sins, and thereby merit righteousness, what need would there be of Christ and his promise? Then all that Paul speaks of the promise in so many places would already be in vain. So Paul also wrote wrongly to the Ephesians, when he says Eph. 2:8: "Without merit, freely were ye saved; for it is the gift of God, not of works." Item, Paul calls in the epistle to the Romans [Cap. 4, 3. 6.] Abraham and David: the same had a command and God's commandment of circumcision. If any work made them righteous in the sight of God, then the works that had God's command at that time must also have made them righteous and righteous.

149 But Augustine clearly teaches that Paul is speaking of the whole law, as he then disputes according to the length of it, according to the spirit and the letter, since he finally says: "Therefore, if we have considered and acted on this piece according to the ability that God has bestowed, we conclude that no man becomes righteous through the commandment of a good life, but through the faith of Jesus Christ.

150 And that no man should think that this word, "Man is justified by faith alone," should escape Paul, he expounds it at length in the fourth chapter to the Romans, and repeats it in all his epistles. For thus he says in the fourth chapter, v. 4, 5: "To him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned by grace, but by duty. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness."

001 It is therefore clear from these words, that faith is the thing and the essence which he calls the righteousness of God. And he adds that it is imputed by grace, and says that it could not be imputed to us by grace if there were works or merit. Therefore he certainly excludes all merit and all works, not only of Jewish ceremonies, but also all other good works. For if by these works we should become righteous before God, faith would not be counted to us for righteousness without all works, as Paul clearly says. And afterwards he says, "And we say that Abraham's faith was counted for righteousness." Item, Cap. 5:1: "Therefore having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," that is, we have a happy and quiet conscience before God. Rom. U), 10: "If a man believe with all his heart, he is justified." There he calls faith the righteousness of the heart. To Galatians 2, v. 10: "So we also believe in Christ JESUM, that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law." Eph. 2, 8: "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast." Joh. 1, 12. 13: "To those he gave power to become children of God, who believe in his name, who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." John 3:14, 15: "As Moses lifted up a serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish." Item, v. 17: "God did not send his Son into the world to judge the world, but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him shall not be judged." Apost. 13:38, 39: "Be it known unto you therefore, brethren, that there is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and of all things whereby ye are not saved.

can be justified in the law of Moses. But he that believeth on him is justified." How could he have spoken more clearly of the kingdom of Christ and of justification? He says that the law could not justify anyone, and says that for this reason Christ was given to us so that we might believe and be justified through Him. In clear words he says: The law cannot justify anyone; therefore righteousness is imputed to us through Christ, if we believe that God is gracious to us through Him. Apost. 4, 11. 12: "This is the stone, rejected of you builders, which became the cornerstone; and there is salvation in no other, neither is there any other name given unto men, wherein we must be saved."

022 But in the name of Christ I cannot believe otherwise, except I hear the merit of Christ preached, and understand it. Therefore it is by believing in the name of Christ, and not by trusting in our works, that we are saved. For the word "name" in the place signifies cause, whereby and therefore salvation cometh. Therefore to boast or confess the name of Christ is as much as to trust in him who alone is Christ, and is called the causa of my salvation and treasure, whereby I am saved. Apost. 15:9, "By faith he purified their hearts." Wherefore faith, as the apostles speak of, is not a bad knowledge of histories, but a strong, powerful work of the Holy Ghost, which changeth the hearts. Habak. 2, 4: "The righteous liveth by faith." First, he says that the righteous is justified by faith, if he believes that God is gracious through Christ. Secondly, he says that faith gives life. For faith alone brings peace and joy to the heart and conscience, and eternal life, which begins here in this life. Isa. 53:11: "His knowledge shall justify many." But what is the knowledge of Christ, but to know his good pleasure, and his promise, which he hath preached and sent to be preached into the world? And to know the benefits is to truly believe in Christ, that is, to believe what God has promised through Christ, that he will surely give. But the Scriptures are full of such sayings and testimonies. For Scripture deals with these two things: The law of God and the promise of God. Now the promises speak of the forgiveness of sin and God's propitiation through Christ.

153 And in the Fathers also are found many of the sayings. For Ambrose also writes to Irenaeo: But the whole world therefore becomes subject to GOD, subject by the law. For by the commandment of the law we are all accused.

But by the works of the law no man is justified. For sin is known by the law, but guilt is redeemed by faith. And it seems as if the law had done harm, because it made all sinners. But the Lord Christ is come, and hath given us sin, which no man could put away, and hath blotted out the handwriting by the shedding of his blood. And this is what Paul saith to the Romans in the 5th, v. 20. "Sin was made mighty by the law, but grace was made mightier still by JEsu[m]." For because the whole world became guilty, he took away sin from the whole world, as John testifies [John 1:36.], "Behold, this is the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." And therefore let no man glory in his own works, for by his own doing no man is justified. But to him that is justified it is given in baptism into Christ, being justified. For it is faith that maketh us free through the blood of Christ. And blessed is he, whose sins are forgiven, and whose salvation is granted.

These are Ambrosii's clear words, which are quite publicly in accord with our doctrine. He says that works do not justify, and says that faith redeems us through the blood of Christ. If all the 8sntsntiurio8 were melted together in one heap, which yet have great titles (for some call them angelic, unMÜsos, some sudtäss, some irrskraZudilss, that is, Doctores, who cannot err), and if they were all read, they would not be so useful with each other to understand Paulum, as the one saying of Ambrosii.

(155) Augustine also wrote much against the Pelagians on this point of view, and in De spiritu et litsru he says: "For this reason the law and its righteousness are held out to us, that whoever does them may live by them, and that each one, recognizing his weakness, may come to God, who alone makes righteous, not by his own strength nor by the letter of the law, which we cannot fulfill, but by faith. No man can do a good work except he himself be first righteous, godly, and good. But we attain righteousness by faith alone. There he clearly says that God, who alone saves and sanctifies, is reconciled through faith, and that faith makes us righteous and just before God. And soon after: By the law we fear GOD, by faith we hope and trust in GOD. But those who fear punishment, grace is hidden from them. Under what fear, when a man is in fear 2c.,

Let him flee by faith unto the mercy of God, that he may give, and add grace to that which he gave in the law. He teaches that hearts are troubled by the law and are comforted by faith.

016 It is a wonder that the adversaries can be so blind, and not consider so many clear sayings, which clearly declare that we are justified by faith, and not by works. Where do these poor people think? Do they think that the Scriptures, without any cause, so often give us clear words? Do they think that the Holy Spirit does not make his word sure and certain, or that he does not know what he is saying?

157 The ungodly men have devised a sophistical gloss upon this, saying, The sayings of the scriptures, when they speak of faith, are to be understood of 6äs koririala; that is, they say, faith doth not make any man pious or righteous, but for love or works. And in sum, according to their opinion, so faith makes no one righteous, but love alone. For they say that faith can be next to mortal sin. What is this but overthrowing all the promise of God and the promise of grace, and preaching the law and works?

(158) If faith obtains forgiveness of sins and grace because of love, the forgiveness of sins will always be uncertain. For we never love God as fully as we should; indeed, we cannot love God, for the heart is only certain that sins are forgiven. Thus, when the adversaries teach that we can trust in the love of God and in our own works, they push the gospel, which preaches the forgiveness of sins, to the ground; for no one can rightly have or understand love, unless he believes that we obtain forgiveness of sins by grace through Christ for nothing.

159 We also say that love should follow faith, as Paul says: "In Christ Jesus there is neither circumcision nor foreskin, but faith working through love. But we are not therefore to trust in love, nor to build upon it, as if for love's sake, or through love, we obtained forgiveness of sin and reconciliation to God. Just as we do not obtain forgiveness of sins because of other works that follow, but through faith alone. For no one can grasp the promise of God by works, but only by faith. And faith, in fact, or propis äista, is when my heart and the Holy Spirit in my heart say to me, "The promise of God is not to be forgiven.

God is true and yes. Scripture speaks of this same faith. And because faith, before we do anything or work anything, gives and receives only to him, faith is counted to us for righteousness, as it was to Abraham before we loved, before we did the law or any work.

(160) Although it is true that fruit and work are not left out, and faith is not a mere bad knowledge of history, but a new light in the heart and powerful work of the Holy Spirit, by which we are born anew, by which the troubled consciences are restored and gain life. And because faith alone obtains forgiveness of sin, and makes us acceptable to God, it brings with it the Holy Spirit, and should be called cheaper: Krutiū kueisns, that is, the grace that maketh pleasant, than the love that followeth.

161. hitherto we have abundantly shewed from the sayings of the fathers, and from the scriptures, that this thing might be made very clear, that by faith alone we obtain forgiveness of sins for Christ's sake; and that by faith alone we are justified, that is, born again of unrighteousness, holy. But pious hearts see and perceive here how exceedingly needful this doctrine of faith is. For through it alone one learns to know Christ and his good deeds, and through this doctrine alone do hearts and consciences find a certain rest and comfort. For if there is to be a Christian church, if there is to be Christian faith, there must always be preaching and teaching in it, so that the consciences are not built on a delusion or on a foundation of sand, but on which they can safely rely and trust.

012 Therefore verily the adversaries are unfaithful bishops, unfaithful preachers, and unfaithful doctors; they have hitherto counseled the consciences evil, and still counsel them evil, that they teach such doctrine, leaving men in doubt, uncertain, and hanging, 1) Whether they obtain forgiveness of sin, or not. For how is it possible that they who have not heard or do not know this necessary doctrine of Christ, who are still wavering and in doubt whether they have the forgiveness of sin or not, should stand in mortal peril and in the last straits and in anguish? Item, if there is to be a Christian church, the gospel of Christ must always remain in the church, namely, this divine promise that sins are forgiven us without merit for Christ's sake. The same holy gospel is expressed by those who

1) So the Jenaer, Müller: "bängen". In Latin only: (üGitrk.
who teach nothing of the faith of which we speak.

163Now the scholastics teach, nor write, not one word, not one tittle, of faith, which is terrible to hear; whom our adversaries follow, and reject this supreme doctrine of faith, and are so obdurate and blind, that they see not that they tread under foot the whole gospel, the divine promise of the forgiveness of sin, and the whole of Christ.

(Article III.) Of the love, and fulfilment of the law.

164. Here the adversaries reproach us with this saying, "If thou wilt live for ever, keep the commandments of God"; item, Rom. 2:13, "Not they that hear the law shall be justified, but they that do the law"; and such like things of the law and of works. Now, before we answer these things, we must speak of love, and what we think of the fulfilling of the law.

165. it is written in the prophet [Jer. 31:33.], "I will put my law in their hearts." And Rom. 3:31. saith Paul, "We do not abolish the law by faith, but establish the law." Item, Christ says [Luc. 10:28.], "If thou wilt live for ever, keep the commandments." Item, to the Corinthians Paul says, "If I have not love, I am nothing" [1 Cor. 13:2.]. These and such like sayings indicate that we are to keep the law when we have been justified by faith, and so the longer the more we increase in the Spirit. But we are not speaking here of the ceremonies of Moses, but of the ten commandments, which require of us that we should rightly fear and love God from the bottom of our hearts. Since faith brings with it the Holy Spirit, and works a new light and life in the heart, it is certain and necessary that faith renews and changes the heart. And what this change of heart is, the prophet shows, when he says, "I will put my law in their hearts."

166. When we have been born again through faith and have recognized that God wants to be merciful to us, wants to be our Father and Helper, then we begin to fear God, to love Him, to thank Him, to praise Him, to ask and wait for all help from Him, and to be obedient to Him even in tribulations according to His will. Then we also begin to love our neighbor. Inwardly, through the Spirit of Christ, there is a new heart, mind, and spirit. All this cannot happen before we are justified by faith, before we are born again.

Being born of the Holy Ghost. For first of all, no man can keep the law without the knowledge of Christ; neither can he fulfill the law without the Holy Ghost. But we cannot receive the Holy Spirit except by faith, as Paul says to the Galatians in Galatians 3:14, that we receive the promise of the Spirit by faith.

Item 167: It is impossible for a man's heart to love God solely through the law or its work. For the law alone shows God's wrath and severity [Rom. 4, 15]. The law accuses us, and shows how he will punish sins so terribly, both with temporal and eternal punishments. Therefore, what the scholastics speak of the love of God is a dream, and it is impossible to love God before we know and grasp mercy through faith. For only then does God become objectum uirnbils, a lovely, blessed sight.

168) Although reason is able to lead an honorable life and to do outward works of the law to some extent without Christ, without the Holy Spirit of innate light, it is nevertheless certain, as indicated above, that the highest parts of the divine law, as turning the whole heart to God and esteeming him great with the whole heart, which is required in the first tablet and in the first, highest commandment, no one is able to do without the Holy Spirit.

(169) But our adversaries are good, crude, lazy, inexperienced theologians; they look only at the other table of Moses, and the works of the same. But the first table, where the highest theology is found, where all things are concerned, they pay no attention at all; indeed, the same highest, holiest, greatest, noblest commandment, which surpasses all human and angelic understanding, which concerns the highest service of God, the Godhead itself, and the honor of the eternal majesty, where God commands that we should warmly consider, fear, and love him as Lord and God, they consider so little, so small, as if it did not belong to theology.

170. but Christ is presented to us, that for his sake sins might be forgiven us, and the Holy Ghost given, which worketh in us a new light, and eternal life, and everlasting righteousness; that he might shew us Christ in our hearts; as John 16:15 is written, He shall take of mine own, and shall declare it unto you. Item, he worketh other gifts also, love, thanksgiving, chastity, patience 2c. Therefore no one is able to fulfill the law without the Holy Spirit. Wherefore Paul saith [Rom. 3:31], "We establish the law by faith," and do not do away with it; for so can We cannot fulfill and keep the law until the Holy Spirit is given to us.

(171) And Paul, 2 Cor. 3:15 f., saith that the covering of the face of Moses cannot be taken away, but by faith in the Lord Christ, by whom the Holy Ghost is given. For thus he saith, Until that day, when Moses is read, the covering is over their hearts: but when they turn unto the Lord, the covering is taken away. For the Lord is a Spirit. But where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Paul calls the covering the human thought and delusion of ten commandments and ceremonies, namely, that the hypocrites want to think that the law may be fulfilled and kept by outward works, and as if the sacrifices, item, all kinds of divine service ex opere operato make someone righteous before God. But when the covering is removed from the heart, that is, the error and delusion are taken away, when God shows us our sorrow in the heart and makes us feel God's wrath and our sin. Only then do we realize how far and distant we are from the law; only then do we realize how secure and blinded all people are, how they do not fear God, in sum, how they do not believe that God created heaven, earth and all creatures, sustains our breath and life and the whole creature every hour, and protects us against Satan. Only then do we learn that unbelief, certainty, and contempt for God are so deeply hidden in us. Only then do we learn that we are so weak, or do not believe at all, that God forgives sin, that He hears prayer 2c. When we hear the Word and the Gospel, and by faith know Christ, we receive the Holy Spirit, so that we may think rightly of God, fear Him, and believe Him 2c.

172 In this it is sufficiently shown that we cannot keep God's law without faith, without Christ, without the Holy Spirit. Therefore we also say that one must keep the law, and every believer begins to keep it, and increases the longer the more in love and fear of God, which is rightly fulfilling God's commandment. And when we speak of keeping the law or of good works, we understand both, the good heart inwardly and the works outwardly.

(173) Therefore the adversaries do us wrong, because they blame us for not teaching good works, when we not only say that one must do good works, but also actually say how the heart must be in them, so that they are not loose, deaf, cold hypocritical works. Experience teaches us that the hypocrites, though they are under the impression that they do not do good works, do not do them.

They are not able to keep the law with their strength, nor do they prove it by deed. For how fine they are without hatred, envy, strife, wrath, anger, avarice, adultery, etc., so that nowhere are the vices greater than in monasteries and convents. All human strength is far too weak for the devil to resist his cunning and strength of his own ability, which imprisons all those who are not redeemed by Christ. It must be divine strength and Christ's resurrection that overcomes the devil. And if we know that we are made partakers of Christ's strength and of his victory through faith, we can, on the promise that we have, ask God to protect and govern us by the strength of his Spirit, so that the devil will not overthrow us or overthrow us; otherwise we will fall into error and terrible vices every hour.

(174) Therefore Paul saith not of us, but of Christ, He hath led captivity captive, Eph. 4:8: for Christ hath overcome the devil, and hath promised through the gospel the Holy Ghost, that by the help of the same we should overcome all evil. And 1 John 3:8 is written, "For this purpose the Son of God appeared, that he might destroy the works of the devil."

(175) Moreover, (1) we teach not only how to keep the law, but also how to please God in all that we do. Namely, not that we may keep the law perfectly and purely in this life, but that we may be in Christ, as we shall hereafter say. So it is certain that ours also teach rightly of good works. And we add that it is impossible for true faith, which comforts the heart and receives forgiveness of sin, to be without the love of God. For through Christ one comes to the Father. And when we have been reconciled to God through Christ, we believe and conclude in our hearts that a true God lives and exists; that we have a Father in heaven who always looks upon us, who is to be feared, who is to be loved for his unspeakable good deeds, to whom we should always give heartfelt thanks and praise, who hears our prayers, our longings and our sighs; as John says in his first epistle, 1 John 4:19: "We love God, we love His people. 4:19: "We love him, because he loved us first." Namely, us, because he gave his Son for us, and forgave us sin. Here John sufficiently indicates that faith thus precedes, and love then follows.

016 Item, this faith is in those who are right

1) Müller: "Therefore". The Jena has our reading, which is confirmed by the Latin: uon uoe tuntum.

Repentance is when a frightened conscience feels God's wrath and sin and seeks forgiveness of sin and grace. And it is in such terror, in such anguish and distress, that faith first proves itself, and must therefore be proved and increase. Therefore faith cannot be in carnal, secure people, who live according to the lust and will of the flesh. For thus saith Paul Rom. 8:1, "There is therefore nothing damnable in them which are in Christ JEsu, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Item, v. 12. 13. "We are debtors therefore, not to the flesh, that we walk after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall surely die: but if by the spirit of the flesh ye kill business, ye shall live." Therefore faith, which alone is in the hearts and consciences of those who are heartily sorry for their sins, cannot at the same time be next to mortal sin, as the adversaries teach. Neither can it be in those who live carnally according to the world, according to the will of Satan and the flesh.

177. Out of these fruits and works of faith, the adversaries believe only one thing, namely love, and teach that love makes one righteous before God. Thus they are nothing else than preachers of works and teachers of the law. They do not first teach that we attain forgiveness of sin through faith. They do not teach anything about the mediator Christ, that we may attain a gracious God through him, but they speak of our love and our works, and yet they do not say what kind of love it is, nor can they say.

(178) They boast that they can fulfill or keep the law, when the glory belongs to no one but Christ, and so hold their own works against God's judgment, saying that they deserve grace and eternal life. This is a vain and ungodly trust in their own works. For in this life even Christians and saints cannot fully keep God's law, for evil inclinations and lusts always remain in us, even though the Holy Spirit resists them.

019 But if any of them ask, If we ourselves confess that love is the fruit of the Spirit, and if love is yet called a holy work and the fulfilling of the law, why do we not teach that it justifies before God?

2) Müller: "bewahrt". Jenaer: "bewert". In Latin: eonürmari. Hence we have adopted the latter reading.

3) Müller: "the saints". In Latin only: non PO88UMU8.

180 Answer: First, it is certain that we do not receive forgiveness of sin through love or for love's sake, but only through faith for Christ's sake. For faith alone in the heart sees the promise of God, and faith alone is the assurance of the heart that God is gracious, that Christ did not die in vain 2c. And the same faith alone overcomes the terror of death and sin. For he that still wavereth, or doubteth whether his sins be forgiven him, trusteth not God, and forsaketh Christ: for he thinketh his sin greater and stronger than the death and blood of Christ: whereas Paul saith, Romans 5:20, that grace is mightier than sin, that is, more powerful, abundant, and strong.

0181 Therefore if any man think that he will obtain forgiveness of sin because he hath love, he dishonoureth and defileth Christ, and shall find in the latter end, when he shall stand before the judgment of God, that such confidence is vain: therefore it is certain that faith alone maketh righteous. And as we do not obtain forgiveness of sin by other good works and virtues, but for patience, for chastity, for obedience to authority, and yet virtues follow where there is faith; so also we do not receive forgiveness of sin for the love of God 1); though it does not remain outside where this faith is.

022 But when Christ saith, Luke 7:47, Her sins be forgiven much, because she hath loved much, Christ himself interpreteth his word, saying, Thy faith hath helped thee. And Christ would not have the woman merit forgiveness of sin by the work of love; wherefore he saith plainly, "Thy faith hath helped thee." Now this is the faith which relies on God's mercy and word, not on works of its own. And if anyone thinks that faith can rely on God and its own works at the same time, he certainly does not understand what faith is. For a frightened conscience is not satisfied by its own works, but must cry out for mercy, and can only be comforted and uplifted by God's word. And history itself shows in this place what Christ calls love. The woman comes to Christ with the confidence that she will obtain forgiveness of sin from him; that is, to truly recognize and honor Christ. For greater honor can be

1) That is, for the sake of the love we have for God. Because this expression was misunderstood, in the old edition the preceding "not" is omitted. Cf. § 395.

Christ. For this is called truly knowing the Messiah or Christ, and seeking forgiveness of sin from him. To hold these things of Christ, that is, to recognize and accept Christ, is to believe in Christ.

013 But Christ, when he saith, She loved much, used not this word when he spake unto women, but when he spake unto the Pharisee. For the Lord Christ holds up against one another all the honor which the Pharisee did him, with the offering and works which the woman shewed him. He punisheth the Pharisee, because he knew him not for Christ, though he honoured him outwardly as a sojourner and a holy man. But Christ praises the service of women in recognizing their sin and seeking forgiveness from Christ. And it is a great example that moved Christ to punish the Pharisee as a wise and honest man who did not believe in him. He reproaches him for unbelief and admonishes him by the example. As if to say, "You ought to be ashamed of yourself, you Pharisee, because you are so blind that you do not recognize me as Christ and the Messiah, if you are a teacher of the law, and the woman, who is an unlearned poor woman, recognizes me.

184 Wherefore he commendeth not charity only, but the whole cultum, or service of God, faith with fruits; and yet he calleth the fruit before the Pharisee. For faith in the heart cannot be shown and signified to others, but by fruits, which prove faith in the heart before men. Therefore Christ would not have charity and works to be the treasure by which sins are paid for, which is Christ's blood. Therefore this controversy is about a high and important matter, since pious hearts and consciences have their highest, most certain, eternal comfort in Christ, whether we should trust in the merit of Christ, or in our works. For if we trust in our works, Christ is deprived of his glory, Christ is not the reconciler nor the mediator, and we shall finally learn that such trust is in vain, and that consciences thereby only fall into despair. For if we do not obtain forgiveness of sin and reconciliation with God through Christ without merit, no one will have forgiveness of sin unless he has kept the whole law. For the law makes no one righteous before God as long as it accuses us. Now no one can boast that he has done enough for the law. Therefore we must seek comfort in other ways, namely, in Christ.

Now let us answer the question we posed above: why love or dilsetio does not make anyone righteous before God. The adversaries think that love is the fulfillment of the law, so it would be true that love makes us righteous if we keep the law. But who may truthfully say or boast that he keeps the law and loves God as the law commands? We have shown above that this is why God has made the promise of grace, so that we cannot keep the law. Therefore Paul also says everywhere that we cannot be justified before God by the law.

(186) The adversaries must be far off the mark here, and must be mistaken as to the main question, for they regard the law alone in this matter. For all human reason and wisdom cannot judge otherwise than that by laws one must become godly, and he who outwardly keeps the law is holy and godly. But the gospel turns us round, and directs us from the law to the divine promises, and teaches that we are not justified by the law, for no man can keep it; but by the reconciliation made to us for Christ's sake, which we receive by faith alone. For before we can fulfill any part of the law, there must first be faith in Christ, through which we are reconciled to God, and only then can we obtain forgiveness of sin. Dear Lord God, how can people call themselves Christians, or say that they have ever looked at or read the books of the Gospels, who dispute the fact that we attain forgiveness of sin through faith in Christ? It is a terrible thing for a Christian man to hear alone.

187 Secondly, it is certain that even those who are born again through faith and the Holy Spirit are still not entirely pure as long as this life lasts, nor do they fully keep the law. For though they have received the firstfruits of the Spirit, and though the new life, even eternal life, has begun in them, yet something of sin and evil desire remains, and the law still finds much to accuse us of. Therefore, although the love of God and good works should and must be in Christians, they are not righteous before God for the sake of their works, but for the sake of Christ through faith. And to trust in one's own fulfillment of the law is idolatry and blasphemy against Christ, and yet falls away in the end, and causes consciences to despair.

0188 Therefore let this foundation stand fast, that we may please God for Christ's sake.

And are justified by faith, not of our love and works. Let us therefore make this clear and certain, that it may be grasped.

(189) As long as the heart is not at peace with God, it cannot be righteous. For it fears the wrath of God and despairs, and would that God would not judge; therefore the heart cannot be righteous and pleasing to God unless it has peace with God. Now faith alone makes the heart satisfied, and obtains rest and life, Rom. 5:1, when it confidently and freely relies on God's promise for Christ's sake. But our works do not bring the heart to peace. For we always find that they are not pure. Therefore it must follow that we are acceptable and righteous to God through faith alone, if we conclude in our hearts that God will be gracious to us, not because of our works and the fulfillment of the law, but out of pure grace for Christ's sake.

190. What can the adversaries raise against this cause? What can they invent or devise against the public truth? For this is ever certain, and experience teaches it strongly enough, that when we feel God's judgment and wrath rightly, or come under challenge, our works or services cannot quiet the conscience. And the Scriptures indicate this often enough, as in the 143rd Psalm, v. 2: "Thou wilt not enter into judgment with thy servant, for before thee none that liveth shall be righteous." There he clearly indicates that all saints, all godly children of God, who have the Holy Spirit, if God does not want to forgive their sin by grace, still have remaining sin in the flesh. For when David says in another place [Ps. 7:9], "Lord, judge me according to my righteousness," he is speaking of his own cause, not of his own righteousness, but asks that God will protect his cause and his word, as he says, "Judge my cause. Again in the 130th Psalm, v. 3, he clearly says that no one, not even the highest saints, can bear God's judgment, if he will take heed to iniquity, as he says: "If thou wilt take heed to iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand?" And so Job saith on the 9th, v. 28. [Vulg.]. "I am astonished at all my works." Item, v. 30. f., "Though I were washed white as snow, and though my hands shone like unto purity, yet shalt thou find uncleanness in me." And in Proverbs of Solomon [Cap. 20, 9.], "Who can say my heart is clean?" And 1 John 1:8: "If we shall say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Item, in the Lord's Prayer also the Saints: "Forgive us our trespasses"; therefore also the saints have trespasses and sins. Item, in the 4th book of Moses [14, 18 .], "Even the innocent shall not be innocent." And Zechariah the prophet saith in 2 Cap. v. 13. "Let all flesh be still before the Lord." And Isaias says [Cap. 40, 6.], "All flesh is grass," that is, the flesh and all righteousness, if we are able, cannot bear God's judgment. And Jonah says in the other chapter, v. 9: "They that are vain in vanity forsake mercy." Therefore mercy sustains us; our own works, merit, and ability cannot help us.

011 These sayings and such like in the scriptures show that our works are unclean, and that we have need of grace and mercy. Therefore works do not satisfy the conscience, but only mercy, which we take by faith.

192. Thirdly, Christ nevertheless remaineth before and after the only Mediator and Reconciler, if we be thus born again in him. Therefore they are mistaken who say that Christ alone merits us xrimurri AraUum, or the first grace, and that afterwards we must merit eternal life by our own works and merit. For He remains the only Mediator, and we are to be certain that for His sake alone we have a gracious God, even though we are unworthy of it, as Paul says [Rom. 5:2]: "Through Him we have access to God." For our best works, even after receiving the grace of the Gospel (as I said), find still weak and not at all pure. For it is not such a bad thing about sin and Adam's fall as reason thinks or imagines, and it is beyond all human understanding and thought what terrible wrath God has bequeathed upon us through disobedience, and even a terrible corruption has happened to the whole of human nature, which no works of man but God Himself alone can restore. Therefore the Psalm [P2:1] says: "Blessed are they whose sins are forgiven." Therefore we may have grace, and God's gracious kindness, and forgiveness of sins, if we have done as many good works. But this same grace can be grasped by faith alone. So Christ alone remains the high priest and mediator, and what good we do or what we keep of the law is not pleasing to God for Himself, but that we hold to Christ and know that we have a gracious God, not for the sake of the law, but for the sake of Christ.

193 Fourthly. If we held that, when we have now come to the gospel and are born again, we should hereafter merit by our works that God would be gracious to us henceforth, not by faith, the conscience would never come to rest, but would have to despair. For the law accuses us without ceasing, because we cannot fully keep it, 2c. as the whole holy Christian church and all the saints have always confessed and still confess. For thus saith Paul to the Romans in the 7th, v. 19. "The good which I will, that do I not; but the evil which I will not, that do I." 2c. Item [v. 25.], "With the flesh I serve the law of sins" 2c. For there is no one who fears and loves God the Lord as wholeheartedly as he is guilty, no one who bears the cross and tribulation in complete obedience to God, no one who does not often doubt through weakness whether God will take care of us, whether he will respect us, whether he will hear our prayer. Because of this we often grumble against God out of impatience, that it is good for the wicked and bad for the pious. Who is he who does what he is called to do, who does not rage against God in temptations when God hides Himself? Who loves his neighbor as himself? Who is without all manner of evil lusts? Of the sins of all, Psalm 32:6 says: "For this shall all the saints pray in due time." There he says that all saints must ask for forgiveness of sin.

Therefore, those who do not consider the evil desires of the flesh to be sin are blind, of whom Paul says: "The flesh strives against the spirit, and the spirit strives against the flesh. For the flesh does not trust in God, relies on this world and temporal goods, seeks human comfort and help in tribulations, even against God's will, doubts God's grace and help, murmurs against God in the cross and temptations; all of which is against God's commandment. Against the sin of Adam the Holy Spirit contends and strives in the hearts of the saints, that he may cast out and kill the poison of the old Adam, the evil and desperate way, and bring into the heart a different mind and courage.

And Augustine also says: We keep all of God's commandments when we are forgiven for all that we do not keep. For this reason, Augustine wants the good works that the Holy Spirit works in us to be pleasing to God in no other way than that we believe that we are pleasing to God for Christ's sake, not that they should please God in themselves.

196. and Jerome says against Pelagium, Then we are righteous if we consider ourselves sinners.

and our righteousness is not in our merit, but in God's mercy. Therefore, even though we are rich in good works and have begun to keep God's law, as Paul did when he preached faithfully, 2c., there must still be faith by which we trust that God is merciful and reconciled to us for Christ's sake, and not for our works. For mercy cannot be grasped but by faith alone. Therefore those who teach that we are pleasing to God because of works, not because of Christ, lead consciences into despair.

(197) From all this it is clear enough that faith alone justifies us before God; that is, it obtains forgiveness of sins and grace for Christ's sake, and brings us to a new birth. Item, it is clear enough that we receive the Holy Spirit through faith alone. Item, that our works, and since we began to keep the law, are not pleasing to God in Himself. Therefore, even though I am full of good works, as Paul and Peter were, I must still seek my righteousness elsewhere, namely, in the promise of Christ's grace; item, if faith alone satisfies the conscience, it must always be certain that faith alone makes one righteous before God. For we must always remain true to this if we want to teach correctly that we are pleasing to God not because of the law, not because of works, but because of Christ. For the glory due to Christ is not to be given to the law or to our wretched works.

Answer to the arguments of the opponents.

198. Now that we have shown the right reasons of this matter, namely, the difference between the divine promise and the law, it is easy to disregard what the opponents say against it. For they introduce sayings concerning the law and good works, but leave out the sayings which speak of divine promise. But a brief answer may be given to all the sayings which they introduce concerning the law, namely, that without Christ no man can keep the law; and though outward good works may be done without Christ, yet God is not pleased with the person for that reason. Therefore, when one wants to teach or preach about good works, one should always add that there must first be faith, and that they alone are pleasing to God because of faith in Christ, and that they are fruits and testimonies of faith.

199 This doctrine of ours is ever clear, and may well be seen in the light, and against the holy scriptures. and is also clearly and correctly presented here, whoever wants to let him be told and not knowingly deny the truth. For in order to rightly recognize Christ's benefits and the great treasure of the gospel (which Paul exalts so highly), we must separate God's promise and grace offered on one side and the law on the other as far apart as heaven and earth. In dilapidated matters, much gloss is needed, but in good matters there is always one or two solutions that go well, and resolve everything that one would think to oppose them. So here in this matter, this single solution resolves all the sayings that are brought against us, namely, that one cannot do the law rightly without Christ, and that even if outward works are done, God does not please the person apart from Christ. For we confess that the Scriptures contain these two doctrines, the law and the promise of grace.

200 But the adversaries, who trample under foot the whole gospel, and all the promises of grace in Christ, when they teach, 1) That we obtain forgiveness of sins by our love and works, and not by faith. For if God's grace and mercy toward us is based on our works, it is not at all certain. For we can never be sure if we do works enough, or if the works are holy or pure enough; so also the forgiveness of sins is uncertain, and God's promise is lost, as Paul says [Rom. 4:14]: The divine promise is then overthrown, and all is uncertain. Wherefore we teach the hearts and consciences to be comforted in the same promise of God, which standeth fast, and offereth grace, and remission of sins, for Christ's sake, and not for our works.

201. After this we also teach about good works and the law; not that we deserve forgiveness of sin through the law, or that we are pleasing to God because of the law, but that God wants good works. For one must (as Paul says 2 Tim. 2, 15.) rightly cut and divide God's word; the law in one place, the promise of God in another. One must see how the Scripture speaks of the promise, as it speaks of the law. For the Scriptures praise and commend good works in this way, yet they set God's promise and the true treasure, Christ, a thousand times higher.

0202 For good works ought to be done, and must be done, for God wills them; so they are fruits of the Lord.

1) Müller: "so they teach". In Latin: qnnm (loetzn. The Jena has our reading.

Faith, as Paul says in Eph. 2, 10: "For we were created in Christ Jesus to do good works. Therefore good works are to follow faith, as thanksgivings to God; item, that faith may thereby be exercised, grow, and increase, and that through our confession and good conduct others may also be reminded. Thus Paul says (Rom. 4:11) that Abraham received circumcision, not that he was justified by the work, but that he had a sign in his body by which he was reminded and always increased in faith; that he confessed his faith before others, and by his testimony provoked others also to believe. Thus Abel, through faith, offered a sacrifice acceptable to God [Genesis 4:4]. For the sacrifice did not please God ex opere operato, but Abel certainly believed that he had a gracious God. But the work he did was to exercise his faith and to provoke others to believe by his example and confession.

(203) Therefore, if good works should follow faith and not otherwise, those who do not believe that sins are forgiven them without merit for Christ's sake do their works much differently. For when they see good works in the saints, they judge humanly of the saints, and think that the saints have obtained forgiveness of sins by their works, or have been justified before God by works. Therefore they imitate them and think that they also want to obtain forgiveness of sins and appease God's wrath.

(204) We condemn such public error and false doctrine of works. First, that thereby the glory of Christ, the true Mediator, is taken away, and is given to wretched works, if we will present our works in Christ's stead for a treasure and propitiation of divine wrath and sin. For the glory belongs to Christ alone, not to our wretched works.

(205) Secondly, neither do consciences find peace in such works. For though they do many works and are diligent to do them, yet there is no work pure enough, important enough, delicious enough, to make a gracious God, to obtain eternal life with certainty, in sum, to make the conscience calm and peaceful.

206. For the third, those who build on works never come to know God rightly, nor His will. For a conscience that doubts God's grace cannot believe that it will be heard, and because it cannot call upon God, it will also not be aware of divine help, and thus cannot come to know God. But if there is faith, namely, that we have a gracious God through Christ, he may joyfully call upon God and learn to know God and His will.

207 But the error of works clings hard to the world. The heathen also have sacrifices, which were first of the patriarchs. They followed the sacrifices and works of the fathers; they knew not of faith, but believed that these works made them a gracious God. The Israelites also invented works and sacrifices for them, thinking that they would thereby make a gracious God through their opus operatum, that is, through the mere work that was done without faith. There we see how vehemently the prophets cry out against this, as in the 50th Psalm, v. 8: "For thy sacrifice's sake I punish thee not." 2c. Item, Jeremiah says ^Cap. 7, 22.], "I have not spoken to your fathers of burnt-offering." There the prophets do not condemn the sacrifices in themselves, for God commanded them as an outward practice in the same people, but they strike primarily at their ungodly hearts, since they made the sacrifices in the opinion that they thought God would thereby be reconciled ex opere operato; thereby faith was suppressed.

(208) And since no work satisfies the conscience, the hypocrites, on a blind guess and venture, nevertheless invent one work over another, one sacrifice over another, and all without God's word and command, with an evil conscience, as we have seen in the papacy. And especially they are moved by the examples of the saints; for when they thus follow them, they think they want to obtain forgiveness of sin, as the saints obtained 2c. But the saints believed.

020 The people of Israel saw that the prophets sacrificed in the high places and in the groves; and they imitated the work, that they might atone for the wrath of God by the work. Now the prophets had offered sacrifices there, not that they wished to merit forgiveness of sin by the works, but that they preached and taught in the places; therefore they offered the sacrifices for a testimony of their faith.

021 Now the people had heard that Abraham had sacrificed his son: that they also might do works which were grievous and sore to them, so they sacrificed their sons also. But Abraham was not of opinion to sacrifice his son, that such should be a propitiation, that he might be justified before God 2c.

211 Thus, in the church Christ instituted the Lord's Supper, wherein forgiveness of sin is offered by divine promise, that we may be reminded that by the outward sign our faith is started, that by it we may also confess our faith before men, and praise and preach the benefits of Christ, as Paul says [1 Cor. 11:26]: "As often as ye do this, ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord" 2c. But the adversaries pretend that the Mass is such a work, which ex opere operato makes us righteous before God, and redeems from chastisement and guilt those for whom it is done.

St. Anthony, St. Bernard, St. Dominic, and other saints did themselves by a life of their own, that they might the more easily read the holy Scriptures, or for the sake of other exercises. Nevertheless, they maintained that they were righteous before God through faith in Christ, that through Christ alone they had obtained a gracious God. But the great multitude subsequently came, abandoned faith in Christ, looked only to the examples without faith, and undertook to obtain forgiveness of sin through the works of the monastery. Thus reason always sets good works too high and in a wrong place. The Gospel challenges this error and teaches that we are justified before God, not because of the law or our works, but because of Christ alone. But Christ cannot be grasped but by faith alone, therefore we are justified before God by faith alone.

213) Against this the adversaries draw on the saying of Paul to the Corinthians on the 13th, v. 2: "If I had all faith, 2c. but had not love, I should be nothing." Then the adversaries cry out with a great triumph, and boast that they are assured by this saying, that not faith alone makes us righteous before God, but love also. But it is quite easy to answer this, since we have stated above what we think of love and works. In this saying Paul wants Christians to have love for their neighbor. This we also say. For we have said above that when we were born again we were to keep the law and to be obedient to God's laws. Therefore, if any man neglect Christian love, though he had great and strong faith, yet he became cold, and is now carnal again, without spirit and faith; for there is not the Holy Ghost where there is not Christian love, and other good fruits.

214. But it does not follow that love makes us righteous before God, that is, that through love we obtain forgiveness of sin, that love overcomes the terror of sin and death, that love should be held in Christ's stead against God's wrath and judgment, that love fulfills the law, that through love we become reconciled to God and pleasing to Him, and not for the sake of Christ. Paul says nothing of all this, and yet the adversaries invent it from their brains.

(215) For if we overcome the wrath of God by our love, if we are pleasing to God by our law-keeping, the adversaries may also say that the divine promise, the whole gospel, is nothing. For this teaches that we have access to God through Christ alone, that we are pleasing to God not through our law-keeping, but for the sake of Christ, as the only Mediator and Reconciler.

216. The adversaries put many sayings to their opinion, which are not so; but they make additions to them, as here. For this saying is clear enough, if only the adversaries did not add to it their own dreams outside the Scriptures, so that they do not understand what faith is, what Christ is, or how it happens when a man is justified before God.

027 The Corinthians, and some of them, had heard the gospel, and had received many excellent gifts; 1) and, as it is in such matters, in the beginning they were fierce, and stouthearted in all things; but afterward there grew up among them divisions and sects, as Paul saith, and they began to despise the true apostles. Therefore Paul punishes them, admonishes them again to unity and Christian love. And Paul does not speak in this place of the forgiveness of sin or how one becomes righteous before God or how it happens when a sinner is converted to Christ, but speaks of the fruits of faith; he also does not speak of love toward God, but of love toward the neighbor.

218 Now it is almost foolish that love toward our neighbor, by which we deal with people here on earth, should make us righteous before God, when the righteousness that is valid before God includes this, that we obtain something by which God's wrath is quenched and our conscience comes to peace against God in heaven. He who has no

1) So all editions read, but it seems to us that the text is corrupt, and according to the Latin should be so read: The Corinthians hear the gospel, and some of them, being justified before, had received many excellent gifts 2c.

happens through love, but only through faith, through which one grasps Christ and God's promise.

219 But it is true, that he that hath not love hath not the spirit and the faith. And so Paul says: "If I do not have love, I am nothing" [Cor. 13:2]. But he does not add the alternative that love makes one righteous before God.

(220) But here they also say that love is preferred to faith and hope, for Paul says in 1 Cor. 13:13, "Love is the greatest of the three." Now it is to be observed that virtue, which Paul calls the greatest, makes us righteous and holy before God. Although Paul is actually speaking of love toward one's neighbor, and when he says, "Love is the greatest," he says it because love goes far and bears much fruit on earth. For faith and hope alone deal with God. But love goes about on earth among men, and does much good, with comforting, teaching, instructing, helping, counseling, secretly and publicly. But let us admit that loving God and our neighbor is the highest virtue. For this is the highest commandment: "You shall love God with all your heart." It does not follow that love makes us righteous.

(221) Yea, they say, the highest virtue shall cheaply make righteous. Answer: It would be true if, for the sake of our! It would be true if we had a gracious God for the sake of our virtue. Now it is proved above that we are pleasing and righteous for Christ's sake, not for our virtue's sake. For our virtues are unclean. Yes, as this law is the highest, "Thou shalt love GOD," so this virtue, loving GOD, can least of all make one righteous. For if the law and virtue be higher, so that we are less able to do them, therefore we are not justified for love's sake: but faith justifies, not for our works, but only because it seeketh and receiveth mercy, and will not depend on any works of its own. This is that we teach: The law does not justify, but the gospel does; which is to believe that we have a gracious God for Christ's sake, not our own.

222. But the adversaries teach about love in this way, that it reconciles us to God, for they know nothing of the Gospel, but only look at the Law, wanting to have a merciful God for the sake of their own holiness, not out of mercy for the sake of Christ. Therefore, they alone are teachers of the law, and not teachers of the gospel.

223. Also, the adversaries against us draw on the saying to the Colossians [Cap. 3, 14.]: "Love is a bond of perfection." Hence they conclude that love makes us righteous before God, for it makes us perfect. Although we could here answer all kinds of questions about perfection, we will here deal with Paul's saying in a simple way.

224 It is certain that Paul speaks of the love of one's neighbor. Neither must it be thought that Paul is of opinion that we should be justified before God by the works of the other table, rather than by the works of the first table. If love is perfection or the complete fulfillment of the law, there is no need of Christ as mediator. But Paul, who teaches in all places that we are pleasing to God because of Christ, not because of our love or our works or the law, for no saint (as stated above) fulfills the law completely. Therefore, when he writes and teaches in all other places that in this life there is no perfection in our works, it is not to be thought that he speaks to the Colossians of perfection of person, but he speaks of unity of the church, and the word by which they interpret perfection means nothing else than to be undivided, that is, to be united. Now that he says, "Love is a bond of perfection," that is, it binds, joins, and holds together the many members of the church under itself. For as in a city, or in a house, unity is preserved by the one giving to the other, and peace nor quiet can remain unless one gives much to the other, unless we bear with one another: So Paul wants to admonish Christian love, that one should tolerate and bear the other's faults and infirmities, that they should forgive one another, so that unity may be preserved in the church, lest the cluster of Christians be torn apart and divided into all kinds of factions and sects, from which great discord, hatred and envy, all kinds of bitterness and evil poison, and finally public heresy may result. For unity cannot remain if the bishops, without any reason, impose too heavy a burden on the people. It is also easy for mobs to develop, when the people quickly want to master everything and make a mess of the bishops' or preachers' lives, or when they soon tire of the preachers, for example because of a small ailment, much great evil follows. Then they soon seek other teachers and other preachers out of the same bitterness.

225. again, perfection is obtained

And unity, that is, the church remains undivided and whole when the strong tolerate and support the weak, when the people also have patience with their preachers, when the bishops and preachers in turn know how to take advantage of all kinds of weaknesses and infirmities of the people. Of the way and manner of keeping unity also much is written everywhere in the books of philosophers and worldly wise men. For we must forgive one another many things and count them good, for the sake of unity. And of this Paul speaketh more than in one place. Therefore the adversaries do not rightly conclude that love should make righteous in the sight of God, for Paul does not speak there of the perfection or holiness of persons, as they suppose, but says that love makes a quiet being in the church. And so Ambrose also interprets the saying: As a building is whole, when all the pieces are joined together 2c.

226 But the adversaries ought also to be ashamed of themselves, that they write and preach so well of love, and write and cry love, love, in all their books, and show no love at all. For what a beautiful love of Christians is this, that by their unheard-of tyranny they cut and tear asunder the unity of the church, so that they, in order to let nothing but letters of blood and tyrannical commandments go forth, would like to imagine the most evil thing to the most noble emperor. They strangle the priests, and many other pious, honest people, for no other reason than that they alone contest public, shameful abuses. They would like to see all those dead who speak out against their ungodly doctrine. All this rhymes very badly with the great boast of love, of caritas 2c. For if there were a drop of love in the adversaries, peace and unity might well be made in the church, if they would not thus, out of pure revengeful bitterness and Pharisaic envy against the known truth, condemn their human statutes, which are of no use to Christian doctrine or life, especially if they do not themselves keep their statutes right.

0227 They also draw from the apostle Peter the saying, where he saith, Love covereth the multitude of sins. Now it is certain that Peter also speaks of love toward our neighbor, for he speaks there of the commandment of love, where it is commanded that we should love one another. Neither did it ever occur to any apostle that love should overcome death or sin, that love should be a reconciliation without Christ the Mediator, that love should be our righteousness without Christ the Reconciler. For love, if

If we have it already, it is nothing more than the righteousness of the law; it is not Christ, through whom alone we are justified, if we believe that for the sake of the Mediator the Father is gracious to us, that his merit may be given to us. For this reason Peter shortly before admonishes us to cleave to Christ, that we may be built upon him as the cornerstone. For he saith, "He that believeth on him shall not be put to shame." By our works and lives we shall indeed stand ashamed before God's judgment and face. But faith, through which Christ becomes ours, delivers us from such terrors of death. For through the promise we are quite sure that through Christ our sins are forgiven.

228. and the word 1 Pet. 4, 8: "Love covereth the multitude of sin," 2c., is taken from the Proverbs of Solomon, where he [Cap. 10, 12Z says, "Hatred maketh strife, but love covereth the multitude of sins." The text clearly shows that he is speaking of love toward his neighbor, and not of love toward God. And he wants the same thing that Paul's next saying to the Colossians says, namely, that we should be diligent to live in a brotherly, friendly way, so that one may do much to benefit the other, that unpleasure and discord may be avoided. As if he were saying, "Discord grows out of hatred," for we see that from a small spark there is often great fire.

229 There were not so great things about which Caesar and Pompey first disagreed, and if one had yielded to the other, the ensuing great war, so much bloodshed, so many great misfortunes and calamities would not have resulted. But since everyone wanted to go through with his head, the great unspeakable damage and disruption of the whole Roman regime of the time occurred. And many heresies have arisen from this, that preachers have been embittered against each other.

230 Peter's saying is to be understood thus: "Love covers the multitude of sins," that is, love covers the neighbor's sin. That is, though there be ill will among Christians, yet love bears all things, gladly overlooks, yields to the neighbor, tolerates and bears his infirmities brotherly, and does not seek all things most earnestly. Peter does not want love to merit forgiveness of sin before God, or to reconcile us to God without the mediator Christ, or to be pleasing to God through love without the mediator Christ.

easily holds his neighbor's infirmities and faults, fraternally forgives his neighbor, calms down, instructs himself, and softens for the sake of peace, as also teaches the saying: ^mlei vitia rioris, iion oäsrís, that is, I should learn my friend's way, but not hate him (whether it is not all the same) because of it.

231 And the apostles exhort not without cause to such love, which the philosophers have called iE-xs-a? For if men are to be or remain in unity with one another, whether in the church or also in worldly government, they must not reckon all afflictions against one another on the gold scale; they must let one another pass by with the water almost much, and always bear with one another, as much as also always possible have brotherly patience with one another.

(232) They also use the saying of the apostle Jacob [Cap. 2:24], and say, See ye then that we are not justified before God by faith alone, but by works? And they want to think that the saying is almost strong*) against our doctrine. But if the adversaries alone leave their dreams outside, and do not mend what they will, the answer is easy. For the apostle Jacob's saying has its simple meaning, but the adversaries invent that by our works we earn forgiveness of sins, item, that good works are a propitiation by which God is gracious to us, item, that by good works we can overcome the great power of the devil, death, and sin, item, that our good works in themselves are so pleasing and great in the sight of God that we do not need Christ's mediator. None of these things came into the heart of the apostle Jacob, which all the adversaries were obliged to keep by the saying of Jacob.

(233) We must now notice that this saying is more against the adversaries than for them. For the adversaries teach that man becomes righteous before God through love and works. They speak nothing of the faith by which we hold to the Mediator Christ. And what is more, they do not want to hear or see anything about faith, and they dare to destroy this doctrine of faith with sword and fire. But James does otherwise. He does not leave faith outside, but speaks of faith; thus he lets Christ remain the treasure and the mediator, by which we are justified before God, just as Paul, when he sets forth the summa of the Christian doctrine of faith, does.

1) In Müller: "firm, strong". But the Latin shows that the reading of the Jena edition which we have taken up is the correct one. Faith, he puts faith and love together, 1 Tim. 1:5: "The summa of the law is love out of unfeigned faith."

234 Secondly, the thing itself shows that he speaks of works which follow faith, for he shows that faith must not be dead, but living, strong, busy, and active in the heart. Therefore Jacob's opinion was not that we earn grace or forgiveness of sin by works. For he speaks of the works of those who have already been justified by Christ, who have already been reconciled to God, and have obtained forgiveness of sins through Christ. For this reason the adversaries are far wrong if they want to conclude from this saying that we earn grace and forgiveness of sins through good works, or that Jacob wants this, that we have access to God through our works without the mediator and reconciler Christ.

235 Thirdly, St. James had said before of spiritual regeneration, that it is by the gospel. For thus he saith in the first chapter, v. 18: "He begat us according to his will, by the word of truth, that we should be the firstfruits of his creation." Now if he saith that we are born again through the gospel, he wills that we should be justified before God by faith. For the promise of Christ is grasped by faith alone, if by it we are comforted against the terror of death, of sin 2c. Therefore his opinion is not that we should be born again by our works.

236 From all this it is clear enough that the saying of Jacob is not against us. For he reproaches some lazy Christians, who were too sure, making them think that they had faith, when they were without faith. Therefore he makes a distinction between living faith and dead faith. Dead faith he calls, where not all kinds of good works and fruits of the Spirit follow, obedience, patience, chastity, love 2c. Living faith he calls, where good fruits follow. Now we have often said what we call faith. For we do not call it faith, that we know the evil history of Christ, which is also in devils; but the new light and power, which the Holy Ghost worketh in the heart, by which we overcome the terror of death, of sins 2c. This we call faith.

237 Such a right Christian faith is not so easily a bad thing as the adversaries would have it, as they say, Believe, believe; how soon can I believe 2c. Neither is it a

It is not a human thought that I can make for myself, but a divine power in the heart, by which I am born again, by which we overcome the great power of the devil and of death, as Paul says to the Colossians [Cap. 2, 12]: "In whom also ye are risen again through the faith which God worketh" 2c. This same faith, because it is a new divine light and life in the heart, by which we get a different mind and courage, is alive, busy and rich in good works.

0238 Therefore this is rightly said, that faith is not right which is without works. And though he said that we are justified by faith and works, yet he saith not that we are born again by works; neither saith he that Christ is half the reconciler, half our works: but he speaketh of Christians as they ought to be, being now born again through the gospel.

239 For he speaketh of works which must follow faith, and it is well said, He that hath faith and good works is righteous: yea, not for works, but for Christ's sake through faith. And as a good tree should bear good fruit, and yet the fruit does not make the tree good, so good works must follow after the new birth, though they do not make a man acceptable to God, but as the tree must be good beforehand, so man must be acceptable to God beforehand through faith, for Christ's sake. Works are far too small for God to be gracious to us for their sake, when he is not gracious to us for Christ's sake.

(240) So Jacob is not contrary to St. Paul, nor does he say that by works we merit forgiveness of sin, nor does he say that our works overcome the power of the devil, death, sin, the terror of shells, and are equal to the death of Christ, nor does he say that by works we become pleasing to God, nor does he say that our works bring hearts to rest and overcome God's wrath, nor that we may not have mercy if we have works; which Jacob says none. What an addition the adversaries add to the words of Jacob.

241 They also have more sayings against us than this: Danielis on the 4th, v. 24. the text says, "Loose thy sin with righteousness, and thy transgression with almsgiving against the poor." And Isa. 58, 7. "Break thy bread to the hungry." Item, Luc. 6, 37. "Forgive, and you shall be forgiven"; and Matt. 5, 7. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

242. To these sayings and the like of works we first answer this: namely, that (as we said above) no one can keep the law without faith, so no one can please God without faith in Christ, as He says [John 15:5], "Without Me you can do nothing." Item [Heb. 11, 6.], "Without faith it is impossible to please GOD." Item, as Paul says [Rom. 5, 2. Eph. 3, 12.], "Through Christ we have access to GOD by faith." Therefore, as often as Scripture remembers works, it wants to have the gospel of Christ and faith communed with it everywhere.

243 Secondly, the sayings of Daniel, and the rest that are now told, are almost all sermons of repentance. First, they preach the law, point out sin, and exhort to repentance and good works. Secondly, there is a promise that God will be merciful. Now it is certain that for a right repentance it is not enough to preach the law alone, for it alone terrifies the conscience, but the gospel must also be added, namely, that sins are forgiven without merit, for Christ's sake, that we may obtain forgiveness of sins through faith. This is so certain and so clear, that if the adversaries dispute it, and separate Christ and faith from repentance, they shall be accounted blasphemers of the gospel and of Christ.

244 Therefore the words of the great and high prophet Daniel are not to be interpreted and drawn to mere works, to alms, but also to faith. The words of the prophets, which were full of faith and spirit, should not be considered as pagan as Aristotle's 1) or those of any other pagan. Aristotle also admonished Alexandrum that he should not use his power for his own good will, but for the betterment of countries and people. This is right and well written, and nothing better can be preached or written about the king's office. But Daniel tells his king not only of his royal office, but also of repentance, forgiveness of sins, reconciliation to God, and of the high, great, spiritual things, which are very high and far above all human thoughts and works. Therefore, his words are not only to be understood in terms of works and almsgiving, which even a hypocrite can do, but primarily in terms of faith.

0245. but that one must understand faith here, as we speak of, that is, believing that God will sin by mercy, not because of our merit, this is proved by the text itself. First of all, because there are two parts in Daniel's sermon. One is the preaching of the law and punishment; the other is the promise or absolution. Now where there is promise, there must be faith. For the promise cannot be received in any other way than that the heart trusts in the word of God and does not consider its own worthiness or unworthiness. For thus the promise reads: Your sins will be healed. This word is a true prophetic and evangelical message, for Daniel knew 1) that through the future Seed, Christ, forgiveness of sins, grace, and eternal life had been promised not only to the Jews but also to the Gentiles, or he would not have been able to comfort the king in this way. For it is not man's work to promise forgiveness of sins to a frightened conscience and to comfort that God will no longer be angry. Then one must have the testimony of God's will from God's word, as Daniel knew and understood the great promises of the future seed. Because he now makes a proclamation, it is clear and evident that he demands faith, as we speak of.

0246 But that he saith, Repent of thy sin with righteousness, and of thy transgression with lovingkindness toward the poor, is the sum of a whole sermon, and is so much, Correct thyself. And it is true, if we amend, we are freed from sin. Therefore he saith aright, "Loose thy sin." But it does not follow from this that we are freed from sin because of our works, or that our works are the payment for sin. Neither doth Daniel put works alone, but saith, "Loose thy sin with righteousness." Now men only know that righteousness in Scripture does not mean outward works alone, but embraces faith, as Paul says [Rom. 1:17], Justus ex fide vivet, "the righteous liveth by faith." Therefore Daniel first demands faith, when he calls it righteousness, and says, "Loose your sin with righteousness," that is, with faith toward God, by which you become righteous. In addition, do good works, namely, wait for your office, do not be a tyrant, but see to it that your government is useful to the land and the people, keep peace, and protect the poor against unjust violence. These are princely oloooaas'nao.

247 So it is clear that this saying is not contrary to the doctrine of faith. But our opposition

1) Müller: "knows"; Jenaer: "wisset"; in Latin: nornt.

The rude asses sew their additions to these sayings, that our sins are forgiven us for our works, and teach us to trust in works, when the sayings speak not so, but require good works, as it is true, that there must be another and better life in us; but yet these works shall not take away the glory of Christ.

248 So also to the saying of the Gospel [Luc. 6:37.] is to be answered, "Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven." For it is alike such a doctrine of repentance. The first part of this saying demands correction and good works. The other piece adds to this the promise, and it is not to be inferred from this that our forgiving merits us ex opere operato forgiveness of sins. For Christ does not say this, but, as in other sacraments Christ attaches the promise to the outward sign, so here also he attaches the promise of forgiveness of sins to outward good works. And just as in the Lord's Supper we do not obtain forgiveness of sins without faith ex opere operato, so also not in this work and in our forgiveness, for our forgiveness is not a good work either, unless it be of those whose sins have already been forgiven beforehand by God in Christ.

249 Therefore our forgiveness, if it be pleasing to God, must follow after the forgiveness which God forgives us. For Christ is wont to put the two together, the law and the gospel, both faith and good works, to show that there is no faith unless good works follow. That we may have outward signs to remind us of the gospel, and of the forgiveness of sins; by which we may be comforted, that our faith may be exercised in many things.

250 So these sayings ought to be understood, because otherwise they would be contrary to the whole gospel, and our beggarly works would be put in the place of Christ, who alone is to be the propitiation, which is not to be despised. If they were to be understood of works, the forgiveness of sins would be quite uncertain, for it would rest on a loose foundation, on our wretched works.

251. They also draw on a saying from Tobia <sup>1</sup>Cap. 4, 11., "Alms deliver from sin and death." We do not mean to say that there is a li'perdole; though we would say it, that Christ's honor might be preserved; for this is Christ's office alone, to redeem from sin, from death 2c. But we will keep to our old rule, namely, that the <sup>1</sup>law or works are not given to any but Christ.

to make myself right before God. Thus, the alms that "follow faith" are pleasing to God only after I have been reconciled through Christ, not before. Therefore they do not redeem from death sx opere operato, but, as I said shortly before about repentance, that one must combine faith with the fruits at the same time. So also of the alms it is to be said that they are pleasing to God, because they are done in the faithful. For Tobias does not speak of alms alone, but also of faith, for he says, v. 20: "Praise God, and ask Him to guide you in your ways" 2c. There he actually speaks of faith, as we speak of the one who believes that he has a gracious God, whom he owes to praise for His great goodness and grace, from whom he also waits daily for help, and asks Him to guide and govern him in life and death.

(252) In this way we may concede that alms are not unmeritorious against God, but not that they can overcome death, hell, the devil, sin, and put consciences at rest (for this must be done through faith in Christ alone), but that they merit God's protection against future evil and against the body and soul. This is the simple mind, which also agrees with other sayings of Scripture. For where good works are commended in the Scriptures, it is always to be understood according to the rule of Paul, that the law and works are not to be exalted above Christ, that Christ and faith are as high above all works as heaven is above the earth.

(253) They also draw upon the saying of Christ, [Luke 11:41], Pray alms, and all things shall be clean unto you. The adversaries are deaf, and have thick ears; therefore we must often teach them the precepts, that the law without Christ makes no man righteous before God, and that all works are acceptable for Christ's sake alone. But the adversaries everywhere exclude Christ, act as if Christ were nothing, and impudently teach that we obtain forgiveness of sin by good works. 2c.

254 But if we look at the saying in its entirety, we will see that it also speaks of faith. Christ chides the Pharisees for thinking that they would become holy and pure before God through all kinds of baptismata carnis, that is, through all kinds of bodily bathing, washing, and cleansing of the body, vessels, and garments, just as a pope has put into his canons a necessary papal part of the water of consecration, that when it is sprinkled with consecrated salt, it sanctifies, and cleans the people from sins. And the gloss says, it cleanseth from daily sins. So the Pharisees also had error among themselves, which Christ punishes, and sets two kinds of purity against the purification that is made, one inward, the other outward, and exhorts them to be inwardly pure. This is done (as Peter says in the Acts of the Apostles, 15, v. 9) by faith. And adds of outward purity, "Give alms of that ye have left, and all things shall be clean unto you."

(255) The adversaries do not properly use the word "all," for Christ makes the decision for both inward and outward purity, and says: "All things shall be pure unto you," that is, if you do not only bathe yourselves bodily, but believe in God, and are therefore pure inwardly, and do alms outwardly, all things shall be pure unto you. And show that also the right outward purity is in the works which God has commanded, and not in human statutes, as there were the same traitionos Uliarisaeorunr 2c., and as in our time is the sprinkling and sprinkling of holy water, the snow-white monastic garments, the differences of food, and the like.

(256) But the adversaries sophistically apply the signum universale, that is, the word "all," to one part alone, and say, All shall be pure unto you, if ye give alms 2c. As if one said, Andrew is there, therefore all the apostles are there. Therefore in the auteeec people, or preceding part of this saying, both are to remain with each other: Believe and give alms. For the whole mission, the whole ministry of Christ, depends on this; therefore he is there, that they should believe. Now when both these things are put together, faith and almsgiving, it follows that they are all pure; the heart by faith, the outward walk by good works. So the sermon is to be taken in its entirety, and not the one part turned around and interpreted, that the heart is cleansed from sins by our eleemosyna.

0257 There are also some that think that it is irony or mockery spoken against the Pharisees of Christ. As if to say, Yea, ye nobles, rob and steal, and afterward go and give alms, and ye shall soon be clean: so that Christ may somewhat bitterly and mockingly offend their Pharisaical hypocrisy. For though they were full of unbelief, covetousness, and all manner of wickedness, yet they kept their purification, and gave alms, and thought that they were pure and tender saints. The interpretation is not contrary to the text there.

(258) Now what is to be answered to other such sayings is easily deduced from this, which we have transfigured. For the rule lays down all sayings concerning good works, that apart from Christ they are of no account before God, but the heart must first have Christ, and believe that it pleases God for Christ's sake, not on account of its own works.

(259) The adversaries also make a number of scholastic arguments, which are easy to answer, if one knows what faith is. Experienced Christians speak much differently of faith than do the Sophists, as we have just said, that to believe is to trust in God's mercy, that he will be merciful for Christ's sake, without our merit; and that is to believe the article, "forgiveness of sin. This faith is not alone the historia know, which also devils know, therefore the school argument is easily dissolved, that they speak: The devils also believe, therefore faith does not make righteous. Yes, the devils know the history, but they do not believe in the forgiveness of sin.

260 For they say that to be righteous is obedience. Now to do works is obedience, and therefore works must make one righteous. To this, then, one should answer: To be righteous is such obedience as God accepts for it. Now God will not accept our obedience in works for righteousness, for it is not a heartfelt obedience, since no one keeps the law rightly. Therefore He has ordained another obedience, which He will accept for righteousness, namely, that we may know our disobedience, and trust that we please God for Christ's sake, not because of our obedience. Therefore, to be righteous here is to be pleasing to God, not because of our own obedience, but out of mercy for Christ's sake. Item, sin is hating God, therefore righteousness must love God. It is true that loving God is the righteousness of the law. But no one fulfills this law. Therefore the gospel teaches a new righteousness, that we please God for Christ's sake, though we do not fulfill the law, yet we ought to begin to do the law. Item, what is the difference between faith and hope? Answer: Hoping awaits future good and salvation from tribulation; believing receives present reconciliation, and cherishes in the heart that God has forgiven sin, and that he is now gracious to me. And this is a high service, which serves God by giving Him glory, and by keeping the mercy and promise so sure that he can receive and wait for all kinds of goods from Him without merit. And in this service the heart to be exercised and to increase; of this the mad sophists know nothing.

261 And to all this it is easy to understand what is to be thought of the rusrito eonälZni, when the adversaries invent that we are justified before God by love and our works. There they do not even remember faith, and instead of the mediator of Christ they put our works, our fulfillment of the law; this is not to be suffered in any way. For though we said above, Where the new birth is by the Spirit and grace, love also certainly follows: nevertheless the glory of Christ is not to be given to our works, but this is certain, that before and after, when we come to the gospel, we are justly esteemed for Christ's sake, and Christ remains the Mediator and Reconciler before than after, after than before, and through Christ we have access to God, not because we have kept the law and done much good, but that we so cheerfully, confidently build on grace, and so assuredly rely, that by grace we are justly esteemed before God for Christ's sake.

262 And this teacheth, preacheth, and confesseth the holy eternal Christian church, that we are saved through mercy, as we have said above from Jerome. Our righteousness is not based on our own merit, but on the mercy of God; and this mercy is obtained through faith.

263 But here let all men of understanding see what would follow from the doctrine of the adversaries. For if we hold that Christ alone has earned for us primum arutiuw, that is, the first grace (as they call it), and that afterwards we must first earn eternal life by our works, then the hearts or consciences will never be satisfied either at the hour of death or otherwise, will never be able to build on certain foundations, will never be certain whether God would be gracious to us. Thus their teaching leads the consciences without ceasing to vain heartache and finally to despair. For God's law is not a joke, which accuses consciences apart from Christ without ceasing, as Paul says [Rom. 4:15.], "The law provokes wrath." So then, when consciences feel God's judgment and have no certain comfort, they fall into despair.

264. Paul says [Rom. 14,23.]: "Everything that is not of faith is sin." But those can do nothing by faith, who then shall not receive a gracious God until they have fulfilled the law with their works. For they will always waver and doubt whether they have done enough works, whether they have fulfilled the law enough.

Yes, they will strongly feel and sense that they still owe the law; therefore, they will never think that they have a merciful God or that their prayer will be heard. For this reason, they can never love God rightly, nor do anything good for God, nor serve God rightly. For what are such hearts and consciences but hell itself, if there is nothing else in such hearts but doubting, despairing, grumbling, resentment, and hatred of God? And yet in their hatred they hypocritically call upon God, as the wicked king Saul did.

Here we may appeal to all Christian consciences, and to all those who have tried temptations. They must confess and say that such great uncertainty, such restlessness, such anxiety and fear, such terrible trembling and despair, result from such teaching of the adversaries, since they teach or think that we are justified before God by our works or the fulfillment of the law, which we do, and show us the wrong way to trust, not in the rich, blessed promises of grace, which are offered to us through the Mediator Christ, but in our miserable works.

266 Therefore this decree stands firm as a wall, even as a rock, that even though we have begun to do the law, we are not acceptable to God because of these works, but because of Christ through faith, and have peace with God. And God does not owe us eternal life for these works, but just as forgiveness of sins and righteousness are imputed to us for the sake of Christ, not for the sake of our works or the law, so also eternal life is offered to us, not for the sake of our works, nor for the sake of the law, but for the sake of Christ, together with righteousness, as Christ says [Jn. 6, 40.], "This is the will of the Father which hath sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, should have everlasting life." Item [Lv. 47.], "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life."

267 Now the adversaries are to be asked what counsel they give to the poor consciences at the hour of death? whether they put off the consciences, that they should go well, be saved, have a gracious God for their own merit, or out of God's grace and mercy for Christ's sake? For St. Peter, St. Paul and the like saints cannot boast that God owes them eternal life for their suffering, nor do they have anything to do with their works. but in the mercy promised in Christ.

268. Nor would it be possible for a saint, however great and high he may be, to remain or stand against the accusation of divine law, against the great power of the devil, against the terror of death, and finally against the despair and fear of hell, if he did not grasp the divine promise, the gospel, like a tree or branch in the great flood, in the strong, mighty river, under the waves and bulges of the fear of death, if he did not by faith hold to the word that proclaims grace, and thus without all works, without law, purely by grace, attain eternal life. For this doctrine alone sustains the Christian conscience in temptations and fears of death; of which the adversaries know nothing, and speak of it as the blind speak of paint.

0269 But here they will say, If by pure mercy we shall be saved, what difference is there between them that are saved, and them that are not saved? If there is no merit, there is no difference between the evil and the good, and it follows that they will be saved at the same time. This argument moved the scholastics to invent the risritum eonäiAni. For there must be a difference between them that are saved and them that are damned.

270 But as to the first, we say that eternal life belongs to those whom God esteems righteous, and if they are esteemed righteous, they have thereby become God's children and Christ's fellow heirs, as Paul says to the Romans, v. 30, 8: "Whom he hath justified, them he hath also glorified. Therefore no one is saved, except those who believe the gospel. But as our reconciliation with God is uncertain, if it should stand on our works, and not on God's gracious promise, which cannot fail, so also all that we wait for by hope would be uncertain, if it should be built on our merit and works. For God's law accuses the conscience without ceasing, and feel nothing else in the heart, but this voice out of the cloud and flames of fire, Deut. 5, v. 6 ff: "I am the Lord thy God, this shalt thou do", this thou owest, this I will have 2c. And no conscience can have rest for a moment, if the law and Moses press in the heart, before it takes hold of Christ by faith. Neither can it rightly hope for eternal life, unless it first come to rest 1). For a conscience, that doubts, that flees from God, that despairs, that cannot hope. But now the hope of eternal life must be sure. So that it may not waver, but be sure, we must believe that we have eternal life, not by our works or merit, but by pure grace through faith in Christ.

1) Müller and the old editions: "to rest".

(271) In the courts of the world, and in the seats of judgment, there are two things: grace and judgment. Law is certain by law and judgment; mercy is uncertain. Here before God it is a different matter, for grace and mercy are promised by a certain word, and the gospel is the word that gives us to believe that God is gracious to us and wants to make us blessed for Christ's sake, as the text reads: "God did not send his Son into the world to judge the world, but that the world might be saved through him. He that believeth in him shall not be judged" [John 3:17].

272 For as often as mercy is spoken of, it is to be understood that faith is required, and that faith which makes the difference between them that are saved and them that are damned, between them that are worthy and them that are unworthy. For eternal life is promised to none but those who are reconciled in Christ. But faith reconciles and makes us righteous before God, if and when we take hold of the promise through faith. And all through life we are to pray to God, and make every effort to obtain faith and to increase in faith. For, as was said above, faith is where repentance is, and is not in those who walk according to the flesh. This same faith must grow and increase throughout life, even through all kinds of trials. And they that obtain faith are born again, that they may live again, and do good works.

273 As we say then, that true repentance shall continue throughout life; so we say also, that good works and fruits of faith shall continue throughout life; though our works shall never be so precious as to equal the treasure of Christ, or to merit eternal life. As Christ also saith [Luc. 17:10], "When ye have done all, say, We are unprofitable servants." And St. Bernard says rightly, "It is necessary and you must first believe that you cannot have forgiveness of sin except by the grace of God, and then that you cannot have or do any other good work hereafter unless God gives it to you. Finally, that you cannot earn eternal life by any works if God does not give it to you.

...that the same is not given without merit. And soon after: Let no man deceive himself, for if thou wouldst consider the matter aright, thou wouldst no doubt find that with ten thousand thou canst not meet him who meets thee with twenty thousand 2c. These are strong sayings of St. Bernhardt, they would like to believe the same, if they did not want to believe us.

274. Therefore, that the hearts may have a right certain comfort and hope, we point them, as Paul does, to the divine promise of grace in Christ, and teach that one must believe that God does not give us eternal life for our works, not for the fulfillment of the law, but for the sake of Christ, as John the Apostle says in his epistle: "He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son does not have life" [1 John 5:12]. 5, 12.]

(275) Here the adversaries have well shown their great art, and have perverted the saying of Christ, (Luc. 17:10), "When ye have done all things, then say, We are unprofitable servants." Dragging him from works to faith, saying, Rather, if we believe all things, we are unprofitable servants. These are the shameful sophists, who so pervert the comforting doctrine of faith. Say, ye asses, if a man lie at the point of death, and feel that he hath no work sufficient for the judgment of God, and can trust in no work, what will ye counsel him? Will ye also say unto him, Though thou believest, yet art thou a useless servant, and wilt not help thee? Then the poor conscience must fall into despair, if it does not know that the gospel requires faith for this very reason, because we are unprofitable servants, and have no merit.

276 Therefore beware of the sophists, who thus blaspheme the words of Christ. For it followeth not, that works profit not, neither doth faith profit. We must give the rough asses a rough example. It does not follow that the penny does not help, and therefore the florin does not help either. Therefore, as the florin is much higher and stronger than the penny, so it must be understood that faith is much higher and stronger than works. Not that faith helps because of its worthiness, but because it trusts in God's promise and mercy. Faith is strong, not because of its worthiness, but because of the divine promise. And therefore Christ here rejects trust in one's own works, for they cannot help. On the other hand, he does not reject trust in God's promise; indeed, he demands the same trust in God's promise.

Because we are unprofitable servants, and works cannot help us.

(277) Therefore the wicked unjustly draw the words of Christ from confidence in their own worthiness to confidence in divine promise...) Thus their sophistry is clearly laid and dissolved. May the Lord Christ soon put to shame the sophists who thus tear up his holy word. Amen.

278 But the adversaries would prove that we merit eternal life by works, and that eternal life is called a reward. We want to answer this briefly and correctly.

Paul calls eternal life a gift and a present [Eph 2:8], because if we are justified by faith we become sons of God and joint heirs with Christ. But in another place it is written: "Your reward is abundant in heaven" [Matth.5,12. Luc. 6,35.]. If therefore the adversaries think that this is contrary to one another, let them bring it to pass. They do as they do, they leave out the word cloniE, and leave out the main part, how we become righteous before God, item, that Christ always remains the mediator, and then they pick out the word msrsss or reward, and interpret it to their liking in the worst way, not only to speak against the Scriptures, but also against common custom, and conclude thus: There it is written: your reward 2c., therefore our works are so worthy that we thereby earn eternal life. This is even a new dialectic, since we find the single word "reward", therefore our works are sufficient for the law, therefore we are pleasing to God through our works, we do not need any grace nor any mediator of Christ. Our good works are the treasure by which eternal life is purchased and obtained, therefore by our good works we can keep the first highest commandment of God and the whole law. Further, we can also do opsru 8iix>srsroMtionis, that is, other works and more than the law requires. Therefore the monks, if they do more than they owe, have other, superfluous merit; which they may give to others, or share for money, and may, as the new gods, institute a new sacrament of the gift, that they may testify that they have sold and shared their merits with those, as the barefoot monks and other orders have done impudently, that they have put on the dead bodies of religious caps. These are fine strong reasons, which

1) That is, the words which Christ spake of his own worthiness, unrighteously on trust of divine promise. they can all spin "wages" out of the one syllable, so that they obscure Christ and the faith.

280 But we do not quarrel about the word reward, but about these great, high, most important things, namely, where Christian hearts should seek right certain consolation. Whether our works can bring our consciences to rest or peace. Whether we ought to think that our works are worthy of eternal life, or whether it is given for Christ's sake. These are the proper questions in these matters; if consciences are not rightly informed, they can have no certain comfort.

281 But we have said clearly enough that good works do not fulfill the law, that we need God's mercy, and that we become pleasing to God through faith, and that good works, however delicious they may be, even if they were St. Paul's works themselves, cannot make a conscience at rest. From all this it follows that we should believe that we attain eternal life through Christ by grace, not because of works or the law.

0282 But what shall we say of the reward which the scripture commemorates? In the first place, if we said that eternal life is called a reward because it belongs to the believers in Christ by divine promise, we would be right. But the Scriptures call eternal life a reward, not that God is obligated to give eternal life for works, but that, since eternal life is otherwise given for other reasons, our works and tribulations are nevertheless rewarded with it, even though the treasure is so great that God would not owe it to us for works. Just as the inheritance or all the goods of a father are given to the son, and find a rich comparison and reward for his obedience; but still he does not receive the inheritance because of his merit, but that the father grants it to him as a father 2c.

0283 Therefore it is sufficient that eternal life should be called a reward, that the afflictions which we suffer, and the works of love which we do, should be recompensed thereby; though it be not merited thereby. For there are two kinds of recompense: one that is due, and the other that is not due. As when Caesar gives a servant a principality, the servant's labor is recompensed, and yet the labor is not worthy of the principality, but the servant confesses that it is a fief. So God does not owe us eternal life for works, but nevertheless, if He gives it for Christ's sake, He will give it to us.

the faithful, our suffering and our work will be recompensed.

284 Further, we say that good works are truly meritorious and meritorious, not that they should merit forgiveness of sins or make us righteous before God, for they do not please God; they are done by those whose sins have already been forgiven. Neither are they worthy of eternal life, but they merit other gifts that are given in this life and after this life, for God consumes many gifts until that life, and after this life God will honor the saints. For here in this life he will crucify and kill the old Adam with all manner of trials and tribulations.

0285 And to this belongs the saying of Paul, Every man shall receive reward according to his work. For the blessed shall have reward, one higher than another. Such is the difference in merit, which is pleasing to God, and is merit, because those who do good works, whom God has adopted as children and heirs, have merit of their own and peculiar, as a child before another.

The adversaries also use other sayings to prove that works are worthy of eternal life than these: Paul says [Rom. 2, 6.], "He will give to every one according to his works." Item, John 5:29. "They that have done good shall rise again unto the resurrection of life." Item, Matt. 25:35: "I have hungered, and ye have fed me." Answer: All these sayings which praise works we are to understand according to the rule which I have set above, namely, that works apart from Christ are not pleasing to God, and that in no way are we to exclude the Mediator Christ. Therefore, when the text says that eternal life is given to those who have done good, it indicates that it is given to those who have been justified beforehand through faith in Christ. For God is not pleased with good works, except by faith, by which they believe that they are pleasing to God for Christ's sake; and those who have thus been justified by faith certainly bring forth good works and good fruits, as the text says, "I hungered, and ye fed me." 2c. Here we must confess that Christ does not understand works alone, but wants to have the heart that thinks rightly of God and believes that it pleases God through mercy. Thus Christ teaches that eternal life is given to the righteous, as Christ says [v. 46]: "The righteous shall enter into eternal life, And yet name the fruits above, that we may learn that righteousness and faith are not hypocrisy, but a new life, whereupon good works must follow.

(287) We do not seek here an unnecessary subtlety, but there is great reason why one must have a certain report in these matters. For soon, if one allows the adversaries to say that works merit eternal life, they spin this clumsy doctrine from it, that we are able to keep God's law, that we do not need mercy, that we are righteous before God, that is, pleasing to God by our works, not for Christ's sake, that we can also do opera supererogationis, and more than the law requires. So then the whole doctrine of faith is altogether suppressed. But if a Christian church is to be and remain, the pure doctrine of Christ, of the righteousness of faith, must always be preserved. Therefore we must challenge such great Pharisaical errors, that we may save the name of Christ, and the glory of the gospel and of Christ, and preserve a right, constant, certain consolation to Christian hearts. For how is it possible for a heart or conscience to come to rest, or to hope for salvation, if in temptations and fears of death our works become so much dust before God's judgment and eyes, unless it becomes certain through faith that we are saved by grace for Christ's sake, not for our works, for our fulfillment of the law?

288 And of course St. Lawrence, when he lay on the grate and was martyred for Christ's sake, was not so minded that his work would fully and purely fulfill God's law, that he would be without sin, that he would not need the mediator of Christ or grace. Of course he left it at the word of the prophet David: "Thou wilt not go into judgment, O Lord, with thy servant" 2c. [Ps. 143:2.]

Neither did St. Bernard boast that his works were worthy of eternal life, when he said, Perdit6 vixi, I have lived sinfully 2c. But he confidently rises again, holds to the promise of grace, and believes that for Christ's sake he has forgiveness of sins and eternal life, as the Psalm says, "Blessed are they whose sins are forgiven" [Ps. 32:1], and Paul to the Romans on the 4th, v. 6: "This is man's blessedness, when righteousness is imputed to him without works." So Paul says that he is blessed to whom righteousness is imputed through faith in Christ, though he has done no good work.

This is the true and constant consolation, which consists in temptations, so that hearts and consciences may be strengthened and comforted, namely, that for Christ's sake, through faith, we are given forgiveness of sin, righteousness, and eternal life. If therefore the sayings which speak of works are so understood that they include faith, they are not at all contrary to this doctrine. And faith must always be understood, so that we do not exclude the mediator Christ. But faith is followed by the fulfillment of the law, for the Holy Spirit is there, who makes a new life. That is enough of this article.

Articles VII and VIII. (IV.) Of the Church.

290) The seventh article of our confession, where we say that the Christian church is the assembly of the saints, the adversaries condemn, and introduce a great deal of talk, that the wicked or ungodly should not be separated from the church, because John the Baptist compares the church to a threshing-floor, in which grain and chaff lie together [Matth. 3, 12.], item [Cap. 13, 47.], Christ compares the church to a net, in which evil and good fish are found.

291 Then we see that it is true, as they say, that one cannot speak so plainly, evil tongues can pervert it. For this very reason, and for this cause, we have added the eighth article, that no one may think as if we would separate the wicked and hypocrites from the outward society of Christians or the church, or as if our opinion were that the sacraments, when administered by the ungodly, are without power or effect.

292 Therefore this false, unjust interpretation must not be answered at length; the eighth article sufficiently excuses us. We also confess and say that the hypocrites and wicked may also be members of the church, in outward communion of name and offices, and that the sacraments may be rightly received from the wicked, especially if they are not banned. And the sacraments are not therefore without power or effect, that they are administered by ungodly men. For Paul also prophesied that Antichrist would sit in the temple of God, rule and reign in the church, and have rule and office therein [2 Thess. 2:4].

293 But the Christian church does not stand alone in the company of outward signs, but stands especially in communion inwardly of the eternal goods in the heart, as, of the Holy Spirit, of faith, of the fear and love of God. And This church also has outward signs by which it is known, namely, where God's word is pure, where the sacraments are administered according to the same, there is certainly the church, there are Christians, and this church alone is called Christ's body in Scripture. For Christ is the head of it, and sanctifieth and strengtheneth it by his Spirit, as Paul saith unto the Ephesians in 1 Peter 22: "And hath made him the head of the church, which is his body, and the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Therefore in whom Christ by his Spirit worketh nothing, they find not members of Christ. And this also the adversaries confess, that the wicked alone are dead members of the church.

294 Therefore I am not sufficiently astonished, why they dispute our resolution concerning the church, when we speak of the living members of the church; and we have said nothing new. For Paul, speaking to the Ephesians in the 5th chapter, v. 23, says at once what the church is, and also sets forth the outward signs, namely, the gospel and the sacraments. For thus he saith, Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it, and purify it with the bath of water in the word, that he might fashion it unto himself, a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, but that it should be holy and blameless. 2c.

295 This saying of the apostle we have put very nearly from word to word in our confession, and so we also confess in our holy symbol and faith, "I believe a holy Christian church." There we say that the church is holy; but the ungodly and the wicked cannot be the holy church. In our faith it is soon followed by, "The communion of saints," which still more clearly and distinctly defines what the church is called, namely, the multitude and the congregation which confess one gospel, have the same knowledge of Christ, and have one Spirit which rejuvenates, sanctifies, and governs their hearts.

(296) And the article of the catholic or common church, which is sent together from every nation under the sun, is quite comforting and highly necessary. For the multitude of the wicked is much greater, even innumerable, who despise the word, bitterly hate it, and persecute it to the utmost, as they find Turks, Mahometists, other tyrants, heretics, and so on. In addition, the right doctrine and church are often suppressed and lost, as has happened under the papacy, as if there were no church, and can often be seen as if it had even perished.

On the other hand, that we may be sure, not doubt, but firmly and completely believe that a Christian church will actually be and remain on earth until the end of the world, that we also do not doubt at all that a Christian church lives and is on earth, which is Christ's bride, although the ungodly multitude is more and greater, that even the Lord Christ here on earth in the multitude which is called the church, works daily, forgiving sin, answering prayer daily, daily in temptations with rich, strong consolation refreshing his own, and always delivering, so the consoling article is set in faith: "I believe a catholic, common Christian church," so that no one may think that the church, like another outward police, is bound to this or that country, kingdom, or city, as the pope of Rome wants to say, but that certainly remains true, that the multitude and the people are the true church, who now and then in the world, from the going out of the sun to the going down, truly believe in Christ, who then have one gospel, one Christ, one baptism and sacrament, and are ruled by one Holy Spirit, although they have different ceremonies.

297 For even in the decree of Gratian the gloss clearly says that this word "church" is to be taken to mean the evil and the good. Item, that the wicked are in the church by name alone, not by works; but the good are both in it by name and works. And on this opinion many sayings were found among the fathers. For Jerome says, "If any man be a sinner, and lie in sins, and be defiled, he cannot be called a member of the church, nor be in the kingdom of Christ.

298 Although the wicked and ungodly hypocrites keep company with the true church in outward signs, names, and offices, yet if we would speak truly of what the church is, we must speak of this church, which is called the body of Christ, and has fellowship not only in outward signs, but has goods in the heart, the Holy Ghost and faith.

299 For it is necessary to know truly by what means we become members of Christ, and what makes us living members of the church. For if we should say that the church is only an outward police, like other regiments, wherein are the evil and the good, 2c. no man will learn from it, nor understand, that Christ's kingdom is spiritual, as it is, wherein Christ inwardly governs, strengthens, comforts, and distributes the Holy Ghost and divers spiritual gifts to the hearts; but it will be thought to be a

The outward manner, the certain order of certain ceremonies and services. What difference would there be between the people of the law and the church, if the church were only an outward police force? Now Paul thus distinguishes the church from the Jews, saying that the church is a spiritual people, that is, such a people as is not only distinguished from the Gentiles in police and civil character, but a true people of God, enlightened in heart, and born again by the Holy Spirit. Item, in the Jewish people, all those who were Jews by nature, and born of Abraham's seed, had, above the promise of spiritual goods in Christ, also much promise of bodily goods, as of the kingdom 2c. And because of the divine promise even the wicked among them were called God's people. For God had separated the physical seed of Abrahah and all born Jews from other Gentiles by the same physical promises, and these wicked and evil ones were not the true people of God, nor did they please God. But the gospel preached in the church does not only bring with it the shadow of eternal goods, but every right Christian becomes partaker here on earth of the eternal goods themselves, also of eternal comfort, of eternal life and the Holy Spirit, and of the righteousness that is of God, 1) until he is fully saved there.

(300) Therefore they only, according to the gospel, are the people of God, who have received spiritual things, the Holy Ghost; and this church is the kingdom of Christ, distinct from the kingdom of the devil. For it is certain that all the ungodly are in the power of the devil and are members of his kingdom, as Paul says to the Ephesians [Cap. 2, 2.] that the devil reigns powerfully in the children of unbelief. And Christ says [John 8:44.] to the Pharisees (who were the holiest, and also had the name that they were God's people and the church, who also did their sacrifice): "Ye are of your father the devil."

031 Therefore the true church is the kingdom of Christ, that is, the assembly of all saints. For the ungodly are not ruled by the Spirit of Christ. But what need is there of many words in so clear a public matter? Only the adversaries contradict the bright truth. If the church, which is certainly the kingdom of Christ and of God, be distinguished from the kingdom of the devil, then can it be distinguished?

1) So the Jenaer; "theilhaftig" is missing in J. T. Müller.

he ungodly, who are in the devil's kingdom, are never the church, though in this life, because the kingdom of Christ is not yet revealed, they are among the true Christians and in the church, in which they also have a teaching office and other offices. And the ungodly are therefore in the meantime not a part of the kingdom of Christ, because it is not yet revealed. For the true kingdom of Christ, the true company of Christ, are and always will be those whom God's Spirit has enlightened, strengthened, and governed, even though it has not yet been revealed to the world, but is hidden under the cross. Just as it is and always remains One Christ, who was crucified for time, and now reigns and rules in heaven in eternal glory.

302 And there the parables of Christ rhyme, when he saith plainly, Matt. 13:38, 39, that the good seed are the children of the kingdom, the tares are the children of the devil; the field is the world, not the church. So also the word of John is to be understood, when he says Matth. 3, 12: "He will sweep his threshing floor, and gather the wheat into his sheds, but he will burn up the chaff." There he speaks of the whole Jewish people, and says that the right church should be separated from the people. The same saying is more contrary to the adversaries than for them, for it clearly indicates how the right, believing, spiritual people should be separated from the physical Israel. And since Christ says [Matt. 25:1, 13, 47], "The kingdom of heaven is like a net," item, "like the ten virgins," he does not want the wicked to be the church, but teaches how the church appears in this world. Therefore he saith, she is like unto these 2c., that is, as in the heap of fishes the good and the bad lie one with another, so the church is hid here among the great multitude and multitude of the wicked, and would that the pious should not be offended. That we may know that the word and the sacraments are not therefore without power, though the ungodly preach or administer the sacraments. And so Christ teaches us that the ungodly, though they may be in the church according to outward society, are not members of Christ, not the true church, for they find members of the devil.

0303 And we speak not of a fictitious church, which is nowhere to be found; but we say and know for a fact that this church, wherein saints dwell, is and abideth truly on the earth, that there be some children of God now and then in all the world, in all manner of kingdoms, and islands, and countries, and cities, from the going forth of the sun even unto the going down of the same, which have rightly known Christ and the gospel, and say that the same are the children of God.

Church has these outward signs, the preaching office or gospel and the sacraments.

304 And this same church is actually, as St. Paul says [1 Tim. 3:15], a pillar of the truth, because it keeps the pure gospel, the right foundation; and as St. Paul says [1 Cor. 3:11], "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Christ." Now Christians are built upon this foundation.

055 And though in the multitude which is built upon the right foundation, that is, Christ and the faith, there be many weak ones, which build upon such foundation straw and hay, [1 Cor. 3:12] that is, some human thoughts and opinions, with which they neither overthrow nor reject the foundation, which is Christ. For which cause they are yet Christians, and are forgiven such faults, and are also, if need be, enlightened and better instructed. So we see in the fathers that they also sometimes built straw and hay upon the foundation, but they did not overthrow the foundation with it.

030 But many articles of our adversaries cast down the right ground, the knowledge of Christ, and faith. For they reject and condemn the high and greatest article, where we say that by faith alone, without all works, we obtain forgiveness of sins through Christ. On the other hand, they teach to trust in our works to merit forgiveness of sins, and instead of Christ they substitute their works, orders, and masses, just as the Jews, Gentiles, and Turks intend to be saved by their own works. Item, they teach that the sacraments make pious ex opere operato, without faith. Whoever does not consider faith necessary has already lost Christ. Item, they establish the service of saints, call them instead of Christ, as mediators 2c.

307. But as there are clear promises of God in the Scriptures, that the church shall always have the Holy Spirit, so there are also serious warnings in the Scriptures, that false teachers and wolves will creep in beside the right preachers. But this is actually the Christian church that has the Holy Spirit. The wolves and false teachers, though they rage in the church and do harm, are not the church or the kingdom of Christ, as Lyra also testifies when he says, "The true church does not stand on prelates because of their authority, for many of high rank, princes, and bishops, even many of low rank, have fallen away from the faith. Therefore the church stands on those in whom is a right knowledge of Christ, a right confession and profession of faith and truth.

308 Now in our Confession we have said nothing else in substance, but just that which Lyra thus says in clear words, that he could not speak more clearly. But the adversaries would like to have a new Roman definition of the church, that we should say: The church is the supreme monarchy, the greatest, most powerful sovereignty in the whole world, in which the Roman Pontiff, as the head of the church, is quite powerful in all high and low things and affairs, temporal and spiritual, as he wills and may think; of which power (he uses, abuses as he wills) no one may dispute, speak, or murmur. Item: in which church the pope has power to make articles of faith, to establish all kinds of worship, to alter, pervert, and interpret the holy scriptures according to all his pleasure, against all divine laws, against his own decree, against all imperial rights, how often, how much, and when it pleases him, to sell liberty and dispensation for money. From whom the Roman emperor, all kings, princes, and potentates are obliged to receive their royal crown, their glory, and their titles, as from the governor of Christ. Therefore the pope is an earthly god, a supreme majesty, and alone the most powerful lord in all the world, over all kingdoms, over all lands and people, over all goods, spiritual and temporal, and thus has in his hand everything, both temporal and spiritual sword. This definition, which does not apply at all to the true church, but does apply to the Roman Pontiff's nature, is not only found in the books of the canonists, but Daniel the Prophet paints the Antichrist in this way.

309 If we should make such a definition, and say that the church is such a glory as the pope's nature is, we might not have so ungracious judges. For there are books of the adversaries in the day, wherein the authority of the pope is too much exalted; and no man punisheth them. But we must stand our ground, because we praise and exalt Christ's benefits, and write and preach the clear words and teachings of the apostles, namely, that we obtain forgiveness of sin through faith in Jesus Christ, and not through hypocrisy or fictitious worship, which the pope has done innumerable. But Christ and the prophets and apostles write and speak very differently about what the church of Christ is, and the kingdom of the pope does not rhyme at all with this church, but looks very unlike it.

310 Therefore the sayings which speak of the true church are not to be applied to the popes or bishops, namely, that they are pillars of truth.

that they cannot be mistaken. For how many can be found, or how many have been found, among bishops, popes, etc., who have accepted the gospel with earnestness and warmth, or who have thought it worth their while to read a leaf or a letter in it? It is well known, alas, that there are many examples of them in French-speaking countries and elsewhere, who ridicule the whole religion, Christ, and the gospel, and openly hold them up to ridicule. And if they let them like anything, they let them like that which is according to human reason; the rest they regard as fables.

311 Therefore we say and conclude, according to the holy scriptures, that the true Christian church is the multitude now and then in the world of them that truly believe the gospel of Christ, and have the Holy Ghost. And yet we also confess that, as long as this life lasts on earth, there are many hypocrites and wicked men in the church, among the true Christians, who are also members of the church, as far as outward signs are concerned. For they have offices in the church, preach, administer the sacraments, and bear the title and name of Christians. And the sacraments, baptism 2c., are not therefore without effect or power, that they are administered by unworthy and ungodly persons. For for the sake of the church's profession such are there, not for their own persons, but as Christ, as Christ testifieth [Luc. 10:16.], "He that heareth you heareth me." So also Judas is sent to preach. When therefore the ungodly preach and administer the sacraments, they administer them in Christ's stead. And this the word of Christ teacheth us, that in such a case we should not suffer the unworthiness of ministers to deceive us.

312 But of this we have spoken plainly enough in our Confession, namely, that we hold not with the Donatists and Vilefists, who held that those sin who receive the sacraments in the church from ungodly ministers. This, we observe, shall be sufficient to protect and preserve the definition we have given of what the church is; and since the true church is called Christ's body in the Scriptures, it is not possible to speak of it otherwise than as we have spoken of it.

313 For it is ever certain that the hypocrites and the ungodly cannot be the body of Christ, but belong to the kingdom of the devil, who has taken them captive, and drives them where he will. All this is quite public, and so plain that [it] none may deny. But if the adversaries continue in their calumnies, they shall be answered further.

314 The adversaries also condemn this part of the seventh article, because we have said that it is enough for the unity of the church that one gospel and one sacrament should be administered, and that it is not necessary that the statutes of men should be uniform everywhere. These things therefore admit that it is not necessary for the unity of the church, that trackitoriss partivulrMS be equal, but that trnckitoriss univsr8ul68 be equal, that is necessary for the true unity of the church.

(315) This is a good rough affirmation. We say that those who believe in one Christ are called one church. Have one gospel, one spirit, one faith, one sacrament. And so we speak of spiritual unity, without which faith and Christianity cannot exist. Now to this same unity we say, that it is not necessary that the statutes of men, whether they be univsr8uls8 or pnrteiu1ar68, should be the same everywhere. For the righteousness that is before God, which comes by faith, is not bound to outward ceremonies or to the statutes of men. For faith is a light in the heart that renews the heart and makes it alive. Outward statutes or ceremonies, whether universal or particular, are of little help.

(316) And it was no small cause that we have set this article. For many a great error and foolish opinion about the statutes has broken out in the church. Some have thought that Christian holiness and faith are not valid before God without such statutes of men, and that no one can be a Christian if he keeps such rules, when they are nothing more than external ordinances, which are often different in one place than in another by chance, and often for reasons, just as in secular government one city has different customs than another. In history, too, it has been known for one church to banish another for such reasons as the observance of Easter, the images, and the like.

317 Therefore the inexperienced have not held otherwise, except that by such ceremonies one should become godly before God, and that no man could be a Christian without such services and ceremonies. For there are still many clumsy books of the Summists and others before our eyes.

318 But as the unity of the church is not divided by whether in one country the days are naturally longer or shorter in one place than in another, so we hold also that the unity of the church is not divided by whether such statutes of men have this order in one place, and that order in another. Although it may well be that the universal ceremonies be kept uniform for the sake of unity and good order, as we also keep the mass, the Sunday celebration, and the other high celebrations in our churches.

(319) And we accept all good and useful statutes of men, especially those which serve for a fine outward discipline of the youth and of the people. But here the question is not whether the statutes of men are to be kept for the sake of outward discipline, for the sake of peace. There is a much different question, namely, whether the keeping of such ordinances is a service of God by which one makes atonement for God, and that without such ordinances no one may be righteous before God. This is the main question, and when it is finally answered, it must be clearly judged whether it means to be of one mind or of one accord with the church, if we all keep such statutes at the same time.

320 For if such ordinances of men be not a necessary service, it followeth that some may be pious, holy, righteous, children of God, and Christians, who have not the ceremonies which are in use in other churches. As an equivalent, if it be said that the wearing of German and French garments is not a necessary service, it follows that some may be righteous, holy, and in the church of Christ, who do not wear German or French garments. Paul also teaches clearly, Col. 2:16, 17: "Let no man therefore make you conscience of meat, or drink, or certain feasts, or new moons, or sabbaths, which are the shadow of things to come; but the body itself is in Christ." Item, v. 20-23: "If ye then be dead with Christ unto the statutes of the world, why then be ye entangled with statutes, as though ye lived yet in the world? Which say, Thou shalt not touch this, thou shalt not taste that, thou shalt not touch that; which yet are all consumed under the hands, and are the commandments and doctrines of men, which have a semblance of wisdom through self-chosen spirituality and humility."

321 For this is Paul's opinion: Faith in the heart, by which we become godly, is a spiritual thing, and light in the heart, by which we are renewed, and gain other mind and courage. But the ordinances of men are not such a living light and power of the Holy Spirit in the heart; they are not eternal, therefore they do not make life eternal, but are outward, bodily exercises which do not change the heart. Therefore it is not to be held that they are necessary for the righteousness that is valid before God. Paul also speaks of this opinion in Romans 14:17, 18: "The kingdom of God is not food and drink.

but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." But it is not necessary to give many sayings here, since the whole Bible is full of them, and we have also given many in our Confession in the last articles, so we will also deal with this main question hereafter, namely, whether such ordinances of men are a service of God, which is necessary for salvation? since we want to speak more abundantly and more about this matter.

322 The adversaries say that therefore such statutes, especially the universal ceremonies, must be kept, because it is probable that they were grounded upon us by the apostles. O how great, holy, excellent, apostolic people, how pious and spiritual they have become! The statutes and ceremonies which they say were established by the apostles they are willing to keep, and the apostles' doctrine and plain words they are unwilling to keep. But we say, and know that it is right.

323 Thus, and not otherwise, ought all statutes to be taught, judged, and spoken of, as the apostles themselves have taught them in their writings. The apostles, however, fight in the strongest and most vehement manner everywhere, not only against those who would exalt the statutes of men, but also against those who would regard the divine law, the ceremonies of circumcision, 2c. as necessary to salvation.

324 The apostles in no way intended to lay such a burden on the consciences, that such ordinances of certain days, of fasting, of food, and the like, should be sinful, if they were not kept. And that is more, Paul clearly calls such doctrine "the doctrine of devils" [2 Tim. 4:1]. Therefore, what the apostles held to be good and right in this, must be sought from their clear writings, and not be shown by examples alone. They kept a number of certain days, not that they needed to be righteous and just before God, but that the people might know when they were to come together. They also kept certain customs and ceremonies, as a regular reading of the Bible, when they came together 2c. Also, in the beginning of the church, the Jews, when they became Christians, kept much of their Jewish feasts and ceremonies, which the apostles afterwards directed to the histories of the Gospel. So our Easter is derived from the Jews' Easter, and our Pentecost from the Jews' Pentecost; and the apostles not only with doctrines, but also by such feasts, wished to inherit from history the knowledge of Christ, and the great treasure to their posterity.

325 If then such ceremonies and the like are necessary to salvation, why have they after this Have the bishops changed much in it? For, if they are appointed by God's command, no man has had power to change them.

326 Before the Council of Nicaea, Easter was kept at a different time in one place than in another, and the disparity did no harm to the faith or to Christian unity. After this, the Easter day was diligently changed, so that our Easter day should not coincide with the Jews' Easter day. But the apostles commanded that Easter should be kept in the churches at the same time as the brethren who were converted from Judaism kept it. Therefore some bishoprics and peoples, even after the Council of Nicaea, were adamant that Easter Day should be kept at the same time as the Jewish Easter Day. But the apostles, in their decree, did not wish to impose such a burden on the churches as if it were necessary for salvation, as the clear words of their decree indicate. For they express it in clear words, that no one should be concerned whether the brethren who keep Easter Day 2c. do not actually reckon the time. For Epiphanius reminds us of the words of the apostles, from which every man of understanding clearly perceives that the apostles would have the people rejected from error, lest any man should be conscience-stricken about holidays, certain times 2c. For they clearly state that one should not be very concerned about whether one has already erred in the reckoning of Easter Day. I could bring up countless such things from the histories, and show even more clearly that such inequality in outward statutes does not separate or separate anyone from the common Christian church.

327 The adversaries do not understand at all what faith is, what the kingdom of Christ is, who teach that the unity of the Christian church is found in the statutes which speak of food, of days, of clothing, and such like things, which God has not commanded. But here every one may see and perceive how devout and exceedingly holy the adversaries are. For if universal ordinances are necessary, and are not to be changed, who commanded them to change the ordinance of the Lord's Supper of Christ? which is not a human ordinance, but a divine ordinance. But of this we shall hereafter speak more particularly.

328 The eighth article the adversaries leave entirely to their liking, because we say that hypocrites and ungodly men are also found in the church, and that the sacraments are not without power because they are administered by hypocrites. For they minister in Christ's stead, and not for their person, as it is said, "He that heareth you heareth me" [Luc. 10:16.]. But let not false teachers be accepted or heard, for the same are no longer in Christ's stead, but are antichrists, and Christ clearly commanded of them [Matt. 7:15.], "Beware of false prophets." And Paul to the Galatians [Cap. 1, 8.], "Whosoever shall preach any other gospel unto you, let him be accursed."

329 As for the priests' own lives, Christ has admonished us in the parables of the church, that we should not cause schism or separation, unless the priests or the people everywhere live purely Christian lives, as the Donatists have done. But those who for this reason in some places have caused schism and separation by pretending that the priests are not allowed to have goods or possessions, we consider to be rebellious. For to have goods of one's own is a worldly order. But Christians may use all kinds of worldly things as freely as they use air, food, drink, and common light. For just as the heavens, the earth, the sun, the moon, and the stars are God's order and are preserved by God, so the police and everything that belongs to the police are God's order and are preserved and protected by God against the devil.

Article IX. Of Baptism.

(330) The ninth article is also acceptable to them, since we confess that baptism is necessary for salvation, and that the baptism of young children is not in vain, but necessary and blessed. And because the Gospel is preached among us purely and with all diligence, we also have (praise God!) the great benefit and blessed fruit of not having Anabaptists break into our churches. For our people are (praise God!) instructed by God's Word against the godless, seditious mobs of these murderous evil-doers. And even though we have curbed and condemned many other errors of the Anabaptists, we have especially contended against them and maintained that infant baptism is not useless.

331 For it is quite certain that the divine promises of the graces of the Holy Ghost concern not only the aged, but also the children. Now the promises do not concern those who are outside the church of Christ, since there is neither gospel nor sacrament. For the kingdom of Christ is nowhere, except where the word of God and the sacraments are.

(332) Therefore it is also Christian and necessary to baptize infants, that they may be made partakers of the gospel, of the promise of salvation and grace, as Christ commanded, Go, baptize all the Gentiles (Matt. 28:19). As grace and salvation are offered to them in Christ, so baptism is offered to them, both male and female, boys and young children. It certainly follows that young children may and should be baptized, for in and with baptism common grace and the treasure of the gospel are offered to them.

333 Secondly, it is in the day that God the Lord pleases him to baptize young children. Therefore the Anabaptists teach wrongly, condemning this baptism. But that God is pleased with the baptism of young children, he shows by the fact that he has given the Holy Spirit to many who were baptized in childhood, for there have been many holy people in the church who were baptized in no other way.

Article X. Of the Holy Communion.

(334) The tenth article the adversaries do not dispute, wherein we confess that the body and blood of our Lord Christ are truly present in the supper of Christ, and are presented and taken with the visible things, bread and wine, as has hitherto been held in the church, as the Greek canons also testify. And Cyril says that Christ is bodily presented and given to us in the Lord's Supper, for thus he says: "We do not deny that we are spiritually united to Christ through right faith and pure love. But that we should have no union at all with him according to the flesh, we say no to. And this is also contrary to the Scriptures. For who can doubt that Christ also is the vine, and we the branches, that we have juice and life from him? Hear how Paul saith [1 Cor. 10:17.], "We are all one body in Christ: though ours be many, yet in him we are one; for we all partake of one bread." Thinkest thou that we know not the power of the divine blessing in the Lord's Supper? For when this is done, it makes Christ also dwell in us bodily by the partaking of the flesh and body of Christ. Item: Therefore this is to be noted, that Christ is not only in us by spiritual unity, by love, but also by natural fellowship; and we speak of the presence of the living body. For we know, as Paul saith [Rom. 6:9], that death shall not henceforth have dominion over him.

Article XI. Of Confession.

(335) The eleventh article, where we speak of absolution, the adversaries allow them. But as to confession, they add this, that confession should be kept according to the chapter Oinni8 ntriu8HN6 86XN8, that every Christian should confess once every year; and though he cannot tell all his sins so purely, yet he should be diligent to remember them all, and as much as he may remember, that he should tell them in confession.

336 Of the whole article we shall hereafter proceed, when we shall speak of Christian repentance. It is in the day, and the adversaries cannot deny it, that ours have preached, written, and taught about absolution, about the keys, in such a Christian, correct, and pure manner, that many afflicted, challenged consciences receive great consolation from it, after they have been clearly instructed in this necessary matter, namely, that it is God's commandment, that it is the right custom of the Gospel that we believe in absolution, and that we certainly believe that sins are forgiven us through Christ without our merit, that we are also truly reconciled to God when we believe the word of absolution, as if we heard a voice from heaven.

This doctrine, which is almost necessary, has been almost comforting to many troubled consciences. Also, many honest, understanding people, many pious hearts, at the beginning of this teaching of ours, highly praised Luther, and had a special joy that the necessary, certain consolation was again brought to light. For previously the whole necessary doctrine of repentance and absolution had been suppressed, since the sophists taught no right and constant consolation of conscience, but pointed people to their own works, out of which came vain despair in frightened consciences.

338 But as to the certain time of confession, it is true, and not known to the adversaries, that in our churches many people in the year need confession, absolution, and the holy sacrament not once only, but often; and the preachers, when they teach of the use and benefit of the holy sacrament, teach it thus, that they diligently exhort the people to use the holy sacrament often. And the books and writings of ours are also in the light, which are written in such a way that those who oppose them, who are respectable, godly people, do not challenge them, but praise them.

339 So also our preachers always declare that they which live in public vices, fornication, adultery, 2c, shall be banished and excluded. Item, if the holy Sacrament despise. This, then, we hold according to the Gospel, and according to the ancient cmnonidn8.

340 But for certain days or times of the year no one is urged to the Sacrament. For it is not possible that all the people should be sent to a certain time, and if they all go to the altar at one time in a whole parish, they cannot be so diligently examined and instructed as they are in ours. And the old canons and fathers do not set a certain time; but the canon says: If some go to church, and are found not to need the sacrament, they are to be admonished. If some do not communicate, they are to be admonished to repentance. But if they want to be considered Christians, they should not always consider themselves Christians. St. Paul, 1 Cor. 11:29, says that those receive the sacrament to judgment who receive it unworthily. Therefore our pastors do not compel those who are not fit to receive the Sacrament.

341 But of the recital and remembrance of sins in confession our preachers instruct the people so that they do not entangle the consciences, as if it were necessary to recount all sins by name. Although it is good to instruct the rough and inexperienced to name some sins in confession, so that they can be taught more easily, we do not discuss this here, but whether God has commanded that all sins must be told, and whether sins may not be forgiven without being told.

342 Therefore the adversaries should not have attracted to us the chapter of Omni8 ntriri8Hns 86XU8, which we know very well, but should have proved to us from the holy Scriptures, from the Word of God, that such telling of sin was commanded by God.

343 It is, alas, all too clear in the day, and reproved by all churches throughout Europe, how this xurtieula, of the chapter Omni8 utrin8HU6 86xn8, where it states that one should be guilty of confessing all sin, has brought the conscience into misery, sorrow, and entanglement. And the text itself did not do as much harm as the books of the Summists, in which the circumstances, the circumstance of sin, were summarized. For in this way they have made the consciences quite mad, and have afflicted them unspeakably, and in addition, they have made good-hearted people vain. For the wicked and the savage have not asked much about it.

0344 Whereof, after that the text readeth, every man shall confess unto his own priest the things of great strife, and murderous envy and hatred.

Did this question cause trouble between priests and monks of all orders, which one was the priest? For there all brotherhood, all friendship was over, when it was a question of the rule, of the confessional penny.

(345) Therefore we hold that God has not commanded that sin be named and told. And Panormitanus and many other scholars hold the same. Therefore we do not want to put a burden on the consciences by the chapter Omni8 utriu8HU6 86xu8, but say of it, as of other statutes of men, namely, that it is not a service of God which is necessary to salvation. Also in this way an impossible thing is commanded in the chapter, namely, that we should confess all our sins. Now it is certain that we cannot remember many sins, nor see the greatest sins, as the Psalm says, "Who knoweth his own faults?" [Ps. 19:13.]

346 Where there are sensible, God-fearing pastors and preachers, they will well know how far it may be necessary and useful to ask the young and otherwise inexperienced people in confession. But this tyranny over the consciences, since the summists, as the cane-masters, have plagued the consciences without ceasing, we cannot nor will not praise. Which, nevertheless, would have been less burdensome, if they had, with one word, thought of faith in Christ, by which consciences are rightly comforted.

347 But of Christ, and of faith, and of the remission of sins, there is not a syllable, not a tittle, in so many great books of their decretal, their commentary, their summary, their confessional; there shall no man read a word, that he may learn Christ, or what Christ is. But they go about with these registers to gather and heap up sins. And if only they understood the sin that God considers sin. Now the greater part of their sums is nothing but of fools' work, of men's statutes. Oh what despair the unholy, ungodly doctrine has brought to many pious hearts and consciences, who would gladly have done right, and who have not been able to rest! For they knew nothing else, so they had to eat and bite themselves with the telling and adding up of sin, and yet they always found unrest, and that it was impossible for them. But the adversaries have taught no less awkward things of the whole repentance, which we shall hereafter relate.

Article XII. (V.) Of penance.

348. in the twelfth article the adversaries let them have the first part, because we say that all those who after baptism are in sin

They say that they fall, obtain forgiveness of sin, at what time and how often they are converted. The other part they reject and condemn, because we say that repentance has two parts, contritionsin and fidem, that is, repentance has these two parts, a repentant broken heart and faith, that I believe that I obtain forgiveness of sin through Christ.

(349) Hear now to what the adversaries say nay. They may impudently deny that faith is not a part of repentance. What shall we do here, most gracious emperor, against these people? It is certain that we obtain forgiveness of sin through faith. This word is not our word, but the voice and word of Jesus Christ our Savior. Now the clear word of Christ these masters of confutation condemn. Therefore we cannot consent to confutation in any way. We will not, if God wills, deny the clear words of the Gospel, the holy divine truth, and the blessed Word, wherein is found all comfort and salvation. For to deny this, that we obtain forgiveness of sins by faith, what else would it be but to blaspheme and profane the blood of Christ and his death?

Therefore we ask, most gracious Lord Emperor, that Your Imperial Majesty graciously and diligently hear and recognize this great, highest, most important matter, which concerns our own souls and consciences, as well as the entire Christian faith, the entire gospel, the knowledge of Christ, and the highest, greatest thing, not only in this transitory life, but also in the life to come, even our eternal salvation and destruction before God. All God-fearing, pious and respectable people should not find otherwise than that in this matter we have taught and let teach the divine truth and the most salutary, most necessary, most comforting instruction of the consciences, in which all pious hearts of the entire Christian church have the most important and greatest, indeed all their salvation and welfare, without which instruction no preaching ministry, no Christian church can be or remain.

351 Let all the godly find that this doctrine of ours concerning repentance has brought the gospel and pure understanding to light again, and that thereby much harmful, ugly error has been done away, as this doctrine, which is true repentance, was even suppressed by the scholastics' and canonists' books. And before we come to the point, we must indicate this: All respectable, honest, learned people, high and low, even the theologians themselves, will have to confess, and no doubt also the enemies will be convinced of their convinced in my own heart that before and before D. Luther wrote. Luther wrote, all dark, confused writings and books of repentance existed, as can be seen in the Sententiaries, where there are countless useless questions, which no theology itself has yet been able to sufficiently discuss, much less has the people been able to comprehend a summary from their sermons and confused books of repentance, or to notice what primarily belongs to true repentance, how, or by what means a heart and conscience must seek rest and peace. And in spite of this, let one come forth who will teach a few people from their books, when sins have certainly been forgiven.

Dear Lord God, how blind they are, how they know nothing of it, how their writings are all night, all darkness. They bring forward questions whether sins are forgiven in attEorio or contritione, and if sin is forgiven for the sake of repentance or contrition, what need is there of absolution? And if sin be already forgiven, what need is there of the power of the keys? And then they are afraid, and first commit a crime, and even destroy the power of the keys. Some of them invent and say that by the power of the keys the guilt before God is not forgiven, but that eternal punishment is thereby changed into temporal punishment, and thus they turn the absolution, the power of the keys, by which we are to expect comfort and life, into such a power that only punishment is inflicted upon us. Others would be wiser, who say that by the power of the keys sins are forgiven before men, or before the Christian congregation, but not before God.

353 This is also almost a harmful error. For if the power of the keys, which is given by God, does not comfort us before God, how will the conscience be at rest? About this they teach and write even more clumsy and confused things. They teach that one can earn grace through repentance. And when they are asked, why then did not Saul and Judas and the like merit grace, in whom there was even a terrible controversy? - To this question they should answer, that Judas and Saul lacked the gospel and faith, that Judas was not comforted by the gospel, and did not believe; for faith distinguishes the repentance of Peter and Judas. But the adversaries do not remember the gospel and faith at all, but the law; they say, Judas did not love God, but was afraid of the punishment. But is not this uncertain and unsure?

taught of repentance? For if a frightened conscience, especially in the great fears described in the Psalms and the Prophets, wants to know whether it fears God as its God out of love, or whether it fears and hates His wrath and eternal damnation.

(354) They may not have known much of these great fears, because they play thus with words, and make difference according to their dreams. But in the heart, and when it comes to experience, it is much different, and with the bad syllables and words no conscience finds rest, as the good, gentle, idle sophists dream. Here we appeal to the experience of all God-fearing men, to all honest, sensible people, who also like to know the truth; who will confess that the adversaries in all their books have taught nothing righteous about repentance, but vain, useless babble; and yet this is a principal article of Christian doctrine, of repentance, of forgiveness of sin.

355 Now this same doctrine of questions, which is now told, is full of great error and hypocrisy, whereby the right doctrine of Christ, of the keys, of faith, has been suppressed to the unspeakable hurt of consciences.

(356) Further, they cause still more error in speaking of confession; there they teach nothing but making long registers and recounting sins, and more than one sin against the commandment of men, and drive men here as if such counting were de jure divino, that is, commanded by God. And this would not be so burdensome, if only they had taught rightly about absolution and faith. But there they pass by, and leave the high consolation, and think that the work, confession and repentance, make pious ex opere operato, without Christ, without faith. These are called true Jews.

The third part of this play is the 8ati8kaotio, or satisfaction for sin. There they teach even more clumsily, more confusedly, throwing the hundred into the thousand, so that there not a drop of good or necessary consolation might find a poor conscience. For there they themselves invent that the eternal chastisement is changed before God into the chastisement of the purgatory, and a part of the chastisement is forgiven and remitted by the keys; but for a part one must do enough with works. They say further about this and call the satisfaction opera supererogationis, that is, with them the childish, foolish works, such as pilgrimage, rosaries, and the like, since there is no commandment of God.

358 And further, as they buy and redeem the chastisement of purgatory with their indulgences, so they have devised yet another little bundle to redeem the same indulgences for purgatory also, which then became quite a delightful, rich purchase and great fair. For they brazenly sold their indulgences and said, "Whoever redeems indulgences should thus buy himself off, since otherwise he would have to do enough. And they have been unseemly in selling indulgences to the living, but they have also had to buy indulgences for the dead. They also introduced the terrible abuse of the mass, that they wanted to redeem the dead by keeping the mass. And under such devilish teachings the whole Christian doctrine of faith, of Christ, how we are to be comforted by it, has been suppressed.

(359) Wherefore all respectable, upright, honourable, understanding men, let alone Christians, perceive and understand here, that it hath been highly necessary to reprove such ungodly doctrine of the Sophists and Canonists concerning repentance. For this doctrine of theirs is openly false, unjust, contrary to the plain words of Christ, contrary to all the scriptures of the apostles, contrary to all the holy scriptures and fathers, and these are their errors:

1) That God must forgive us our sins, if we do good works, even apart from grace.

2) That we merit grace by attrition or repentance.

3) That to blot out our sin is enough, if I hate and reproach sin in myself.

4) That through our repentance, not for the sake of faith in Christ, we may obtain forgiveness of sin.

5) That the power of the keys confers forgiveness of sin, not before God, but before the church or people.

6) That by the power of the keys not only are sins forgiven, but that the same power is instituted to change eternal chastisement into temporal, and that it may put forth some satisfaction to the consciences, and establish worship and 8ati8kn6lioi68, and bind and obligate the consciences before God.

7) That the telling and actual reckoning of all sin is commanded by God.

8) That 8nti8knoUono8, which are nevertheless imposed by men, are necessary to pay the chastisement or also the guilt. For although in the school the 8nU8kaoUoiw8 is reckoned for the chastisement alone, yet it is only understood by men that one thereby earns forgiveness of the guilt.

9) That by receiving the Sacrament of Penance, ex opere operato, if the heart is not present, we obtain grace without faith in Christ.

10) That out of the power of the keys by indulgence souls may be delivered from purgatory.

11) That in reserve cases not the punishment of the cmnonum, but the guilt of sins before God may be reserved by the pope in those who truly convert to God.

(360) Now that we may help the consciences out of the innumerable snares and tangled nets of the sophists, we say that repentance or conversion has two parts, oontritionom and mine. Now if any man will add the third part, namely, the fruits of repentance and conversion, which are good works that ought and must follow, with him I will not greatly contend. But when we speak eo oontritiono, that is, of right repentance, do we cut off the innumerable useless questions, since they pretend questions, when we repent from the love of God, item, when we repent from fear of punishment? For they are mere words and vain babblings of those who have not experienced how a frightened conscience should be made to feel.

(361) We say that contritio, or right repentance, is when the conscience is terrified, and begins to feel its sin and the great wrath of God against sin, and is sorry that it has sinned. And the same oontritio occurs when our sin is punished by God's word. For in these two things stands the summa of the Gospel. First, it says: Repent, and make every man a sinner. Secondly, it gives forgiveness of sins, eternal life, blessedness, all salvation, and the Holy Spirit through Christ, by whom we are born again. So also the summa of the gospel comprehends Christ, when he saith, Luc. 24:47, "To preach repentance and remission of sins in my name among all nations." And of the terror and anguish of conscience the Scripture speaks in the 38th Psalm, v. 5. "For my iniquities are gone over my head, like a heavy burden they have become too heavy for me." And in the 6th Psalm, v. 3. f., "O Lord, be merciful unto me, for I am faint; heal me, O Lord, for my bones are troubled, and my soul is greatly distressed 2c. Ah, O LORD, how long?" Isa. 38:10. ff: "I said, Now must I go to the gates of hell, when I thought to live longer 2c. I thought to live till tomorrow; but he brake all my bones as a lion." Item: "My eyes would break, O Lord, I am in distress." 2c. Jn

In the same anxiety the conscience feels God's anger and seriousness against sin, which is an unknown thing to such idle and carnal people as the Sophists and their like. For only then does the conscience realize what a great disobedience to God sin is; only then does the conscience feel the terrible wrath of God, and it is impossible for human nature to bear it if it is not raised up by God's word.

362 So saith Paul, By the law I am dead to the law. For the law alone accuses the consciences, teaches what is to be done, and terrifies them. And the adversaries do not speak a word of faith; they do not teach a word of the Gospel, nor of Christ, but only the doctrine of the law, and say that people deserve grace with such pain, sorrow, and suffering, with such anguish, but where they repent out of the love of God, or love God. Dear Lord God, what kind of sermon is this for the consciences that need consolation? How can we love God when we are in such high, great anguish and unspeakable struggle, when we feel such great, terrible God's seriousness and wrath, which feels stronger than any man on earth can say or speak? What do such preachers and doctors teach but vain despair, who in such great anguish preach no gospel, no comfort, but only the law to a poor conscience? But we add to this the other part of repentance, namely, faith in Christ, and say that in such anguish the consciences should have held before them the gospel of Christ, in which is promised forgiveness of sin by grace through Christ. And let such consciences believe that sins are forgiven them for Christ's sake. This faith restores, comforts, and restores life and joy to such broken hearts, as Paul says in Romans 5:1: "Therefore, if we have been justified, we have peace with God." This faith shows the difference between the repentance of Judah and Peter, Saul and David. And therefore the repentance of Judah and Saul was of no avail. For there was no faith that kept the promise of God through Christ.

(363) David's and St. Peter's repentance, on the other hand, was righteous, for there was faith that grasped the promise of God, which implies forgiveness of sin through Christ. For there is actually no love of God in any heart, unless we are first reconciled to God through Christ. For God's law, or the Without Christ no one can fulfill or keep the first commandment, as Paul says to the Ephesians: "Through Christ we have access to God. And faith fights against sin throughout life, and is tested and increased by many temptations. Where faith is, only then does the love of God follow, as we said above.

(364) And this then is rightly taught, which tirrior Mulis fei, namely, such a fear and fright before God, where nevertheless faith in Christ again comforts us. Korvilis timor untern, servile fear is fear without faith; there becomes vain anger and despair.

(365) The power of the keys, which by absolution proclaimeth the gospel unto us. For the word of absolution proclaims peace to me, and is the gospel itself. Therefore, when we speak of faith, let us also understand absolution. For faith is of hearing. And when I hear absolution, that is, the promise of divine grace or the gospel, my heart and conscience are comforted. And because God truly gives new life and comfort to the heart through the word, so also by the power of the keys sins are truly counted away here on earth, so that they are loosed before God in heaven, as the saying goes [Luc. 10:16.], "He who hears you hears me." Therefore we should not regard the word of absolution less, nor believe it less, than when we hear God's clear voice from heaven, and absolution, the blessed consoling word, should be called the sacrament of penance, as some scholastics, more learned than others, speak of it.

(366) And the same faith in the word shall be strengthened for ever by hearing the sermon, by reading, by the use of the sacraments. For these are the seals and tokens of the covenant and of the graces in the New Testament. These are signs of reconciliation and forgiveness of sin. For they offer forgiveness of sin, as is clearly witnessed 1) by the words in the Lord's Supper, "This is my body which is given for you," 2c. "This is the cup of the new testament" 2c. So also faith is strengthened by the word of absolution, by the preaching 2) of the Gospel, by the reception of the Sacrament, that it may not perish in such terror and anguish of conscience.

367. this is a clear, certain, right doctrine of repentance; by it may be understood, and know what the keys are or are not, what the sacraments are useful for, what Christ's good deed is, why and how Christ is our mediator.

368 But because the adversaries condemn us for having set the two parts of repentance, we must show that it is not we, but the Scriptures, that thus express these two parts of repentance or conversion. Christ says Match. 11:28, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." There are two pieces, the burden or burden, since Christ speaks of, that is the wailing, the great fright of God's wrath in the heart. Secondly, the coming to Christ. For coming is nothing else than believing that for Christ's sake our sins are forgiven, and that we are born again and made alive by the Holy Spirit. Wherefore these two must be the chiefest pieces in repentance, repentance and faith. And Marci 1:15. saith Christ, "Repent, and believe the gospel." For the first, he makes us sinners, and terrifies us. For the second, he comforteth us, and preacheth forgiveness of sins. For to believe the gospel is not only to believe the stories of the gospel, which faith also the devils have, but it is actually to believe that through Christ our sins are forgiven, for this same faith the gospel preaches to us. There you see also the two parts, repentance, or the terror of conscience, when he says, "Repent," and faith, when he says, "Believe the gospel." Now whether any one would say that Christ also comprehends the fruits of repentance, the whole new life, we do not greatly contest this. It is enough for us here that Scripture expresses these two things primarily, repentance and faith.

369 Paul in all his epistles, as often as he deals with how we are converted, sums up these two things, the death of the old man, that is repentance, fear of God's wrath and judgment, and on the other hand renewal through faith. For by faith we are comforted and brought back to life, and saved from death and hell. Of these two things he clearly speaks Rom. 6:2: that we are dead to sin, which is by repentance and terror; and again, that we should rise again with Christ, which is when we again obtain comfort and life by faith. And because faith is said to bring comfort and peace to the conscience, according to the saying Rom. 5:1, "If we have been justified by faith, we have peace," it follows that before this there is terror and anguish in the conscience. So repentance and faith go side by side.

370. however, what is noth much sayings or

To introduce testimonies of Scripture, as the whole Scripture of Proverbs is full, as in the 118th Psalm, v. 18. "The Lord chasteneth me well, but giveth me not unto death." And in the 119th Psalm, v. 28. "My soul is consumed with anguish; raise me up according to thy words." First, he says of terror, or of repentance. In the other part of the verse he clearly shows how a repentant, poor conscience is comforted again, namely by the word of God, which gives grace and restores it. Item, 1 Sam. 2, 6: "The Lord killeth, and quickeneth; he leadeth into hell, and out again." There also the two pieces are touched, repentance and faith. Item, Isa. 28:21: "The LORD will be wroth to do his work, which is not his work." He says: God will be afraid, although it is not God's work; for God's own work is to make alive. Other works than to terrify, to kill, are not God's own works. For God alone makes alive, and when he terrifies, he does it so that his blessed consolation may be the more pleasant and sweet to us. For secure and carnal hearts, which feel not God's wrath and their sin, regard no comfort.

(371) In this manner the holy Scripture is wont to set the two things together, first the terror, then the consolation, to show that these two things belong to a right repentance or conversion, first heartfelt contrition, then faith, which restores the conscience. And it is certain that it is not possible to speak of the matter more clearly or more correctly. So we know for certain that God works in his Christians in the church in this way.

Now these are the two chief works whereby God worketh in his own. Of these two things speak all the Scriptures: first, that he should affright our hearts, and shew us sin; and secondly, that he should comfort us, and raise us up, and make us alive. Wherefore also all the scriptures have these two doctrines. One is the law, which shows us our sorrow, and punishes sin. The other teaching is the gospel. For God's promise of grace through Christ and the promise of grace are repeated throughout the Scriptures from Adam onward. For first, the promise of graces, or the first gospel, is promised to Adam, "I will set enmity," 2c. [Then the promise of grace was made to Abraham and other patriarchs by the same Christ, which was then preached by the prophets; and last of all the same promise of grace was preached by Christ himself, when he came, among the Jews, and finally by the apostles among the Gentiles.]

The Gentiles have been spread throughout the world. For by faith in the gospel, or in the promise of Christ, all the patriarchs, all the saints from the foundation of the world, have been justified before God, and not because of their repentance, or sorrow, or any works.

(373) And the examples of how the saints became righteous show also the two things above mentioned, namely, the law and the gospel. For Adam, when he had fallen, was first punished, so that his conscience was terrified and came into great anguish; this is the right repentance or contritio. After this, God promised him grace and salvation through the seed that had been given, that is, Christ, through whom death, sin, and the devil's kingdom were to be broken; then he restored him to grace and forgiveness of sin.

These are the two pieces. For even though God then inflicted punishment on Adam, he did not merit forgiveness of sin through the punishment. And of the punishment inflicted we will say hereafter.

075 So David is harshly spoken to and affrighted by Nathan the prophet, that he speaks and confesses, "I have sinned before the Lord," [2 Sam. 12:13] which is now repentance; after which he hears the gospel and absolution, "The Lord hath taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die." When David believed the word, his heart received comfort, light, and life again. And though punishment is laid upon him, yet by punishment he earns not forgiveness of sin. And there are also examples where such special punishments are not added, but these two things always belong first of all to a right repentance. The first, that our conscience may know and be afraid of sin; and the second, that we may believe the divine promise. As Luke 7:38, the poor sinful woman comes to Christ and weeps bitterly. The weeping indicates repentance. Then she hears the gospel: "Thy sins are forgiven thee, thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." Now this is the other noblest part of repentance, namely, faith, which comforts her again. From this all Christian readers may notice that we are not introducing unnecessary disputations, but are clearly, correctly, and actually setting forth the pieces of repentance without which sins cannot be forgiven, without which no one can be pious, holy, or born again before God.

376 But the fruits and good works, item, patience, that we gladly suffer the cross and punishment, which God lays out for the old Adam, all this follows, when therefore only by faith sin is removed is forgiven, and we are born again. And we have set forth these two things clearly, that faith in Christ, of which the sophists and canonists are all silent, may be taught once, that it may be seen the more clearly what faith is or is not, when it is thus held against great terror and fear.

377 But because the adversaries condemn this clear, certain, and most excellent article without all shame, saying that men obtain forgiveness of sins by faith in Christ, let us give some reasons and proofs, from which it may be understood that we do not obtain forgiveness of sins ex opere operato, or by works done, by repentance or sorrow, 2c. but by faith alone, since every one believes for himself that his sins are forgiven him. For this article is the chiefest and most necessary, wherefore we contend with the adversaries, which also is the most necessary for all Christians to know. But as we have here above said enough of the same in the article of justification, we will here the more briefly treat of the same.

(378) The adversaries, when they speak of faith, say that faith must precede repentance. And they do not understand the faith which justifies before God, but the faith by which it is generally believed in Zonors, that is, that there is a God, that there is a hell. 2c. But we speak of this as a faith, in that I believe for myself assuredly that my sins are forgiven me for Christ's sake. Of this faith we argue, which must and must follow after the terror, and comfort the conscience and make the heart content again in the heavy struggle and fear.

379 And this we will, God willing, defend for ever, and keep against all the gates of hell, that the same faith must be there, if any man's sins be forgiven. Therefore we also set this piece to repentance. Nor can the Christian church hold otherwise than that sins are forgiven by such faith, though the adversaries bark against it as mad dogs.

(380) For the first, I ask the adversaries here whether it is also a part of penance to hear or receive absolution. For if they separate absolution from confession, as they are subtle about distinguishing, no one will know or be able to say what confession is useful without absolution. But if they do not separate absolution from confession, they must say that faith in the word of Christ is a part of repentance, if absolution cannot be received, because only faith in the word of Christ is a part of repentance.

by faith. That one cannot receive the word of absolution except by faith alone is proven by Paul in Romans 4:16, where he says that no one can grasp the promise of God except by faith alone.

But absolution is nothing else than the gospel, a divine promise of God's grace and mercy. 2c. Therefore it cannot be had nor obtained, but by faith alone. For how can the word of absolution be profitable to those who do not believe it? But not believing in absolution, what is that but to prove God false? because the heart wavers, doubts, considers it uncertain that God has promised. Therefore it is written in 1 John 5:10: "He who does not believe God punishes Him by lying, for he does not believe the testimony that God bears of His Son."

0382 Secondly, the adversaries must confess with certainty, that the remission of sins is a part, or, that we speak in their way, is the end, or tsmirms uck husm, of the whole atonement. For what is the use of repentance, if forgiveness of sin be not obtained? Therefore that by which forgiveness of sin is obtained ought to be, and must ever be, the chiefest part of repentance. But it is actually true, clear, and true, when all the devils, all the gates of hell, cry out against it, that no one can grasp the word of the forgiveness of sins, but by faith alone, Rom. 3:25: "Whom God hath set forth to be a mercy-seat through faith." 2c. Item, Rom. 5, 2: "By whom also we have access by faith into this grace." 2c. For a frightened conscience, which feels its sin, soon realizes that God's wrath cannot be propitiated by unremovable wretched works, but so a conscience comes right to peace when it holds to the Mediator Christ, and believes the divine promises. For those do not understand what forgiveness of sin is, or how it is obtained, who think that hearts and consciences can be satisfied without faith in Christ.

Peter the Apostle introduces the saying of Isaiah 49:23: "He who believes in Him will not be put to shame. Therefore the hypocrites must be ashamed before God, who think they want to obtain forgiveness of sins by their works, not for the sake of Christ. And Peter Apost. 10, 43. says: "All the prophets bear witness to Jesus that those who believe in him receive forgiveness of sins through his name." He could not have spoken more clearly, for he says "through his. Name," and adds, "All that believe on him."

0384 Therefore we obtain forgiveness of sins through the name of Christ, that is, for Christ's sake, not for our merit or works; and this is done when we believe that sins are forgiven us for Christ's sake.

385 The adversaries cry out that they are the Christian church, and they hold what the common church holds. But Peter the apostle, here in our cause and our highest article, praises also an eatiolieu, common church, when he says, "To JESUS all the prophets bear witness, that we obtain forgiveness of sins through his name." I mean ever, if all holy prophets agree together (after God also respects one prophet for a world treasure), let j[i]tj ever also be One decree, One voice and unanimously strong resolution of the common Catholic, Christian, holy church, and be held cheaply for it. We will not concede to Pope, bishop, or church the power to hold or conclude anything against the unanimous voice of all prophets. Nor has Pope Leo X. been allowed to condemn this article as erroneous. And the opponents condemn this also.

(386) Therefore it is enough in the day what a fine Christian church this is, which may not only condemn by public, written decree and mandate this article, namely, that we obtain forgiveness of sin without works through faith in Christ, but also condemn and strangle innocent blood above the confession of this article. They may issue a commandment that pious, upright people who teach this should be driven out, and by all kinds of tyranny they seek their life and limb as bloodhounds.

387 But they will perhaps say: they have also teachers for themselves, Scotum, Gabrielum, and the like, who also have great names, and also the sayings of the fathers, which are dressed mutilated in the decree. Yes, it is true, they are all called teachers and scribes, but by the singing you can tell which birds they are. These same scribes have taught nothing but philosophy, and have known nothing of Christ and God's work. Their books clearly prove this.

388 For this reason we are not mistaken, but know truly that we may cheerfully hold the word of the holy apostle Peter, as a great doctor, against all the sententiarios in a heap, even if there were many of them. For Peter clearly says that it is a unanimous voice of all the prophets, and the same glorious preaching of the great, great apostle has been powerfully confirmed by God this time through the bestowal of the Holy Spirit.

the Holy Ghost. For thus the text saith, While Peter yet spake, the Holy Ghost fell upon all them that heard the word."

389 Therefore let the Christian conscience know that this is God's word and commandment, that sins are forgiven us through Christ without merit, not because of our works. And such a word and commandment of God is a right, strong, certain, everlasting consolation against all terror of sin and death, against all temptation and despair, torment and anguish of conscience.

(390) The idle sophists know little of this, and the blessed preaching, the gospel, which preacheth the forgiveness of sins through the given seed, that is, Christ, hath been the greatest treasure and comfort of all patriarchs, of all pious kings, of all prophets, of all believers, from the foundation of the world. For they believed in the same Christ that we believe in. For from the foundation of the world no saint has been saved except through faith in this same gospel. Therefore also Peter saith, that there is one voice of all the prophets: and the apostles also preach the same with one voice, signifying that the prophets spake alike as of one mouth.

391 The testimonies of the holy fathers are about this. For St. Bernard says in clear words: "Therefore it is necessary above all things to know that we cannot have forgiveness of sins in any other way than by the grace of God. But you should add this to it, that you believe this, that sins are forgiven you also, and not only others, through Christ. This is the testimony of the Holy Spirit inwardly in your heart, when he himself tells you in your heart that your sins are forgiven you. For thus the apostle calls it, that a man without merit is justified by faith.

392 These words of St. Bernard first bring out this doctrine of ours, and set it right in the light. For he says that we ought not only to believe in general that sins are forgiven us, but says that this must be added to my believing for myself that sins are forgiven me. And teach on this more truly and clearly, how we are assured inwardly in the heart of grace, of the forgiveness of our sins, namely, when the hearts are comforted and quenched inwardly by this consolation. But how now, ye adversaries? Is St. Bernard also a heretic? What more do you want? Do you still deny that we obtain forgiveness of sins through faith?

393 For the third, the adversaries say that sin is thus forgiven, yuia utritus vsI coritritu" sliet actum ailsetioiiiZ Osi, if we resolve by reason to love God, by the work (they say) we obtain forgiveness of sin. This is no other thing than to reject the gospel and the divine promises, and to teach vain law. For they speak of the law and our works: for the law requireth love.

394 Therefore they teach to trust, that we may obtain forgiveness of sins by such repentance and lovingkindness. What is this but trusting in our works, not in the promise of Christ? If then the law is sufficient to obtain remission of sins, what need is there of Christ, what need is there of the gospel? But we turn away consciences from the law, from their works to the gospel, and to the promise of grace. For the gospel, which accepts Christ and is grace, makes us trust in the promise that we will be reconciled to the Father for Christ's sake, not for our repentance or love, for there is no other mediator or reconciler but Christ. So we cannot fulfill the law unless we are first reconciled through Christ, and even if we do something good, we must consider it that we do not receive forgiveness of sin because of works, but because of Christ.

395 For this cause is Christ profaned, and the gospel rejected, if any man should think that we obtain forgiveness of sins by the law, or in any other way than by faith in Christ. And this also we have done above, when we have said why we teach that we are justified by faith, and not by the love of God, or by our love toward God.

396 Therefore, when the adversaries teach that we obtain forgiveness of sin through repentance and love, and trust in this, it is no different than teaching the Law, which they nevertheless do not understand as to what love towards God it demands, but look, like the Jews, only into the hidden face of Moses. For I will put it alike that works and love are there, yet neither works nor love can propitiate GOD, or be counted as much as Christ, as the Psalm says, "Thou wouldest not enter into judgment with thy servant." 2c. [Therefore we should not give the glory of Christ to our works.]

397 For this cause Paul contends, that we are not justified by the law, and holds that we are not justified by the law.

against the law the promise of God, the promise of grace, which is given to us because of Christ. Paul moves us around [Rom. 4, 3] and points us from the law to the divine promise, so that we should look to God and His promise, and consider the Lord Christ as our treasure. For this promise will be in vain if we are justified before God by the work of the law, if we merit forgiveness of sin by our righteousness.

398 Now it is certain that for this reason God makes the promise, for this reason Christ also came, that we cannot keep the law nor fulfill it; therefore we must first be reconciled through the promise before we fulfill the law. But the promise cannot be grasped, except by faith alone.

399 Therefore all they that have true repentance lay hold on the promise of grace through faith, and believe assuredly that we are reconciled to the Father through Christ. This also is the opinion of Paul, Rom. 4:16: "Therefore we obtain grace through faith, that the promise may stand fast." And Gal. 3:22: "The scripture hath concluded all things under sin, that the promise of Jesus Christ should be given by faith to them that believe." That is, All men are under sin, and cannot be saved, except they take hold of forgiveness of sin through faith. Therefore, before we fulfill the law, we must first obtain forgiveness of sin through faith. Although, as we said above, love certainly follows from faith, for those who believe have received the Holy Spirit. Therefore they began to hold fast the law, and to obey it.

(400) We would have introduced more sayings here, but the Scriptures are full of them everywhere. Nor did I wish to make it too long, that this matter might be the clearer. For there is no doubt that this is Paul's opinion, that we obtain forgiveness of sin for Christ's sake through faith, that we also must set the Mediator against God's wrath, not our works.

(401) Let not even pious Christian consciences err in this, whether the adversaries misinterpret and wrongly interpret the clear sayings of Paul. For nothing so simple, so certain, so pure, so clear, can be spoken or written; one can make another nose at him with words.

040 But we are sure of it, and know it for a fact, that the opinion which we have set is the opinion which we have set. is the right opinion of Paul. There is no doubt that this doctrine alone is a certain comfort to hearts and consciences in the right fight and in death and temptation, as experience shows.

403 Therefore only far, far from us with the Pharisaical teachings of the adversaries, since they say that we do not obtain forgiveness of sin by faith, but that we must earn it with our works, and with our love toward God. Item, that we should propitiate God's wrath with our works and love. For it is quite a Pharisaical doctrine, a doctrine of the Law, not of the Gospel, when they teach that a man is first justified by the Law before he is reconciled to God through Christ, when Christ says [John 15:5], "Without me you can do nothing." Item: "I am the vine, ye are the branches."

040 But the adversaries speak as if we were not the branches of Christ, but of Moses; for they would first become righteous and just before God by the law, and first offer our works and dilections to God, before they would be branches of the vine of Christ. But Paul, who is certainly a much higher doctor than the adversaries, speaks clearly, and again denies this alone, that no one can do the law without Christ. Therefore, those who feel or have experienced sin and anguish of conscience must keep the promise of grace, that through faith they will first be reconciled to God for Christ's sake before they fulfill the law. All this is public and clear enough in God-fearing consciences. And from this Christians will well understand why we said above that we are justified before God by faith alone, not by our works or dilection 2c. For all our abilities, all our deeds and works are too weak to take away and satisfy God's wrath; therefore we must present Christ as the mediator.

405 Finally, let the adversaries consider, if a poor conscience will come to peace and be quiet, if we obtain grace and forgiveness of sin by loving God, or by fulfilling the law. The law will always accuse us, for no man fulfills the law, as Paul says [Rom. 4:15.], "The law provokes wrath."

(406) Chrysostom asks, as the Sententiarii also ask, how one may be sure that his sins are forgiven? It is indeed worth asking; good to him who gives a right answer. To this most necessary question it is not possible to give an answer, nor is it possible to give the answer.

know how to comfort or calm down in temptations, so that one responds to this opinion:

407. It is God's decree, God's command from the foundation of the world, that through faith in the Seed given, that is, through faith for Christ's sake, sins shall be forgiven us without merit. But if any man stumbleth or doubteth concerning this, he maketh God false in his promise, as John saith. So we say that a Christian should take this for certain as God's command, and if he keeps it, he is certain and has peace and comfort.

408. The adversaries, when they preach and teach long apart from this doctrine, leave the poor consciences in doubt. It is not possible that there should be peace, a quiet or peaceful conscience, when they doubt whether God is gracious. For if they doubt whether they have a gracious God, whether they do right, whether they have forgiveness of sin, how can they call upon God in doubt? How can they be sure that God will respect and listen to their prayer? So all their lives are without faith, and they cannot serve God properly. This is what Paul says to the Romans [Cap. 14, 23.]: "What is not of faith is sin." And because they are always and forever stuck in doubt, they never know what God is, what Christ is, what faith is. In the end, they die in despair, without any knowledge of God.

409 Such a harmful doctrine "lead the adversaries, namely, such a doctrine, by which the whole gospel is done away, Christ is suppressed, the people are led into heartache and anguish of conscience, finally, when temptations come, into despair.

410 Let this now be graciously considered by Imperial Majesty. Majesty graciously consider, and look well to it; it concerns not gold or silver, but souls and consciences. Also, let all honorable and prudent people pay attention to what this matter is or is not. Here we may suffer all respectable men to judge which part has taught the most useful thing for the Christian conscience, we or the adversaries. For indeed it is to be thought that we are not well pleased with strife and discord. And if it had not been for the greatest, most important causes, namely, concerning the conscience of all of us, salvation and soul, why we have to quarrel so vehemently with the adversaries, we would have kept silent. But after they have rejected the holy gospel, all the plain. But since they condemn the holy gospel, all the clear Scriptures of the apostles, and the divine truth, we can, with God and conscience, reject the blessed doctrine and divine truth, of which we are finally convinced.

When this poor temporal life ceases, and all creatures' help is ended, wait for the one, eternal, highest consolation, not denying it, nor departing in any way from this cause, which is not ours alone, but the whole Christianity's, and concerns the highest treasure, JESUS CHRIST.

411 We have now stated from what causes we have put the two parts of repentance, namely, repentance and faith. And this we have done, because all sorts of sayings are found now and then in the books of the adversaries concerning repentance, which they introduce from Augustine and the other ancient fathers in a mutilated manner, which they have then everywhere interpreted and stretched to suppress the doctrine of faith altogether. For they have set this saying: Repentance is a pain by which sin is punished. Repentance is to repent of a former sin, and not to repeat the sin for which I was punished. Faith is not considered at all in the Proverbs, nor is it considered at all in their schools, even though they treat such proverbs according to length.

412 Therefore, that the doctrine of faith might be the more widely known, we have set faith for a part of repentance; for the sayings which teach our repentance and our good works, and do not remember faith at all, are very dangerous, as experience shows. Therefore, if they had considered the great danger to souls and consciences, the Sententiarii and canonists should have written more wisely about their decree. For if the fathers also speak of the other part of repentance, not of one part only, but of both, repentance and faith, they ought to have put them together.

413 For Tertullian also speaks very comfortingly of faith, and especially praises the divine oath, of which the prophet speaks: "As truly as I live, saith the Lord, I will not the death of the sinner, but that he should repent and live. Because God swears (says) that He does not want the death of the sinner, He certainly requires faith that we should believe His oath and swear that He will forgive us sin. Without this, God's promises are to be held in the highest esteem and esteemed by us. Now the promise is confirmed with an oath. Therefore if anyone thinks that sins will not be forgiven him, he is punishing God with a lie, which is the greatest blasphemy. For thus says Tertullianus: Invitat praernio ack salutsrn, zurans etiam etc. That is, God entices us for our own salvation, with His own oath, that we may believe Him. O blessed are those for whose sake God swears! O woe to us wretched

414. And here we must know that faith must certainly hold that God forgives us sin by grace for Christ's sake, not for our works, for confession and satisfaction. For as soon as we base ourselves on works, we become uncertain. For a frightened conscience soon realizes that its best works are of no value against God. For this reason Ambrose says a fine word about repentance: "We must repent, and also believe that grace will come to us; but in this way we hope for grace through faith, for faith waits for and obtains grace, as if from a handwriting. Item: Faith is the very thing by which sins are covered.

045 Wherefore there are plain sayings in the books of the fathers, not of works only, but also of faith. But the adversaries, not understanding the manner of repentance, neither understanding the sayings of the fathers, pick out some of them mutilated from one part of repentance, namely, from repentance and from works; and what is spoken of faith they pass over.

(Article VI.) Of confession and satisfaction.

416 God-fearing, respectable, pious, Christian people may well notice here that much is at stake that a right, solid doctrine of repentance and faith be had and preserved in the church. For the great fraud of indulgences, 2c., item, the clumsy doctrine of the sophists, has shown us enough what great mischief and danger arise from it, if man fails here. How many a pious conscience under the papacy has sought the right way here with such great labor, and has not found it under such darkness.

(417) Therefore we have always taken great pains to teach this matter clearly, certainly, and correctly. We have not particularly quarreled about confession and satisfaction. For we keep confession also for the sake of absolution, which is God's word, by which the power of the keys absolves us from sins. Therefore, it would be against God to refuse absolution from the church. 2c.

418 Those who despise absolution know not what the forgiveness of sins is, or what the power of the keys is. But of the telling of sins we have said above in our confession, that we hold that it is not commanded by God. For that they say, Every judge must first understand the things and infirmities of sin.

Before he pronounces the sentence, he must hear the sins first. 2c. That is not the point. For absolution is badly the command to absolve, and is not a new judgment to inquire into sin. For God is the judge, who commanded the apostles, not the office of judge, but the execution of grace, to absolve those who desire it, and to absolve and absolve them also from sins which do not occur to us. Therefore absolution is a voice of the gospel, by which we receive comfort, and is not a judgment or law. And it is foolish and childish enough for those of understanding to introduce the saying of Solomon, when he says in the 27th, v. 23, viliMntsr 6OANO866 vulturn x> 660ri8 tui, that is, take heed to thy sheep 2c., into the place of confession or absolution. For Solomon there speaks nothing at all of confession, but gives commandment to the fathers of the house, that they should be content with their own, and abstain from other people's goods. And he commands with the word: each one should diligently take care of his livestock and goods; but he should not forget God's fear, God's commandment, and God's word out of stinginess.

419. But the adversaries make black and white of the Scripture, if and as they will, contrary to all the natural way of clear words. In the place: 60MO866 vulturn x>6eori8 etc. , there 60MO866r6 confession must be called, cattle or sheep must be called there people. Ltudulurn, we observe, is also called a school, where such Doctores and Oratores are in attendance. But it serves them right, who thus despise the holy Scriptures, all good arts, that they are so grossly lacking in "grammar". If anyone in the place ever felt like comparing a householder, of whom Solomon speaks, with a pastor, vultu8 would not have to mean ureurm 6ori86i6ritiu6, but the outward walk.

420 But I will let this pass. In some places in the Psalms the word eon168810 is remembered, as in the 32nd Psalm, v. 5: "I will confess my transgression against me unto the Lord." That same confession and confessing which is done to God is repentance itself. For when we confess to God, we must recognize ourselves as sinners in our hearts, and not only with our mouths, as the hypocrites do, but only by repeating the words. Thus the same confession that God makes is such repentance in the heart that I feel God's seriousness and wrath, and I agree with God that He is justly angry, that He cannot be reconciled even with our merit, and that we seek mercy, since God has promised mercy in Christ. So this is a confession in the 51st Psalm, v. 6: "In You alone

I have sinned, that thou mayest be found righteous when thou art judged," that is: I confess myself a sinner, and that I have deserved eternal wrath, and cannot with my works, nor with my merit, appease thy wrath: therefore I say that thou art righteous, and justly punish us. I have proved thee right, though the hypocrites judge thee, because thou regardest not their merit and their good works. Yea, I know that my works stand not before thy judgment: but we are justified, if thou hast judged us righteous through thy mercy.

(421) There might also be one who would like to use Jacob's saying, "Confess your sins one to another" [Jac. 5:16]. But he does not speak of confession, which happens to the priest 2c., but speaks of a reconciliation and confession, if I otherwise reconcile myself with my neighbor.

422. The adversaries also must much condemn their own teachers, if they will say that the telling of sin must be done, and is commanded by God. For though we also keep confession, and say that it is not useless to ask the young and inexperienced, that they may be the better instructed. But all this is to be tempered, lest the consciences be entrapped, which can never be satisfied so long as they are under the delusion that they are guilty of sin before God.

423 Wherefore the word of the adversaries, when they say that to salvation there is need of a very pure confession, because no sin is concealed, 2c. is altogether false. For such confession is impossible. O Lord God, how miserably have they afflicted and tormented many a pious conscience by teaching that confession must be entirely pure, and that no sin must remain unconfessed! For how can a man always be sure when he has confessed completely purely?

424 The fathers also remember confession; but they speak not of the recital of secret sin, but of a ceremony, a public penance. For in ancient times those who had been in public vices were not received back into the church without a public ceremony and punishment. For this reason they had to confess their sin to the priests, so that the sutiskaetioieZ might be imposed according to the greatness of the transgression. But the whole thing was not like the telling of sins of which we speak. For the same confession and confession did not take place because without the same confession forgiveness of sin could not take place before God, but because no outward punishment could be imposed on them, unless they knew of the sin.

425 And of the outward ceremony of public penance is also the word 8uti8ku6tio, or satisfaction. For the fathers did not wish to receive again without punishment those who had been found guilty of public vices. And this had many causes. For it served as an example that public vices should be punished, as the gloss in the decree also says. Thus it was also unwise that those who had fallen into open vice should soon be admitted to the sacrament unattempted. All of these ceremonies have now long since ceased, and there is no need for them to be instituted again. For they do nothing at all for reconciliation before God. Nor has it been the opinion of the fathers in any way that men should thereby obtain forgiveness of sin, although such outward ceremonies easily lead the inexperienced to think that they help something toward salvation. Now he that teacheth and keepeth these things teacheth and keepeth them wholly Jewish and heathen. For the heathen have also had some purifications, thinking that they would be reconciled to God by them.

426 But now, if this same manner of public penance has departed, the name 8uti8ku6tio has remained, and the shadow of the old custom of putting on penance in confession has remained, and they call it opera non debita. We call it 8uti8ku6tioii68 eunonieul. Of this we teach, as of the telling of sins, namely, that these same public ceremonies are not commanded by God, nor are they necessary, nor do they help to the forgiveness of sin. For this doctrine must be preserved and remain above all things, that we obtain forgiveness of sin by faith, and not by our works, which come before or after we are converted or born again in Christ.

427 And we have spoken of satisfactionibus chiefly for this cause, lest any man should so understand satisfaction as to suppress the doctrine of faith, as if we could merit forgiveness of sin by our works. For the dangerous error of satisfactionibus has thus been torn down and confirmed by some unskilful teaching, so that the adversaries write that satisfaction is such a work, by which the divine wrath and displeasure are propitiated.

428. However, the adversaries themselves confess that the satisfactiones do not absolve the guilt before God, but they invent that they alone redeem and absolve the chastisement or punishment. For thus they teach, that when sin is forgiven, the guilt or enlxu is made free without remedy, solely through

God forgives; and yet, because He is a just God, He does not leave sin without punishment, and turns eternal punishment into temporal punishment. They teach that a part of the temporal punishment is remitted by the power of the scourge, but a part is paid by satisfactiones or pardon. And it cannot be understood what part of the punishment or chastisement is remitted by the power of the keys, for they would say that a part of the chastisement of the purgatory is remitted, from which it would follow that the satisfactiones alone served to redeem the chastisement of the purgatory. And further, they say that the satisfactiones are good in the sight of God, even if they are done by those who have fallen into mortal sin; as if God were reconciled by those who are in mortal sin and are his enemies.

(429) All these are vainly imagined, fictitious doctrines and words, without any foundation in Scripture, and contrary to all the writings of the ancient fathers. Nor does Longobardus himself speak of the satisfactionibus in this way. The Scholastici may have heard that there were satisfactiones in the church, and they did not consider that it was an outward ceremony, in which the pueriles poenitentiae or penitents had to show themselves to the church with a ceremony that was used, first, as a fright and example that others might take offense at; and, second, as a test whether the same sinners or penitents, who desired mercy again, had also heartily converted. In sum, they have not seen that such poenitentia is an outward discipline, punishment, and disciplina, and that such a thing, like another worldly discipline, is set up for a shyness or fear. They have taught that they serve not only for discipline, but also to propitiate God, and are necessary for salvation. 1) But as in many other things they have boiled together the kingdom of Christ, which is spiritual, and the kingdom of the world, and outward discipline, so they have also done with the satisfactionibus. But the glosses in eunonidus show in some places that these satisfactiones alone are to serve as an example for the church.

430 But here let us see how the adversaries base and prove such their dreams in the Confutation, which they finally hung on the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty hanged at last. They use many sayings of Scripture to make the inexperienced believe that their doctrine of satisfactionibus is founded in Scripture, which was still unknown in the time of Longobardi. They bring these sayings

1) Müller: Because. Latin: 8icut.

"Repent ye, and bring forth the fruits of repentance." Item: "Set your limbs to the service of righteousness." Item: Christ said, "Repent." Item: Christ commands the apostles to preach repentance. Item: Peter preaches repentance in the Acts of the Apostles, 2, v. 38. After this they point to certain sayings of the Fathers, and the Canons, and decree: "The penances in the church against the Gospel, against the decree of the Fathers and Conciliar, against the decree of the holy church, are not to be done, but those who obtain absolution are to perform their penance and satisfaction, the penance laid upon them by the priest.

431. May God disgrace and punish such desperate sophists who so treacherously and wickedly interpret the holy Gospel in their dreams. What pious, honorable man would not be pained in his heart by such a great public abuse of the divine word? Christ says, "Repent." The apostles also preach, "Repent." Therefore is it proved by Proverbs that God does not forgive sin except for the sake of fictitious satisfaction? Who taught the rude, insolent asses such dialectics? But it is not dialectics nor sophistics, but it is knavery to play with the word of God in this way, and to be so vexatious. For this reason they take the saying from the Gospel, "Repent," as dark and obscure, so that when the inexperienced hear that this word from the Gospel is taken against us, they should think that we are such people who think nothing at all of repentance. With such wickedness do they deal with us. Although they know that we teach rightly about repentance, yet they want to discourage people, and they like to embitter many people against us, so that the inexperienced will cry out: Crucify, crucify such pernicious heretics, who think nothing of repentance; and so they are publicly overcome here as liars.

432 But we are comforted by this, and we know for certain that such insolent lies and falsification of the holy Scriptures are of no avail to the godly, even to honorable, pious, honest people. Thus, even God the Lord, as truly as He is a living God, will not long suffer such insolent blasphemy and unheard malice; they will certainly burn themselves on the first and other commandments of God.

433 And having comprehended in our Confession almost all the highest articles of the whole Christian doctrine, that is, that about this matter there can be no greater, more highly important matter under the sun, one ought to add to these high, most important

We have sought out and selected so many innumerable souls and consciences in all the world and in the whole holy Christian religion, the welfare and unity of the whole Christian church, now and in 1) this time and in our descendants, with all faithful, highest diligence, who would be more God-fearing, more understanding, more experienced, more capable, and more honest, and who would also bear and show more faithful, good hearts and minds for the common good, for the unity of the church, and for the welfare of the kingdom, than the loose, careless sophists who wrote the Confutation.

434. And you, Cardinal Campeggi, as the wise man to whom this matter is entrusted in Rome, whose wisdom is to be praised, even if you would not respect or regard anything but the honor of the pope and see of Rome, should have kept better house here, and done this with the greatest diligence, so that in such a great and excellent matter such a clumsy confutation would not have been written by such or such sophists, that in such a great and excellent matter such a clumsy confutation would not have been written by the or such sophists, which both at this time and in the future with the descendants will bring you no other than to vain ridicule, to the diminishment of your reputation and name, to eternal, unavoidable disgrace and damage.

435 Ye Romanists see that these are the last times before the last day, of which Christ warned that many perils should befall the church. You then, who would be called watchmen, shepherds, and heads of the church, should be careful in this time with special, faithful, and supreme diligence. There are already many signs before your eyes that, if you do not manage and direct yourselves well in time and affairs, a great change will take place in the whole Roman see and in its nature. And you must not take it into your heads, indeed you must not think that you want to keep the congregations and churches with you and the Roman see by the sword and force alone. For good consciences cry out for the truth and right instruction from God's word, and death is not so bitter to them as it is bitter to them when they doubt in one thing. Therefore they must seek where they can find instruction. If you want to keep the church with you, you must strive to teach and preach rightly, so that you can establish good will and constant obedience.

436 Let us here return to the matter in hand. The sayings of the Scriptures, so attracted by the adversaries, do not speak of the satisfaction of the Lord.

1) Müller: "now and". Jenaer: "itzund".

and satisfaction, of which the adversaries contend. Therefore, it is only a falsification of the Scriptures that they interpret God's word in their own opinion. We say that where there is true repentance and renewal of the Holy Spirit in the heart, good fruits and good works will surely follow. And it is not possible that a man should turn to God, do right repentance, have heartfelt remorse, and good works, good fruits, should not follow. For a heart and conscience that has rightly felt its sorrow and sin, that is rightly alarmed, will not regard or seek much of the pleasures of the world. And where faith is, it is grateful to God, and warmly respects and loves His commandments. Also, inwardly in the heart there is certainly no true repentance, if we do not outwardly show good works, Christian patience. And so also John the Baptist means it, when he says [Luc. 3:8. Matt. 3:8], "Produce true fruits of repentance." Item, Paul, when he saith to Romans 6, v. 19, "Beget your members for weapons of righteousness." 2c. And Christ, when he saith, "Repent," speaketh truly of the whole repentance, and of the whole new life, and the fruits thereof. He does not speak of the hypocritical satisfactions of which the scholastici dream, and may say that they are then also valid before God for punishment, if they are done in mortal sins. This, of course, should be a delicious service.

437 There are also many other arguments and reasons, so that the above sayings of Scripture do not rhyme with the satisfaction of which the scholastics speak. They invent and say that the satisfactiones are fine works, which we do not owe. But the Scriptures, in the Proverbs which are introduced, require such works as we owe. For this word of Christ, when he saith, Repent ye, is a word of divine commandment.

438 Item, the adversaries write that those who confess, even if they do not want to accept the satisfaction, do not sin because of it, but will have to bear punishment and satisfaction in purgatory. Now there is no doubt that these sayings, "Repent," 2c., item Pauli, "Pray your members to serve righteousness," and similar sayings are those of Christ and the apostles, which have nothing to do with purgatory, but only with this life. Therefore they cannot be stretched to the satisfactionibus that I may or may not accept. For God's commandments are not thus freely given to us. 2c.

439 Thirdly, the pope's law and canon teach that by indulgences such 8ati8ka<Kion68 are remitted, onp. Orrrn ex so as xc>6nit6nti8. But the indulgence makes no one loose

Of these commandments, "Repent," "Produce right fruits of repentance," 2c.

440 Therefore it is light in the day, that the sayings of the Scripture of the sutiMcrtioniftuK are introduced altogether unskilfully. For if the penances of purgatory are satisfactiones or satispassiones, or if the satisfactiones are acknowledgments of the chastisements of purgatory, then the above-mentioned sayings of Christ and Paul must also prove and test that souls go into purgatory and suffer chastisements there. If, therefore, it is necessary to follow from the opinion of the adversaries, the sayings must all put on new garments, and be thus interpreted: 1ruotu8 ste. The sinner must show the right fruits of repentance, that is, he must suffer in purgatory after this life. But it is vexatious to make more words of such 1) public error of the adversaries. For indeed it is known that the Scriptures speak in places of works which we owe, and of the whole new life of a Christian, 2c. not of the fictitious works which we do not owe, of which the adversaries speak. And yet with these lies they defend monasticism, the buying and selling of masses, and innumerable other traditions, namely, that it feigns works to do enough for penance and punishment, though they do not do enough for guilt against God.

441 Forasmuch then as the Proverbs, drawn from the Scriptures, do not at all say, that by works, for which we are not guilty, eternal chastisement, or purgatory, shall be paid; so the adversaries say, without any reason, that by such satisfaction the chastisements of purgatory shall be redeemed.

442 Neither have the wicked commanded to inflict chastisement, or to acknowledge the chastisement in part or in whole. Such dreams and lies are nowhere found in Scripture. Christ speaks of forgiveness of sin, as he says, "What ye dissolve," 2c. When sin is forgiven, death is also taken away and eternal life is given. So also the text, "Which ye dissolve," 2c. does not speak of putting on punishment, but that sins remain on those who do not convert.

443. Although we now hold that good fruits and works should follow right repentance, to praise and thank God, and of the same good works and fruits we have God's commandment, as of fasting, praying, almsgiving, 2c, yet nowhere in Scripture is it found that God's wrath or eternal chastisement should be relieved by the chastisement of the purgatory, or by 8uti8ku6tivQ68 or satisfaction, that is, by some

1) Müller: "so von".

Works that we would not be guilty of without it, or that the power of the keys is commanded to inflict punishment, or to remit a part of the punishment. Now let the adversaries prove these things from the Scriptures. This they will not do.

444 Therefore it is certain that Christ's death is a satisfaction, not only for guilt against God, but also for eternal death, as is clearly stated in the saying of Hosea: "Death, I will be your death." What an abomination it is to say that Christ's death is sufficient for guilt against God, but that the punishment we suffer redeems us from eternal death? that is, that this word of the prophet, "Death, I will be thy death," is to be understood not of Christ, but of our works, and in addition of wretched human statutes, which God has not commanded. And yet they may say that these works are sufficient for eternal death, even if they are done in mortal sin.

445 A pious heart must certainly be grieved by the very clumsy speech of the adversaries. For whoever reads and considers it, must be heartily grieved by such public doctrines of the devil, which the wicked Satan has spread into the world to suppress the true doctrine of the gospel, so that no one or few may be taught what is law or gospel, what is repentance or faith, or what are the benefits of Christ.

446 For of the law they say thus, God hath considered our infirmities, and hath set for man a purpose and measure of the works which he is bound to do, which are the works of the ten commandments, 2c. that of the rest, of the operibus supererogationis, that is, of the works which he is not bound to do, he may be sufficient for his faults and sins.

(447) Then they invent a dream for themselves, as if a man were able to fulfill God's law, so that he would do something more and above and beyond what the law requires, when all the holy Scriptures testify, and all the prophets also testify, that God's law demands much more than we are always able to do. But they want to think that the law of God and God are satisfied with outward works, and do not see how the law demands that we love God with all our heart and be free from all evil desires. Therefore there is no man on earth who does as much as the law requires.

448 Therefore it is quite foolish and childish for those of understanding to imagine that we can do anything more than is required by the divine law. For though we can do the poor outward works, which are not God's, but the law's, we cannot do them.

If I have commanded men, whom Paul calls mendicant statutes, this is a foolish, vain confidence, that I would trust to have fulfilled God's law, yea, to have done more than God requires.

449. Item, right prayers and right alms, right fasting, these are commanded by God, and in the case that they are commanded by God, one cannot slacken them without sin. On the other hand, these works, if they are not commanded by God's laws, but have a form according to human choice, are nothing but human statutes, of which Christ says [Matt. 15:9], "They serve me in vain with the commandments of men," as then are some certain fasts, not invented to tame the flesh, but to honor God with it, and, as Scotus says, to get rid of eternal death. Item, how then are some prayers, some certain alms, which are to be a service of God, which ex opere operato reconcile God, and deliver from eternal damnation. For they say and teach that such works ex opere operato, that is, by the work done, are sufficient for sin, and teach that such satisfaction is valid, though one be in mortal sin.

(450) Above these are works that have even less divine command, such as the rosaries and pilgrimages, which are of many kinds. For some go to St. James in full armor, some with bare feet, and the like. Christ calls these vain and useless services. Therefore they are of no use to reconcile God, as the adversaries say. And these works, as pilgrimages, they praise highly, 1) and esteeming them great and delicious works, call them opera supererogationis. And that which is more shameful, that which is still more blasphemous, they give them the honor which is due to Christ's death and blood alone, that they should be the protium, that is, the treasure, so that we may be redeemed from eternal death. Fie on the wicked devil, who may so revile and blaspheme Christ's holy and precious death!

451 So these pilgrimages are preferred to the righteous works expressed in the ten commandments, and thus God's law is obscured in two ways. First, that they think they have done enough for the law, when they have done the outward works. Second, that they esteem the wretched statutes of men more highly than the works which God has commanded.

452 The doctrine of repentance and grace is also suppressed. For eternal death and the fears of hell cannot therefore be as they would have us believe. There is much more and greater treasure than our works, by which we are saved from death, eternal anguish, and pain. For such holiness of works is an idle thing, and the saints of works do not even taste what death is; but, as God's wrath cannot but be overcome, but by faith in Christ, so also death is overcome through Christ alone, as Paul says, "Praise be to God, who gives us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord" [1 Cor. 15:57]. He does not say, who gives us victory through our sufficiency.

1) Müller: "doch" instead of: "hoch".

453 The adversaries speak almost coldly and sleepily of the forgiveness of sin against God, and do not see that forgiveness of such guilt, and redemption from God's wrath and eternal death, is such a great thing, that it is obtained only through the one Mediator Christ and through faith in Him.

454 If therefore the death and blood of Christ be the just payment for eternal death, and the adversaries themselves confess that such works of satisfaction are works which we owe not, but ordinances of men, of which Christ saith, Matt. 15:9, that they are vain works of God: we may freely conclude, even from their own words, that such satisfactions are not commanded of God, neither do they redeem eternal chastisement and guilt, or the chastisement of purgatory.

(455) Perhaps the adversaries will here reproach us, that chastisement and punishment properly belong to repentance. For Augustine says that penance is vengeance, fear, and punishment for sin. Answer: Our adversaries are gross asses, that they interpret the words of Augustine, who speaks of contrition and entire repentance, to mean the ceremonies of satisfaction, and still further hang upon it, that such satisfactions is to merit forgiveness of eternal death.

456 We also teach that in repentance is the punishment of sin, for the great terrors by which sin is judged in us are a punishment far greater and higher than pilgrimages and the like pageantry. But such terror does not concern satisfaction, so it does not deserve forgiveness of sin or eternal death, but, if we were not comforted by faith, such terror and punishment would be vain sin and death. Thus Augustine teaches about punishment. But our adversaries, the rude asses, know not at all what repentance or contrition is, but go about with their jiggery-pokery, rosaries, pilgrimages, and the like.

457 But they say, God, being a just judge, cannot leave sin without punishment. Yea, verily he punisheth sin, when in such terror he presseth and afflicteth consciences so strongly with his wrath, as David saith in the 6th Psalm, v. 1, "O Lord, punish me not in thy wrath;" and Jeremiah in the 10th Cap. v. 24, "Punish me, O Lord, yet with grace, not in thy wrath, lest I perish." There he speaks truly of great, unspeakable anguish, and the adversaries themselves confess that repentance can be so bitter and swift that satisfaction is not necessary. Therefore contritio or repentance is more of a torment than satisfactio.

458. For this cause the saints must bear death, and all manner of crosses and afflictions, as others do; as Peter saith, 1 Pet. 4:17: "It is time to look for judgment in the house of God." And though these afflictions are often penance and punishment for sin, yet they have another cause in Christians, namely, that they should drive and exercise Christians, that in temptation they may realize their weak faith, and learn to seek God's help and comfort, as Paul says of himself 2 Cor. 1:8. f.: "When we were weighed down above measure, and above might, so that we determined with ourselves that we should die, lest we should learn to trust in us." And Isaiah [Cap. 26:16] saith, The affliction and anguish wherein they are, and call upon thee, is a discipline unto them; that is, the affliction is a discipline of children, whereby God exerciseth the saints. God also sends us tribulations to kill and dampen the sin that is still left in us, so that we may be regenerated in spirit, as Paul says in Romans 8:10: "The body is dead because of sin," that is, it is being killed more and more every day because of the sin that is still left in the flesh. And death itself serves to put an end to sinful flesh, so that we may rise from the dead all holy and renewed.

459 We are not freed from these afflictions by the satisfactiōss, therefore it cannot be said that the 8uti8ku6tion68 apply to such a cross and affliction, and take away the temporal punishment of sin. For this is certain, that the power of the keys can absolve no man from the cross, or from other common afflictions. And if they would that the word of God should be understood of common afflictions, how then do they teach that one must be satisfied in purgatory?

460. They set before us examples of Adam and David, who was punished for his adultery. From the example they make a Rule, that every sin must have its certain temporal punishment before the sin is forgiven. I have said before that Christians suffer tribulation, by which they are chastened; so they suffer terror in their consciences, many a struggle and temptation; so our Lord God also lays upon some sinners their own penance and punishment, as an example. And the power of the keys has nothing to do with the penalties, but God alone has to interpret and solve them as he wills.

461 Neither doth it follow, whether there be any punishment of his own laid upon David, that there should be a chastisement of purgatory above the common cross and tribulation of all Christians, since every sin hath its degree and measure of chastisement. For it is nowhere found in Scripture that we should not be delivered from eternal torment and death, except by such an acknowledgment of our suffering and satisfaction. But the Scriptures everywhere testify that we obtain forgiveness of sin without merit through Christ, and that Christ alone has overcome sin and death. Wherefore we ought not to put our own merit upon it, nor to mend it. And though Christians must suffer all manner of penalties, punishments, and afflictions, yet the Scriptures show that these are laid upon us to kill and humble the old Adam, not to deliver us from eternal death.

462 Job is excused in the scriptures, because he was not afflicted for some evil deeds. Therefore, afflictions and temptations are not always signs of divine wrath, but the consciences must be diligently instructed so that they may learn to regard afflictions in a different way, namely, as signs of grace, so that they will not think that God has cast them away when they are in affliction. They should look at the other true fruits of the cross, namely, that God attacks us and therefore does a foreign work, as Isaiah says, so that he may have his own work in us; as he gives a long, comforting sermon about this in chapter 28, v. 19 ff. And when the disciples asked about the blind man, John 9:3, Christ says that neither the blind man's parents nor he sinned, but that God's glory and work must be revealed. And so also Jeremiah the prophet saith [Cap. 49, 12:], "They also that are not guilty of it shall drink the cup." 2c. So the prophets are slain, so John Baptist is slain, and other saints.

463 Therefore the tribulations are not always punishments or penalties for past sins, but are works of God, directed to our benefit, that God's strength and power may be the more clearly seen in our weakness, as He is in the midst of the Death can help 2c. So Paul says [1 Cor. 12, 9.1: "God's power and strength can be experienced and seen in weakness." Therefore we are to sacrifice our bodies in God's will, to show our obedience and patience, not to deliver us from eternal death or eternal torment. For God has ordained another treasure, the death of His Son, our Lord Christ.

(464) And thus St. Gregory interprets the example of David, [2 Sam. 12:14] when he says, If God, for the same sin, had forbidden him to be humiliated by his own son, why did he let this happen, since the sin was already forgiven? the answer is, that the forgiveness had taken place, so that the man might not be prevented from receiving eternal life. Nevertheless, the punishment that was inflicted followed, so that he might test him and keep him in humility. So God also put natural death on man, and did not take it away when sin was forgiven, so that those who were forgiven sin and sanctified might be tried and tested. Now it is public that the keys do not take away this common punishment, as war, torment, and such like plagues. Item, that even cmnorücms satisfaciones do not make us free from such plagues, so that our satisfaciones should help or apply to them, if we are already in mortal sins. Also the adversaries themselves confess that they lay up the 8uti8kaetions8 not for such common plagues, but for purgatory. Therefore their 8ati8ka6t1ori68 are vain imaginary dreams.

465. but here some draw upon the saying of Paul, 1 Cor. 11:31: "If we judged ourselves, we should not be judged." From this they conclude: If we would punish ourselves, God would punish more mercifully. Answer: Paul speaks of the punishment of the whole life, not of outward punishment and ceremonies; therefore this saying does nothing for satisfactio. For what does God ask of punishment without correction? Yes, it is an abominable blasphemy to teach that our satisfaction alleviates God's punishment, when it already occurs in mortal sins. Paul speaks of repentance and faith and of the whole correction, and does not speak of the outward punishment alone. Therefore nothing more can be enforced from this, except that if we amend, God will turn away His punishment. This is true, and it is useful, comforting, and necessary to preach that God will relieve the punishment if we mend our ways, as He did with Nineveh. And so Isaiah teaches in chapter 1, v. 18: "If Though your sins be as red as blood, yet shall they be purged away, and be as white as snow, if ye amend." And this amendment is not in the canoniea satisfacione, but in other pieces of repentance, in contrition, in faith, in good works, which follow after faith. But our adversaries interpret these comforting sayings to their lies and jugglery of satisfaction.

466 But that the ancient teachers and fathers remembered the satisfaction, that the concilia were made of the satisfactionibus canones, I have said above, that it was an outward ceremony, and was not the opinion of the fathers, that these ceremonies of repentance should be a blotting out fine of guilt against God, or of chastisement. For though some of the fathers are like them, who think of the fire of sweeping, yet they themselves interpret it, that though it were, it was not salvation from eternal death and torment, which Christ alone does, but that it was a cleansing and sweeping (as they speak) of imperfect souls. Alfo Augustine says: The daily sins are burned and extinguished, as weak faith against God and the like 2c.

(467) It is also found in some places that the Fathers use the word satisfactio or satisfaction, which originally comes from the ceremony of public penitence, as I have said, for the right repentance and killing of the old Adam. Thus Augustine says: The right satisfactio or satisfaction is to cut off the cause of sins, that is, to kill the flesh 2c., item, to tame and mortify the flesh, not that eternal death or punishment may be acknowledged thereby, but that the flesh may not draw us to sins.

468 So Gregory says of the restitution of other men's goods, that it is a false repentance, if we do not do enough for those whose goods we have wrongfully. For he is not sorry that he has stolen, who still steals; for as long as he holds other people's goods, he is a thief or robber. The same satisfaction against those who are guilty shall be made against the same; and of this civil satisfaction there is no need to dispute here. Item, the fathers write that it is enough fei that once in the whole life the puklieu penitence or the public penance happens, of which the eanon68 8ati8ka6tioriurri are made. From this it may be seen that their opinion was not that these canons should be necessary for the forgiveness of sins. For without these ceremonies of public repentance, they otherwise teach much of Christian repentance, since they do not remember the 6an0ii68 sutiskaetioriurri.

469 The asses that have made the confutation,

Saying, that it is not to be suffered that satisfactio should be done against the public gospel. But we have shown this clearly enough before, that these same cmrrioricms sutikknotiori68, that is, such works (as they speak of) as we are not guilty of, are not founded in the Scripture or Gospel. Thus the thing indicates by itself: for if the sati8t'n6tiori68 are works which one is not guilty of, why do they say we teach contrary to the clear gospel? For if it were written in the Gospel that eternal punishment and death were taken away by such works, they were works which one was guilty of doing before God. But they speak in such a way as to make a pretence before the noses of the inexperienced, and they use sayings of the holy Scriptures which speak of right Christian works which we owe, while they base their satisfaction on works which we do not owe, and which they call opera non debita. They teach, and even admit in their schools, that such satisfaction can be remitted without mortal sin. Therefore it is false that they say that the clear gospel is able to make one keep the sati8tnotionW.

(470) Further, we have often said that righteous repentance cannot be without good works and fruits. The Ten Commandments teach us what good works require, namely, to truly and most sincerely esteem, fear, and love God the Lord, to cheerfully call upon Him in times of need, to always give thanks to Him, to confess His word, to hear the same word, and to comfort others with it, To be obedient to parents and authorities, to faithfully attend to his office and profession, not to be bitter, not to be hateful, not to kill, but to comfort, to be kind to one's neighbor, to help the poor according to one's ability, not to fornicate, not to commit adultery, but to keep the flesh in check at all times. And all this, not to do enough for eternal death or eternal torment, which is due to Christ alone, but to do it in such a way that the devil is not given room, and God is angered and the Holy Spirit is grieved and displeased. These fruits and good works are commanded by God and have their rewards, and for the sake of God's glory and divine commandment, they are to be done.

471 But that the eternal punishments are not remitted otherwise, than only by satisfaction in purgatory, or some good works of human tradition, the holy scripture saith nowhere of this. By means of indulgences, such penances and satisfactions as are imposed are acknowledged to the penitents, so that the people are not so much burdened. Have now men power, which satis

If a man is to remit the punishment or chastisement imposed on him, this satisfactio is not commanded by God. For a man cannot disobey a divine command and commandment.

472 But since the old way of public penance and pardon has long since been done away with, which the bishops have allowed to happen from one time to another, indulgences are not necessary, and yet the name iriäulMiitia, or indulgence, has remained in the church. Just as the word 8nti8kuetio is understood otherwise than for a church ordinance and ceremony, so the word Jndulgenz, or indulgence, has also been wrongly interpreted, and construed for such grace and indulgence, by which souls are delivered out of purgatory, when yet the whole power of the keys in the church extends no further than here on earth alone, as the text reads, "What thou shalt bind on earth, that shall be bound in heaven. What thou shalt loose on earth, that shall be loosed in heaven."

473 So the power of the keys is not such a power as to establish peculiar punishment or worship of their own, but only to forgive sin; to bind is not to forgive sin. For Christ speaks of a spiritual kingdom, and GOD has commanded to absolve from sins those who are converted, as Paul says, "Authority is given to us to edify, and not to break down" [2 Cor. 10:8.]

474 Therefore also the r686rvutio eakuuni, that is, in which the pope and the bishops reserve some cases, is an external, worldly thing. For they reserve to them the ak)8o1utio a posna cmrrioricm, not of guilt against God. Therefore the adversaries teach rightly, since they themselves confess and say that at the hour of death such a rksrvutio or reservation should not hinder right Christian absolution.

475 We have herewith presented the summa of our doctrine of repentance, and know, indeed, that the same is quite useful and highly necessary to Christian and pious hearts. And if God-fearing, pious, respectable people will consider this most important matter according to necessity, and hold this doctrine of ours, and indeed of Christ and the apostles, against so much unsophisticated, confused, childish disputation and books of the adversaries, they will find that they have omitted the very highest, most necessary part, namely, faith in Christ, without which no one can teach or learn anything righteous, Christian, through which alone the consciences may have right consolation. They will also see that the adversaries invent much from their own brains about the merit of attrition, about the narration of the sin, about satisfaction, all of which is unfounded in Scripture, and neither sufficient above nor below, which the adversaries themselves do not understand.

Article XIII. (VII.) Of the Sacraments and their right use.

476. in the thirteenth article, the adversaries allow them to say that the sacraments are not bad signs, by which people know one another, as slogans in war and court scar 2c., but are powerful signs and certain testimonies of divine grace and will toward us, by which God reminds and strengthens our hearts to believe all the more surely and joyfully.

477 But here they would have us confess that there are seven sacraments in number, neither more nor less. Then we say, that it is necessary to preserve these ceremonies and sacraments, which God has instituted by his word, how many and in what number they are. But of this number of the seven sacraments it is found that the fathers themselves did not count them equally, so that these seven ceremonies are not all equally necessary.

478 If we call sacraments the outward signs and ceremonies which have God's command, and have a divine promise of grace attached to them, we may soon conclude what sacraments are. For ceremonies and other outward things instituted by men are not sacraments in this way. For men without command have not God's grace to promise. Therefore signs which are instituted without God's command are not signs of grace, though they may otherwise bring to the remembrance of children and rude people, as a painted cross.

479 So the proper sacraments are baptism and the Lord's supper, and absolution. For these have the command of God, and also the promise of grace, which actually belongs to the New Testament, and is the New Testament. For this is the purpose of the outward signs, that thereby the hearts may be moved, namely, by the word and outward signs at the same time, that they may believe when we are baptized, when we receive the body of the Lord, that God truly wants to be gracious to us through Christ, as Paul says [Rom. 10:17]: "Faith is of hearing." But as the word entereth into the ears, so the outward sign is set before the eyes, to stir up the heart inwardly, and to move it to faith; for the word and the outward sign are the only things that can be done.

Signs work in the heart in one way or another, as Augustine spoke a fine word. The sacrament, he says, is a visible word, for the outward sign is like 1) a painting, by which is signified that which is preached by the word. Therefore they both signify the same thing.

(480) But the oonürrnutio and the last rites are ceremonies which are of ancient origin, and which the church has never considered necessary for salvation. For they do not have God's command or commandment. Therefore, it is well to distinguish these from the above-mentioned ceremonies, which are instituted and commanded by the Word of God and have a pledge of God attached to them.

481 By the sacrament of the order, or priesthood, the adversaries do not understand the ministry of preaching, and the ministry of administering and administering the sacraments, but understand it of priests, who are ordained to sacrifice. As if there should be a priesthood in the New Testament, as there was in the Levitical priesthood, where the priests sacrifice for the people, and obtain forgiveness of sins for others. But we teach that the one sacrifice of Christ on the cross was enough for all the sin of the world, and that we have no need of another sacrifice for sin. For we have not in the New Testament such a priesthood as the Levitical priesthood was, as the epistle to the Hebrews teacheth.

482 But if one would call the sacrament of the order a sacrament of the ministry of preaching and the gospel, there would be no objection to calling ordination a sacrament. For the office of preaching was instituted and commanded by God, and has the glorious promise of God, Rom. 1:16: "The gospel is the power of God to all those who believe in it." 2c. Isa. 55, 11: "The word that goeth out of my mouth shall not return unto me void, but shall do that which is right in my sight."

(483) If the sacrament of the order were thus to be understood, the laying on of hands might also be called a sacrament. For the church has God's command that it should appoint preachers and deacons. Since this is very comforting when we know that God wants to preach and work through men and those who are elected by men, it is good that such election be highly praised and honored, especially against the devilish Anabaptists, who despise and blaspheme such election along with the ministry of preaching and the bodily word.

484 But the conjugal estate was not first instituted in the new testament, but soon as the

1)	"Like"	is	missing	in	Müller.	Latin:	quasi.
----	--------	----	---------	----	---------	--------	---------------

He is also commanded and commanded by God. It also has divine promises, which do not really belong to the New Testament, but rather concern bodily life. Therefore, if someone wants to call it a sacrament, we do not contest it highly. But let it nevertheless be separated from the two preceding, which are the proper signs and seals of the new testament. For if the marriage state alone should be called a sacrament because God has instituted and commanded it, then the other offices and states should also be called sacraments, which also go by God's word and command, as authorities or magistrates 2c.

485 And finally, if all things were to be called sacraments with such a glorious title, because they have God's word and command, then prayer should be called a sacrament above all others, for there is a strong command of God and a much more glorious, divine promise. It would also be justified, for if prayer were given such a great title, people would be encouraged to pray. Alms might also be counted among the sacraments. Item, the cross and the tribulation of Christians. For they also have God's promise. But no prudent man will make a great dispute as to whether seven or more sacraments are to be counted, so far, however, as not to interrupt God's word and command.

486 But this is more needful to dispute, and to know what is the right use of the sacraments. We must freely condemn all the Scholasticorum, and punish their error, since 1) they teach that those who use the sacraments badly, if they do not set odioona, obtain God's grace ex opere operato, if the heart then has no good thoughts. This, however, is a Jewish error, which they hold, that we should be justified and sanctified by a work and an outward ceremony, without faith, and if the heart is not already in it, and yet this harmful doctrine is preached and taught far and wide, absolutely and everywhere in the whole of Pabst's kingdom and Pabst's church. Paul cries out against this and says [Rom. 4:11] that Abraham was justified before God, not through circumcision, but that circumcision was a sign to exercise and strengthen faith. Therefore we also say that to the right use of the sacraments belongs faith, which believes the divine promise, and receives promised grace, which is offered through sacrament and word. And this is a certain, right

1) Müller: "that". Latin: qui ckoeent.

Custom of the holy sacraments, since a heart and a conscience may dare and let themselves be. For no one can grasp the divine promise except through faith alone. And the sacraments are outward signs and seals of the promise.

487 Therefore, the proper use of the same requires faith. When I receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, Christ clearly says, "This is the new testament. Then shall I believe assuredly that grace and remission of sins, which is promised in the new testament, shall be given me. And this I shall receive in faith, and with it comfort my frightened, stupid conscience, and stand sure that God's word and promise are not lacking, but be as sure, and even more sure, as if God had given me a new voice, or new miraculous signs from heaven, by which grace would be promised to me. But what good are miraculous signs if there is no faith? And we are speaking here of faith, since I certainly believe for myself that my sins are forgiven, not only of Udo Moorali, since I believe that there is a God. The same right use of the sacraments is quite comforting and refreshes the conscience.

488 But what the ugly, shameful, ungodly doctrine of the opere operato, which teaches that if I use the sacraments, the work done makes me pious before God and obtains me grace, even though the heart has no good thoughts about it, has introduced for abuse and error, no one can think, write, or say enough. For that is where the unspeakable, innumerable, horrible abuse of the masses came from. And they cannot point to a single tittle or letter from the ancient Fathers that proves the scholastic opinion; indeed, Augustine says flatly against it that faith in the use of the sacrament, not the sacrament, makes us pious before God.

Article XIV. Of the Church Government.

489 In the fourteenth article, where we say that no one shall be permitted to preach, or to administer the sacraments in the church, but only those who are duly called, which they accept, if we understand the calling thus of priests, who are ordained or consecrated according to the contents of the Canonum. We have let ourselves be heard of this matter several times at this Imperial Diet, that we are highly inclined to help preserve the old church order and the bishops' rule, which is called oarionioarn politianp, if the bishops would tolerate our doctrine and accept our priests.

490 Now the bishops have hitherto persecuted ours, and murdered them against their own rights. Thus we cannot yet obtain that they desist from such tyranny. Therefore it is our fault that the bishops are deprived of their obedience, and we are excused before God and all pious people. For since the bishops will not tolerate ours, for they forsake this doctrine which we have confessed, and yet we owe it to God to confess and maintain this doctrine, we must let the bishops go, and be more obedient to God, and know that the Christian Church is there, where God's Word is rightly taught. Let the bishops see how they will answer for it, that 1) by such tyranny they tear the churches apart and make them desolate.

Article XV. (VIII.) Of the human statutes in the church.

(491) In the fifteenth article they allow them, because we say that ceremonies and statutes are to be kept in the church, which may be kept with a good conscience without sin, and which serve for good order and peace. The other part they condemn, because we say that the statutes, which are established to propitiate God and to obtain forgiveness of sins, are strictly contrary to the gospel. Although we have said much in the Confession about the difference between food and ordinances, we must briefly repeat it here.

492 Although we thought that the adversaries would seek other causes to protect human statutes, we would not have thought that they should condemn this article, namely, that through human tradition no one deserves forgiveness of sin. But because the same whole article is unashamedly condemned, we have an easy bad thing. For this is publicly Jewish, that is, publicly suppressing the gospel with the devil's doctrine. For the Scriptures and Paul only call such doctrines true doctrines of the devil when they are praised for serving to obtain forgiveness of sin. For then they are contrary to Christ, contrary to the gospel, as fire and water are contrary to one another.

493 The gospel teaches that through faith in Christ we receive forgiveness of sins without merit and are reconciled to God. But the adversaries set up another mediator, namely, the laws of men, by which they seek forgiveness.

1) So the Jenaer. Müller: da.

They want to obtain the forgiveness of sin, through which they want to appease the wrath of God. But Christ clearly says, "They serve me in vain by the commandment of men."

(494) We have above abundantly shown that we are justified before God by faith, when we believe that we have a gracious God, not by our works, but by Christ. Now it is quite certain that this is the pure gospel. For Paul clearly says to the Ephesians in chapter 2, v. 8: "Without merit you have been saved; and that not of yourselves, for it is the gift of God, not of works." Now the adversaries say people deserve forgiveness of sins by such human statutes and works. What is this but to place and set over Christ another Mediator, another Reconciler? Paul says to the Galatians, "Ye are fallen away from Christ, if ye would be justified by the law," that is, if ye think that ye are justified before God by the law, Christ is of no use to you. For what may those of Christ's mediator who trust in the works of the law to propitiate God? God has presented Christ to be gracious to us for the sake of the same Mediator, not for the sake of our righteousness. But they think that God is gracious to us for the sake of their works and for the sake of this tradition. So now they take and rob Christ of his honor, and there is no difference between the ceremonies of the law of Moses and such statutes, as far as this matter is concerned. Paul rejects the ceremonies of Moses for the very reason that he rejects the commandments of men, namely, that the Jews considered them to be works for the remission of sins. For thereby Christ was oppressed. For this reason he rejects both the works of the law and the commandment of men, and contends that the forgiveness of sins is not promised for our works, but for Christ's sake without merit, so that we may receive it through faith. For the promise cannot be grasped otherwise than by faith.

495. If therefore we obtain forgiveness of sins by faith, if by faith we have a gracious God for Christ's sake, it is a great error and blasphemy that we should obtain forgiveness of sins by such statutes.

496 If then they say that we do not obtain forgiveness of sins by such works, but that if we have forgiveness now by faith, we shall then by such works merit that God be gracious to us. But Paul contends against this, to the

Galatians, 2 Cap. v. 17, where he says, "But if we, who seek to be justified by Christ, should yet be found sinners ourselves, Christ would be a minister of sin." Item sCap. 3, 15.], "To a man's testament let no man add." Therefore, even to the testament of God, when He promises us that He will be gracious to us for Christ's sake, nothing should be added, nor should this be hinted at, as if we first deserve that God should be gracious to us for the sake of such works.

497. And if anyone would still establish or choose such works to propitiate God, to earn forgiveness of sin, how would he be sure that the works pleased God, if he had neither God's command nor His word about them? How will he assure the consciences and hearts how they stand with God? Item, that the works are pleasing to God, if there is no word of God nor command?

498. The prophets forbid everywhere to establish their own, chosen, special worship without God's word and command, Ezek. 20, 18: "Walk not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their customs, nor be defiled by their idols. I am the LORD your God, walk in my commandments, and keep my statutes and my judgments, and do them." If men have power to worship, that we may thereby pay for sin and become godly before God, then all the worship of the heathen, all the idolatry of all the ungodly kings of Israel, Jeroboam and others, must also be good. For there is no difference. If there be power in men to establish worship, that they may obtain salvation, why should the worship of the Gentiles and Israelites, which they have chosen themselves, be unjust? For therefore are the services of the Gentiles and Israelites rejected, because they would think that such services pleased God, and knew nothing of the highest service, which is called faith. How can we be sure that such services and works without God's Word make one righteous before God, if no man can know or experience God's will other than by His Word alone? How, then, if such worship services are not only despised by God the Lord, but also considered an abomination? How then may the adversaries say that they justify themselves before God? Without God's word, no one can ever say that. Paul says to the Romans [Cap. 14, 23.], "All things that are not of faith are sin." Now if these same services have no divine command, the hearts must be in doubt as to whether they please God.

499 And what may this public matter of many words? When the adversaries defend these services as if they were works that merit forgiveness of sins and salvation, they are setting up a public antichristian doctrine and kingdom. For the kingdom of Antichrist is actually a new worship service invented by men, by which Christ is rejected, just as Mahomet's kingdom has its own worship services, its own works, by which they pretend to become holy and righteous before God, and do not believe that one is justified by faith alone in Christ.

(500) Thus the ministry also becomes a part of the kingdom of Antichrist, if it teaches to obtain forgiveness of sins by the commandment of men, and to make atonement to God. For Christ's glory is taken away when they teach that we are not justified by Christ without merit through faith, but through such worship services, especially when they teach that such self-chosen worship services are not only useful, but also necessary, as they hold in the eighth article above, where they condemn that we have said that it is not necessary for the right unity of the church that there should be uniform statutes of men everywhere. Daniel, in the eleventh chapter, v. 38, describes the kingdom of Antichrist in this way, indicating that such new services, invented by men, would be the xolUio, and the true essence of the Antichristian kingdom. For thus he saith, "The God of Maosim shall he honour, and the God whom his fathers knew not, shall he serve with gold, and silver, and precious stones." There he describes such new services, for he says of such a God, of whom the fathers knew nothing.

501 For the holy fathers, though they had ceremonies and ordinances, yet did they not think that such ceremonies were useful and necessary to salvation, yet they did not thereby subdue Christ, but taught that God was gracious to us for Christ's sake, not for the sake of such services. But they kept the same ordinances for the sake of bodily exercise, as feasts, so that the people, when they came together, would know that everything in the churches was done properly and chastely, for the sake of good examples, so that even the common, coarse people would be kept in fine child discipline. For such a difference in time and such various services serve to keep the people in discipline and to remind them of history. These were the reasons the fathers had for keeping the people in order.

0502 Neither in this manner do we dispute that good custom should be kept. And we may-

We are not surprised enough that the adversaries are allowed to teach against all the Scriptures of the apostles, against the Old and New Testaments, that we should obtain eternal salvation and forgiveness of sins through such worship. For what is this but, as Daniel says, to honor God with gold, silver, and precious stones, that is, to hold that God will be gracious to us through various church decorations, through flags, candles, such as are innumerable in such statutes of men? Paul writes to the Colossians [Cap. 2, 23.] that such statutes have an appearance of wisdom. And has also a great appearance, as if it were almost holy, for disorder is evil, and such orderly child discipline is useful in the church 2c. But because human reason does not understand what faith is, those who judge by reason fall into it from the beginning, and make such a work of it as shall help us to heaven, and reconcile us to God.

503 So the falsities and pernicious idolatries were broken down among the children of Israel. Therefore they made one worship above another, as in our time one altar is set up above another, one church above another. So also human reason judges of other bodily exercises than fasting 2c. For fasting serves to tame the old Adam; reason soon falls upon it and makes a work out of it that reconciles God, as Thomas writes, fasting is a work that is suitable to erase guilt against God and to prevent it further. These are the clear words of St. Thomas. So these services, which are very glittering, have a great appearance and a great reputation for holiness before the people. And now the examples of the saints help this, when they say, St. Francis wore a cap, and the like. Here they look only at the outward practice, not at the heart and faith.

504 And when men are thus deceived by so great and splendid an appearance of holiness, innumerable dangers and mischief follow therefrom, namely, that the knowledge of Christ and the gospel are forgotten, and that all confidence is placed in such works. Moreover, through such hypocritical works, the true good works that God demands in the Ten Commandments are completely suppressed (which is terrible to hear). For the works must only be called spiritual, holy, perfect life, and are then far preferred to the right, holy good works, since each one must walk according to God's commandment in his profession, to rule the authorities diligently, faithfully, the fathers of the house, the married people, wife and child, servants,

...to keep them in Christian discipline... This is the case when a servant is obliged to serve his master faithfully. These works are not considered divine, but worldly, so that many people have a heavy conscience about them. For it is known that some people have left their princely state, and some have left their married state, and have gone into monasteries to become holy and spiritual.

505 And over and above the error there is the misery that, when men are under the delusion that such statutes are necessary to salvation, their consciences are in unrest and torment without ceasing, because they have not kept their orders, their monasticism, and their established works so strictly. For who could tell all the statutes? There are innumerable books in which not one tittle, not one syllabus, is written of Christ, of faith, or of the right good works which God gives, which each one is obliged to do according to his profession, but of such statutes alone do they write as, to grasp the forty days, to hear mass, to pray four tides 2c. There is no end to interpretation and dispensation.

506 How miserably the good pious man Gerson agonizes, writhes, and wriggles over these things, since he would gladly help the consciences with the right consolation, since he seeks prisesptoruru8 and latituäiri68 how far these commandments bind, and yet cannot find a certain degree, since he may assure the heart of security and peace. For this reason he also complains quite vehemently how much danger the consciences and consciences are in because such statutes are demanded in the case of a mortal sin and want to be kept.

507 But against such hypocritical, glittering statutes, by which much is touched, and by which the consciences are miserably troubled without cause, we are to arm ourselves and strengthen ourselves with the word of God. And let us first of all be sure that forgiveness of sin is not earned by such statutes. We have the apostle above, to Colossians [Cap. 2, 16.]: "Let no man make you conscience of meat, of drink, of new moons, of sabbaths." And the apostle wants the whole law of Moses and such tradition to be understood at the same time, so that the opponents would not fall asleep here, as they tend to do, as if Paul were speaking only of the law of Moses. But he indicates clearly enough that he also speaks of human statutes. Although the opponents themselves do not know what they are saying. For if the gospel and Paul clearly declare that even the ceremonies and works of the law of Moses do not help in the sight of God, much less do human statutes.

For this reason the bishops have neither power nor authority to establish their own chosen services, which are to make the people holy and devout before God. For the apostles also say, Apost. 15,10: "Why do you tempt God and put a burden on the disciples" 2c. Peter chides it as a great sin to blaspheme and tempt God. Therefore it is the apostle's opinion that this freedom should remain in the church, that no ceremonies, neither the law of Moses nor other statutes, should be valued as necessary services, as some ceremonies in the law of Moses had to be held as necessary in the Old Testament for a time. Therefore we must also prevent the preaching of grace and of Christ, of the forgiveness of sins by grace alone, from being suppressed, and the harmful error from taking hold, as if the ordinances were necessary to be pious before God.

509. there have been Gerson, and many other faithful pious people, who have borne compassion over the great peril of consciences, and

They have sought relief, how they might help their consciences, so that they would not be tortured by tradition in such manifold ways, and have been unable to find anything certain to help their consciences out of their bonds. The Scriptures and the apostles, however, have briefly gone over all this, and with a single stroke have badly rejected it, and have clearly and plainly declared that in Christ we are free from all traditions, especially when we seek thereby to attain salvation and the forgiveness of sin. For this reason the apostles also teach that the harmful Pharisaic doctrine is to be resisted with doctrines and with the counter-example.

(510) Therefore we teach that such statutes do not make one righteous in the sight of God, nor are they necessary for salvation, nor should anyone make or accept such statutes in the belief that he will thereby become righteous in the sight of God. But he who will keep them, let him keep them, as I might keep another city custom, where I dwell, without all confidence that I shall thereby be justified before God. I consider it a custom of the land that I wear German clothing among the Germans and French clothing among the French, and I will not be saved by it.

511 The apostles, as the gospel signifieth, freshly break such statutes, and are commended of Christ for it. For it is necessary to show and prove to the Pharisees, not only by teaching and preaching, but also by deed, that such worship is of no use for salvation.

1) Müller and the Jenaers: are.

And therefore, although ours omit some traditions and ceremonies, they are sufficiently excused. For the bishops demand such things as necessary for salvation. This is an error that is not to be suffered.

512] Further, the oldest statutes in the church, as the three high feasts, 2c., the Sunday celebration, and the like, which were invented for the sake of good order, unity, and peace, 2c., we gladly keep. Even so ours preach it most gently to the people, but besides this they say that it does not make them righteous in the sight of God. Therefore the adversaries speak their authority, and do us all wrong in the sight of God, when they blame us for taking away and putting down all good ceremonies, all order in the church. For we may say it with truth, that it is more Christian and honest in our churches with right services, than with the adversaries. And where there are God-fearing, respectable, understanding, impartial people, who want to consider and look at this matter quite carefully, we hold the old Canons and iii6iit6m IsZis more, purer, and more diligently, than the adversaries. For the adversaries brazenly trample under foot the most honest canons, as they do Christ and the Gospel. The priests and monks in the monasteries abuse the Masses in the most horrible and atrocious manner, holding masses in great numbers every day, solely for the sake of interest, for the sake of money, for the sake of their shameful bellies. Thus they sing the psalms in pens, not that they study, or pray earnestly (for the greater part understand not one verse in psalms), but keep their matins and vespers as a proper service, which carries them their pensions and interest. All this they cannot deny. Even some of the righteous among them are ashamed of this fair, and say: 6lsru8 may be a reformation.

(513) But with us the people need the holy sacrament willingly, unrestrainedly, every Sunday, who are first questioned whether they are instructed in Christian doctrine, know or understand something in the Lord's Prayer, in the faith, and in the ten commandments. Item, the youth and the people sing Latin and German psalms properly, so that they get used to the sayings of the Scriptures and learn to pray. With the adversaries there is no catechism, since the canons speak of it. With us the canons are kept, that the pastors and church servants, publicly and at home, instruct the children and youth in God's word. And the catechism is not a child's note, like carrying flags and candles, but an almost useful instruction.

514 Among the adversaries, in many countries, as in Italy and Hispania, 2c. there is no preaching throughout the whole year, but only during Lent. Then they should cry out and complain with a loud voice, for this means that all services are overturned at once. For the greatest, holiest, most necessary, highest service, which God has demanded as the greatest in the first and second commandments, is to preach God's word. For the office of preaching is the highest office in the church; now, if the service of God is omitted, how can there be knowledge of God, the doctrine of Christ, or the gospel? Therefore, though they preach during Lent, or at any other time, they teach nothing, but of such statutes of men, of calling on the saints, of holy water, and of such foolish works; and the use is, that their people, when the text of the Gospel is spoken, soon run out of the church, which may begin by not having heard the other lies. Now some few of them also begin to preach of good works. But of the knowledge of Christ, of faith, of the consolation of consciences, they can preach nothing; but the same blessed doctrine, the dear holy gospel, they call Lutheran.

515 But in our church preachers teach these following necessary things with the greatest diligence: of right repentance, of the fear of God, of faith, what it is, of the knowledge of Christ, of righteousness, which comes from faith. How consciences should seek comfort in anguish and temptation, how faith must be exercised through all kinds of temptation, what is right prayer, how one should pray. Item, that a Christian should certainly comfort himself that his cries and petitions will be heard by God in heaven. About the holy cross, about obedience to the authorities. How every man of good estate may live and conduct himself in a Christian manner, in obedience to the commandments of the Lord, to all worldly rules and laws. How to distinguish the spiritual kingdom of Christ from the regiments and kingdoms of the world, from the state of marriage, and how to conduct it in a Christian manner, from the Christian discipline of children, from chastity, and from all kinds of works of love toward one's neighbor. Thus our church is equipped with doctrine and conduct, from which impartial people can easily notice and accept that we do not reject Christian, right ceremonies, but maintain them with diligence in the most faithful way.

516. and the mortification of the flesh, or old Adam, we teach thus, as our confession declares, that the right mortification takes place when God breaks our will, cross and tribulation. that we learn to be obedient to His will, as Paul says to the Romans on the 12th [v. 1.]: "Commit your own bodies to a holy sacrifice." And these are right, holy mortifications, thus in tribulations learning to know God, fearing Him, loving Him 2c. Above these afflictions, which are not in our will, are also the bodily exercises, since Christ says of them, "Take heed that your bodies be not weighed down with eating and drinking" [Luc. 21:34.]. And Paul to the Corinthians [1 Ep. 9, 27.], "I tame my body" 2c. The exercises are to be done, not that they are necessary divine services, by which one becomes pious before God, but that we keep our flesh in check, so that through gluttony and burdening of the body we do not become secure and idle, following the devil's temptations and the lusts of the flesh. This fasting and fasting should not only be done for a certain time, but all the time. For God wants us to live moderately and soberly at all times. And as experience shows, certain days of fasting do not help much in this regard. For with fishes and all kinds of fasting food one has done more intemperance and quaffing than apart from the fasts. And the adversaries themselves have never kept fasts in the manner indicated in ounoiridus.

(517) This article of human tradition or statute has been the subject of much heavy disputation and questioning, and experience has given it too much to be true that such statutes are heavy chains and cords to torment the consciences miserably. For when there is this delusion that they are necessary to salvation, they torment a poor conscience beyond all measure, as pious hearts well experience when they have omitted a Complet in Uori8 eurionieis 2c., or have done the like against it. Again, to teach liberty generally, has also its concern and question, according to which the common people need outward discipline and instruction.

518. But the adversaries themselves make this thing certain and bad. For they condemn us because we teach that by human statutes we do not merit forgiveness of sin before God. Item, they want to have their statutes kept throughout the whole church, badly as necessary, and put them in the place of Christ. Here we have a strong patron saint, the apostle Paul, who argues in all places that such statutes do not justify before God and are not necessary for salvation.

519. ours also teach clearly and plainly, that Christian liberty in things ought to be used in such a way, that before the weak, as they are

That they which are not instructed in these things cause no offence, and that they which abuse liberty deter not the weak from the doctrine of the gospel. Therefore our preachers also teach that nothing should be changed in the church customs without special and moving causes, but for the sake of peace and unity those customs should be kept which can be kept without sin and without burdening the consciences. And on this Augsburg feast day we found ourselves and let ourselves be heard immediately enough, that for love's sake we wanted to be unburdened to keep some uUiupUoru with the others. For we have also well considered among ourselves that common unity and peace, as much as these could be maintained without burdening consciences, would be justly preferred to all other minor things. But of all this we shall speak further hereafter, when we shall treat of monastic vows and of the potsstats soolssiustiou.

Article XVI. Of the Secular Regiment.

520) The XVI article the adversaries leave to them without any further question, since we say and teach in the Confession that a Christian may be in authority with God and conscience, govern land and people, pronounce judgment and law, from imperial and other common rights, punish evildoers with the sword and otherwise according to severity, wage wars, buy and sell, have and keep house, farm and other property, swear oaths taken in courts. In sum, we teach that authority and government, item, their right and punishment, and everything that belongs to it, are good creatures of God and God's order, which a Christian may use with a good conscience. This article pleases them well.

(521) This very important and necessary article, concerning the difference between the spiritual kingdom of Christ and the temporal kingdom, which is almost necessary to know, has been given by ours in a very proper, correct, and clear way, to the great comfort of many consciences. For we have clearly taught that Christ's kingdom is spiritual, since he reigns through the Word and the preaching, works through the Holy Spirit, and fosters in us faith, godliness, love, patience inwardly in the heart, and here on earth sows in us God's kingdom and eternal life. But as long as this life endureth, he nevertheless maketh us need of the laws, of the ordinances, and of the professions which are in the world, according to which every man's profession is, even as he maketh us need of medicines, of things, of building and planting, of the air, and of the water.

And the gospel bringeth not new law into the government of the world, but commandeth, and would have us, that we should be obedient to the laws, and to the authorities under whom we dwell, whether they be Gentiles or Christians; and that in such obedience we should shew our love. For Carolostadius was mad and foolish in this matter, in that he taught that according to the law of Moses one ought to order the city and country regiments.

522 For this reason, ours have written about it all the more diligently. For the monks had taught many and very harmful errors in the church. For they called this an evangelical life, that one should not have one's own, that one should not practice punishment and vengeance, that one should not have a wife and child. Such teaching has quite suppressed the pure evangelical doctrine, that one has not understood at all what is Christian or the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and have boiled worldly and spiritual kingdom into one another, from which much unrighteousness and seditious, harmful teaching has resulted 2c. For the gospel does not tear up worldly government, housekeeping, buying, selling, and other worldly police, but confirms authority and government, and commands to be obedient to the same as God's order, not only for the sake of punishment, but also for the sake of conscience.

(523) Julianus Apostata, Celsus, and some others, have reproached the Christians that their gospel was tearing and breaking up the regiments and police of the world, because it forbade not to take vengeance, and the like. And the same questions have caused much trouble to Origen, Nazianzeno, and some others, so that it is easy to answer them, if only we know that the evangelical doctrine does not make new laws of world regiments, but preaches forgiveness of sin, and that the spiritual kingdom and eternal life begin in the heart of the believer.

524. But the gospel not only leaves the same outward police, world government and order, but also wants us to be obedient to them, just as in this temporal life we are to be obedient and subject to the common course of nature as God's order. We let it become winter and summer 2c. This does not hinder the spiritual kingdom. The gospel alone bequeaths privularn vinäiotuni, that no one may encroach upon the office of the authorities. And this is why Christ so often indicates that the apostles did not think that they should become world rulers, and take the kingdoms and authorities from those who were the time in dominions, as the Jews thought of the kingdom of Messiah.

But that they might know that their office was to preach the spiritual kingdom, not to change the government of the world. Therefore the commandment of Christ to avenge Himself is not only a counsel but a serious commandment, Matth. 5, 39. and Rom. 12, 19.

525 But the vengeance and punishment of evil, which is done by the authorities, is not forbidden, but rather commanded, for it is God's work, as Paul says in Romans 13:1, 2. The same vengeance is wrought in punishing evildoers, in waging war for the sake of public peace, in using swords, horses, and armor 2c. Some teachers have taught such harmful errors about these things that all princes, lords, knights, and servants have considered their rightful position to be worldly, ungodly, and condemned 2c. And it is not easy to explain in words what unspeakable harm and damage to souls and consciences this has caused. For they have taught as if the gospel and Christian doctrine were all monastic life, and have not seen that the gospel teaches how to be saved from sin, hell, and the devil in the sight of God and in conscience, and by heart leave the world their rule in outward things.

(526) This also has been a lie and a deceit, that they have taught impudently that Christian perfection consists in having nothing of one's own. For Christian perfection does not consist in being outwardly pious and in separating myself from the world, but in faith and the true fear of God in the heart. For Abraham, David, and Daniel were of royal rank, held great princely offices, and had great riches; yet they were holier and more perfect than any monk or Carthusian that ever lived on earth.

527 But the monks, especially the barefooted, have made a pretence before the eyes of the people, and no man hath known wherein true holiness is. For how highly evangelical, how great holiness the monks alone have praised this, that one should have nothing of one's own, that one should be willingly poor. But these are very harmful doctrines, since Scripture says nothing about them, but teaches them directly against them. The Ten Commandments of God clearly state, "Thou shalt not steal." God is relenting, so that each one may have what is his own.

528 In this matter, Wiclefus has raged, insisting that no bishop or priest should have anything of his own. Thus are innumerable, confused disputations of contracts, Since Christian consciences can never be satisfied, they have been instructed in this necessary matter, so that a Christian with a good conscience may abide by the law and customs of the land. For this instruction saves many consciences, since we teach that the contracts are without danger in the sight of God, as long as they are accepted in the common laws and customs of the land, which are equal to the laws.

529 This high, necessary article, namely, of authority, of the laws of the world, is given by ours quite clearly and correctly, so that many great, high, honorable men, who according to their station have to deal with regiments, and are in great dealings, confess that their consciences have received noticeable consolation, who before suffered unspeakable anguish through such errors of the monks, and were in doubt whether their stations were also Christian, and whether the gospel would yield such.

530 We have told this so that even the strangers, enemies, and friends may understand that through this doctrine the authorities, land regiment, imperial law, and others are not cast down, but rather highly honored and protected. That also this doctrine first gives right instruction, how a glorious, great office, full of Christian good works, is the office of the regiment, 2c. which all before was held by the hypocritical monastic doctrine for sinful, worldly states, life and being, to unspeakable peril of the conscience. For the monks have invented such hypocrisy, praised and held their humility and poverty much higher than that of princes and lords, fathers, mothers, and fathers of households, even though these ranks have God's word and command, while monasticism has no command from God.

Article XVII. From the Second Coming of Christ to Judgment.

531 The XVII article is accepted by the adversaries, because we confess that Christ will come at the last day, raise the dead, give eternal life and joy to the pious, and condemn the wicked to eternal torment with the devil.

Article XVIII. Of free will.

532. The adversaries accept the XVIIIth Article, about free will, although they use several sayings of Scripture that do not rhyme with the matter. They also make a great clamor that free will should not be exalted too high, as the Pelagians do; so it should not be taken too much with the Manichees. Yes, all well said. But what is the difference between the Pelagians and our adversaries? They both teach that without the Holy Spirit men can love God, keep God's commandments, and do works by natural reason, without the Holy Spirit, thereby earning the grace of God.

533 How many innumerable errors result from this Pelagian doctrine, which, nevertheless, they practice and preach very strongly in their schools. Augustine of Paul most vehemently refuted these errors, which opinion we have set forth above in de justificatione. And we also say that reason has a certain amount of free will. For in those things which can be grasped and understood by reason, we have a free will. There is in us a capacity to live outwardly honorably, to speak of God, to perform outward worship or sacred acts, to obey authorities and parents, not to steal, not to kill. For since, after Adam's fall, natural reason remains, that I know evil and good in things that can be understood by sense and reason, so also is to some extent the ability of our free will to live honorably or dishonorably. This is what the Scriptures call the righteousness of the flesh, which reason is able to do to some extent without the Holy Spirit, although the inherent evil desire is so powerful that men follow it more often than reason, and the devil, who, as Paul says, works powerfully in the ungodly, without ceasing provokes the poor, weak nature to all sins.

534 And this is the cause why few also lead an honourable life according to natural reason, as we see that even few philosophers, who nevertheless strive hard after it, have rightly led an honourable outward life. But this is false and fancied, that those should be without sin who do such works apart from grace, or that such good works should merit forgiveness of sins and grace. For such hearts as are without the Holy Spirit are without fear of God, without faith, without trust, not believing that God will hear them, that He will forgive their sins, that He will help them in trouble; therefore they are ungodly.

535 Now an evil tree cannot bear good fruit, and without faith no one can please God. Wherefore, though we concede that it is in our power to do such an outward work, yet we say that free will and reason are not able to do anything in spiritual things, that is, they are not able to do anything in spiritual things. To truly believe in God, to rely on God to be with us, to hear us, to forgive our sins 2c. For these are the right, high, noblest good works of the first table in the Ten Commandments, which no human heart is able to do without the light and grace of the Holy Spirit, as Paul says to the Corinthians: "The natural man hears nothing of the Spirit of God," that is, a man who is not enlightened by the Spirit of God hears nothing of God's will or divine things from natural reason.

536 And this is what men feel when they ask their hearts how they are against God's will, whether they are certain that God is aware of them and hears them. For to believe this with certainty, and thus to dare and rely completely on an invisible God, and, as Peter says [1 Ep. 1:8], to love and esteem great the Christ whom we do not see, is difficult even for the saints; how then should it be easy for the ungodly? But then 1) we begin to believe aright, when first our hearts are troubled, and are raised up again by Christ, being born again by the Holy Ghost, as above said.

537 Therefore it is good that this be clearly distinguished, namely, that reason and free will are able to live outwardly honorably to some extent. But to be born again, to have a different heart, mind, and courage within, that is wrought by the Holy Spirit alone. Thus remains worldly outward discipline. For God does not want a clumsy, wild, impudent nature and life, and yet a proper distinction is made between outward worldly life and piety and the piety that is valid before God, which is not philosophically outward, but inwardly in the heart.

(538) And this difference we have not invented, but the holy Scriptures make it clear. Thus Augustine also acts, and recently Guilielmo Parisiensi also wrote and acted diligently. But those who invent and dream for themselves that men are able to keep God's law without the Holy Spirit, and that the Holy Spirit will give us grace in view of our merit, have shamefully suppressed this necessary teaching.

Article XIX, Of the Cause of Sins.

539. the XIX article the adversaries leave to them, since we teach that, although the one God created the whole world and the whole nature, and all hours created all creatures, the one God is the creator of all things.

1) "but" is missing in Müller. Latin: autsm.

yet he is not a cause of sin, but the evil will in devils and men, which turns away from God, he is a cause of sin, as Christ saith of the devil [John 8:44.], "When he speaketh lies, he speaketh of his own."

Article XX. Of Good Works.

(540) In the XX article they clearly put these words, that they reject and condemn our doctrine; because we say that men by good works deserve not forgiveness of sins. Let this be known to all. They condemn and reject this very article with clear words. Now what need is there to say much in this public matter? The great doctors and masters of the Confutation publicly show what kind of spirit speaks out of them. For in the Christian church this is no small article, but the very highest and chief article, that we obtain forgiveness of sins without our merit through Christ; and that not our works, but Christ is the propitiation for our sins, as Peter saith [Acts 10:43], "Unto JESUS do all the prophets bear witness, that we obtain forgiveness of sins, all they that believe on him."

541 Such a strong testimony of all the holy prophets may justly be called a resolution of the catholic Christian church. For even a single prophet is greatly esteemed by God, and is a world treasure to the same holy church. And we should believe the unanimous mouth of all the prophets more cheaply than the unholy, godless sophists who have made the confutation and blasphemed Christ so brazenly. For though some teachers have written that afterward, when our sins are forgiven us, we obtain grace not by faith but by our own works, yet they have not held that the forgiveness of sins in themselves comes to us because of our works, and not because of Christ.

542 Therefore it is an abominable blasphemy to give the glory of Christ thus to our works of men. And we pledge ourselves to the imperial majesty and to other princes of this imperial, princely virtue, that they would not in any way, if they were warned, have allowed such public untruth and falsehood, by which God and the gospel are blasphemed before all the world, to remain in the confutation. For that this article is certainly divine and true, and that this is the holy divine truth, we could here very nearly bring forward innumerable sayings of Scripture, even from the Fathers. And there is not a lyllabe, not a leaf, in the Bible, in the prelates.

The most beautiful books of the holy scriptures, because it is not clearly stated. We have also said much above about these things; and godly, pious hearts, who know why Christ is given, who would not forfeit all the world's goods and kingdoms, lest Christ should be our only treasure, our only mediator and reconciler, are appalled and terrified that God's holy word and truth should be so publicly despised and condemned by poor men. Isaiah the prophet says [Cap. 53, 6.], "The LORD hath laid on him all our sin." But the adversaries lied to Isaiah, and to all the Bible and Scripture, saying, He hath laid on us our sin, and our works, and beggarly satisfaction. Nevertheless I will be silent here concerning childish works, rosaries, pilgrimages, 2c. and the like.

543 We are well aware of the serious mandates and the imperial edict that have gone out against us and our doctrine; we should be justly frightened if we had to deal with minor matters or matters that were in doubt. But since we are certain (praise God!) through God's Word in distant hearts and minds that the adversaries condemn the public, divine truth and the right Christian, blessed, holy doctrine, without which no Christian church can exist, which every Christian, as far as his body and life reach, is obliged to confess, save, and protect for the glory of God, we will not be deterred by such salutary doctrine. For who would not wish for him at his last end that he might die in the confession of the article, that we might obtain forgiveness of sin by faith, without our merit or works, through the blood of Christ?

544 There is experience, as the monks themselves confess, that consciences cannot be quieted nor brought to peace except by faith in Christ; and consciences cannot have a right constant consolation in the great anxieties at the hour of death, and in contestation against the great terror of death, of sin, unless they keep the promise of grace in Christ. Neither can they have constant comfort against the devil, who first presses strongly upon the hearts, distresses them, and provokes them to despair, and blows away all our works in a moment like dust, if they do not hold fast to the gospel, to this doctrine, that we obtain forgiveness of sins through the precious blood of Christ without any merit. For faith alone restoreth and upholdeth us in the

In the great agony, in the great anguish, when no creature can help, yes, when we are to pass away and die outside of this whole visible creature into another being and world.

545 For this reason it is a matter truly worthy of mention, for the sake of which every Christian should gladly dare and set all things in motion with all his heart. Therefore all those who adhere to this confession of ours must not be frightened or misled, but in all joyfulness in God and the Lord Christ may confidently and cheerfully dare to confess this public truth against all tyranny, wrath, anger, terror, and also against all tyrannical daily murder and persecution. For who would want to deprive him of such great, even eternal comfort, in which the whole Christian church has all its salvation?

Whoever takes the Bible in his hand and reads it with earnestness, will soon see that this doctrine is founded everywhere in the Scriptures. For Paul clearly says in Romans 3 and 4 that sins are forgiven without merit for Christ's sake; therefore he says, "We are justified by faith without merit, that the promise may stand fast," that is, if the promise were of our works, it would not be firm. And if grace or forgiveness of sin were given because of our works, when would we be sure that we had obtained grace? When would the conscience find such a work sufficient to propitiate God's wrath? We have said enough about this above; each one may search the sayings of the Scriptures that establish this doctrine. For in this place I have been moved to complain so vehemently of the abominable, insolent, overpowering, preconceived wickedness of the adversaries, when they set forth in plain words that they reject this article, that we obtain forgiveness of sin, not by our works, but without merit through faith in Christ.

547 The adversaries also introduce some sayings of Scripture, why they condemn this article; namely, they bring forth the saying of Peter [2 Ep. 1:10], "Make diligence to establish your profession by good works;" 2c. Then everyone sees that our adversaries have not invested their money badly, since they have studied Dialecticam. For they may introduce the sayings of Scripture rhymed, unrhymed, finally, inconclusively, as they will and as they please. For thus they conclude, Peter saith, "Diligently make your profession firm by good works," therefore only by works merit forgiveness of sin. It is truly a fine argumentation, as if one should say.

In the case of a defendant in a trial court, whose life had been forfeited, the judge commanded that he should henceforth abstain from such wrongdoing; therefore, by such abstention, he deserved to have his life forfeited. Thus to argue, that is, to make ex non causa causam. For Peter speaks of good works and fruits which follow faith, and teaches why they should be done, namely, that we may make our profession firm, that is, that we may not again fall from the gospel if we sin again. That is to say, do good works, that ye may abide in the gospel, in your heavenly calling, that ye may not again fall away, become cold, lose the spirit and gifts which are given you by grace through Christ, not for the sake of the works that follow. For in the profession one remains firm through faith, and faith and the Holy Spirit do not remain in those who lead sinful lives.

548 They set more proverbs and testimonies, which rhyme just as well. They may say that this opinion was condemned a thousand years ago in Augustine's time. This is not true, but a lie. For the Christian church has always held that forgiveness of sin comes to us without merit, and the Pelagians are therefore condemned who said that grace is given to us because of our works.

549 We have said above enough, that we also teach, that where faith is, good fruits and good works shall follow. For "we do not put away the law, but establish it," as Paul saith, Rom. 3:31. For when we have received the Holy Ghost by faith, good fruits follow; wherefore we increase in love, in patience, in chastity, and other fruits of the Spirit.

Article XXI. (IX.) Of invocations of the saints.

(550) The adversaries utterly condemn the twenty-first article, because we teach nothing of calling upon the saints. And they do not act at all with such a wide talk, and yet they do not make any difference, except that they say that the saints are to be honored. They say that the living saints pray one for another, and from this they conclude that the dead saints should and must be called upon.

551 They refer to Cyprianum, who asked Cornelium, while he was still alive, that if he had died he would have interceded for the brethren. Thus they prove that one must invoke the dead saints. They also draw on Hieronymum against Vigilantium, and say: In this matter Hieronymus overcame Vigilantium a thousand years ago.

den. So they go on, thinking they have won by far, and do not see that in Jerome against Vigilantium there is no syllable about calling the saints. Jerome does not speak of invoking the saints, but of honoring the saints. Nor did the ancient teachers before the time of Gregory think of the invocation of the saints. And the invocation of the saints, as well as the applicatio of the merit of the saints, of which the adversaries teach, has no basis in Scripture.

552 In our confession we do not deny that the saints are to be honoured. For there are three kinds of honor in honoring the saints. For the first, that we give thanks to God, that he has shown us examples of his grace in the saints, that he has given teachers in the church and other gifts; and the gifts, because they are great, are to be highly praised, even the saints themselves, who have well used such gifts; as Christ in the Gospel praises the faithful servants of Matthew 25:21, 23.

553 The other glory which we may do to the saints, that we may strengthen our faith by their example. For when I see that by so abundant a grace Petro's sin is forgiven, because he denied Christ, my heart and conscience are strengthened, that I believe that grace is mightier than sin.

554 For the third, we honor the saints when we follow their examples of faith, love, and patience, each according to his profession.

555 Of this right honour of the saints the adversaries speak nothing at all, but of the calling of the saints, which, though it were without danger to the consciences, yet is not necessary. There they quarrel. So we yield to them, that the angels pray for us. For it is written in Zech. 1:12, that the angel prayeth, saying, O LORD of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem? And though we yield, that as the living saints pray for the whole church together, or in Mnsrs, so may the saints in heaven pray for the whole church together, in Asnsrs. But this hath no testimony in Scripture, but the dream only, which is taken out of the other book Nueeukusoruin s^Cap. 15,14.].

556 Further, though the saints pray for the church, yet it doth not follow that the saints should be called upon. Although our Confession alone says this, that there is nothing in Scripture about calling on the saints, or seeking help from the saints. If therefore neither commandment, nor promise, nor example, can be adduced from the Scriptures, it follows that neither heart nor conscience can rely on it. For since every prayer is to be made by faith, how will I know that God will be pleased with the invocation of the saints, if I do not have God's word? How can I be sure that the saints will hear my prayer and the prayer of every one of them?

557 Some make bad gods of the saints, saying that they can know our thoughts and see into our hearts. They invent these things, not that they honor the saints, but that they defend their creeds and their fairs, which bring them money. We say, as before, that in the Word of God, in the Scriptures, it is not written that the saints understand our appeals; and if they understand that God will please them with such appeals, there is no reason for it. Against this the adversaries can raise nothing; therefore the adversaries should not compel or urge us to uncertain things, for a prayer without faith is not a prayer. For if they say that the church has it in use, it is certain that this is a new custom in the church. For the old congregations, though they remember the saints, do not call upon the saints.

558 The adversaries not only speak of calling upon the saints, but also say that God accepts the merit of the saints for our sins, and thus make of the saints not only intercessors, but mediators and propitiators. Now this is not to be suffered at all, for there they give the honor due to Christ alone to the saints. For they make them mediators and reconcilers.

559 And though they make a distinction between the mediators that pray for us, and the mediator that hath redeemed us, and reconciled us unto God, yet they make the saints mediators, that men may be reconciled. And that they say the saints are mediators to pray for us, they say this also without any Scripture. And though they speak of this in the most unobjectionable manner, yet Christ and his good deeds are suppressed by such teaching, and they trust in the saints when they ought to trust in Christ. For they invent a delusion for themselves, as if Christ were a severe judge, and the saints gracious, kind mediators; they therefore flee to the saints, shrink from Christ as from a tyrant, trust more in the goodness of the saints than in the goodness of Christ; run from Christ, and seek the help of the saints; thus, at bottom, they make reclusiuptuonil of the saints.

560 Therefore let us prove that they make of the saints, not only intercessors, but Reconciler and inoäiutorsL rscslsinctionis. We do not yet speak here of gross abuses, as the common rabble commits public idolatry with the saints and pilgrimages; we speak of what their scholars preach, write, and teach in their schools about this matter. Other than the gross abuses, even inexperienced, coarse people can judge and judge.

There are two parts to a mediator or reconciler. For the first, a certain, clear word and promise from God that God will hear through the mediator all who call upon him. Such a divine promise is found in the Scriptures concerning Christ: "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, that shall he give you." Nowhere in Scripture is there such a promise of the saints; therefore no one can be sure that he will be heard when he calls on the saints. Therefore such calling is not of faith. We have God's word and commandment concerning this, that we should call upon Christ, for He says [Matt. 11:28], "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." Ps. 45: 13. "Before thy face shall all the rich of the people worship." And Ps. 72:11: "And shall worship him all the kings of the earth." And soon after [v. 19.], "They shall kneel before him daily," 2c. And John 5:23. says Christ, "That they all may honor the Son, as they honor the Father." Item, 2 Thess. 2:17. saith Paul, praying, "Our Lord JEsus Christ, and God our Father, admonish your hearts, and strengthen you." These are vain sayings of Christ. But of appeals to the saints the adversaries can bring forward no commandment of God, no example of Scripture.

562 For another thing, it pertaineth to a reconciler, that his merit pay for other men, that others be made partakers of his merit and payment, as if they had paid themselves. As when one good friend pays another's debt, the debtor is released from the debt by another's payment as by his own. So Christ's merit is given to us and imputed to us when we believe in him, just as if his merit were ours, so that his righteousness and merit are imputed to us, and his merit becomes our own.

(563) Christian prayer must be based on both the divine promise and the merit of Christ. Such faith in the divine promise and in the merit of Christ belongs to prayer. For we should certainly believe that we will be heard for Christ's sake, and that we have a gracious God for his sake.

564 Wherefore the adversaries teach that we ought to call upon the saints, when we have neither commandment, nor promise, nor example, in the scriptures; and yet they make it appear that more trust is put in the saints than in Christ, when Christ saith, Come unto me, and not unto the saints.

565. Secondly, they say that God accepts the merit of the saints for our sin, and thus teach trust in the merit of the saints, not in the merit of Christ. And this they teach clearly of indulgences, wherein they bestow the merit of the saints as satisfaction for our sin.

566. And Gabriel, who interprets the eunonsrn inibsus, may freely say: We are to flee to the saints according to the order that God has instituted, that we may be saved by their help and merit. These are the clear words of Gabriel. And now and then in the books of the adversaries one still finds much clumsy talk about the merit of the saints. Does this mean that the saints are not made propitiators? For then they become like Christ, if we are to trust that we will be saved through their merit.

567. But where is the ordinance of God instituted, when Gabriel speaketh that we should flee unto the saints? Let him bring one word, one example from the holy Scriptures. Perhaps they make the order of the custom that is in the courts of worldly princes, where the counsellors of the prince present things to poor people and promote them as mediators. But how if a prince or a king should appoint a single mediator, and would not hear things in grace through any other, or hear all requests through him alone? Therefore, if Christ alone is appointed high priest and mediator, why do we seek others? What then can the adversaries say against this?

(568) A common form of absolution has been used hitherto, which is thus: The passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the merits of the Mother of Mary, and of all the saints, shall be unto thee for the remission of sins. Then absolution is pronounced publicly, not only by the merit of Christ, but also by the merit of the other saints, that through the same merit we may obtain grace and forgiveness of sins.

569. some of us have seen a doctor of the holy scriptures in aMrw or at his

1) Wittenberger: as if the saints' merit had paid for our sin.

The monk was with him to comfort him. Now he called and shouted nothing else to the dying man, but only this prayer: Mary, thou mother of goodness and graces, keep us from the enemy, and in the hour of death receive us, Nnria down Arntine etc.

570 Although Mary, the Mother of God, prays for the Church, it is too much that she should overcome death, that she should protect us from the great power of Satan. For what would Christ need if Mary were able to do this? For though she is worthy of all the highest praise, yet she does not want to be held like Christ, but rather wants us to follow the example of her faith and humility. Now this is open to the public, that by such false teaching Mary came in Christ's stead. They have called upon her, they have trusted in her goodness, and through her they have sought to reconcile Christ, as though he were not a reconciler, but only a terrible, vengeful judge.

571 Now we say, that we ought not to be taught to trust in the saints, as if their merit made us blessed; but for Christ's merit alone we obtain forgiveness of sins, and blessedness, if we believe in him. Of the other saints it is said, "Each shall receive reward according to his work," 2c., that is, they among themselves cannot communicate their merit to one another, as the monks of their orders have brazenly sold merit to us. And Hilarius says of the foolish virgins, [Matthew 25:8,9] that because the foolish cannot go out to meet the bridegroom, because their lamps are out, they ask the wise to lend them oil. But they answer that they cannot lend it to them, for both of them would lack it, and it is not enough for all of them. 2c. Then he showeth that no man among us can help another by any strange work or merit.

572 If therefore the adversaries teach that we ought to trust in the calling of the saints, when they have no command from God, no word of God, nor example of the Old or New Testament; when they exalt the merit of the saints as high as the merit of Christ, and give the glory due to Christ to the saints, we cannot praise or accept their opinion and custom of worshipping or calling upon the saints. For we know that we ought to put our trust in Christ, since we have God's promise that he is to be the mediator.

1) In the old editions and in Müller: "die Exempel", because in Latin it is 6X6uax>la.

we know that Christ's merit alone is a propitiation for our sin. For Christ's sake we are reconciled if we believe in Him, as the text says: All who believe in Him shall not be put to shame. And we are not to be trusted that we are righteous before God on account of Mary's merit.

573 Their scholars also preach impudently that every one of the saints can give a special gift, as St. Anne protects against poverty, St. Sebastian against the pestilence, St. Valten for the falling pestilence, the holy knight St. Jörgen was called upon by the horsemen for stitches and womb and to protect all kinds of vehicles; and all this is basically of heathen origin.

574 And I will also say that the adversaries did not teach such impudent heathen lies about calling upon the saints, yet the example is dangerous. If they have neither the command nor the word of God, nor can they find anything certain from the ancient fathers, what need is there to defend such an unfounded argument?

575 First of all, however, it is quite dangerous, because if one seeks other mediators than Christ, he puts his trust in them, and thus Christ and the knowledge of Christ are completely suppressed, as we, unfortunately, have experience. For it may be that at first some have thought well of the saints in their prayers; soon afterward the invocation of the saints has followed; soon after the invocation the strange heathen abominations and abuses have broken in one by one, as that it was thought that the images had a secret power of their own, as the sorcerers and NnZL think that if one digs or forms some star signs at a certain time in gold or other metal, they should have a special secret power and effect. Some of us have seen an image of the Virgin Mary in a monastery, carved out of wood, which could be pulled inside with strings so that it appeared from the outside as if it were moving by itself, as if it were beckoning with its head to the worshippers whom it was hearing, and as if it were turning its face away from worshippers who were not offering much, whom it was not hearing.

576 And whether such abominations, such idolatry, pilgrimages and fraud with the images would not have been innumerable and unspeakable: but even more horrible and ugly were the many fables and lies of the legends of saints, which were preached publicly. As, of St. Barbara, they have preached that at her death she asked God to give jsiHJ the reward for her torture, whoever called upon her, that he could not be without Sacrament die. St. Christopher, which in German is called Christbearer, was painted by a wise man to the children in such great length, and he wanted to indicate that a greater strength than human strength must be in those who are to carry Christ, who are to preach and confess the gospel. For they must wade through the great sea by night, 2c. that is, endure all manner of great trials and perils. Then the foolish, unlearned, hopeless monks came, and taught the people to call Christophorus, as if such a great giant had been bodily present, who had carried Christ through the sea.

(577) Now if God Almighty, through his saints, as peculiar men, wrought many great things in both governments, in the church and in temporal affairs, so find many great examples in the lives of the saints, which princes and lords, right pastors and pastors, both for the government of the world and the government of the church, and especially for the strengthening of faith against God, would have been wholly useful; which they have forsaken, and preached the least of the saints, of their hard camp, of hard shirts, (2c.) which are mostly lies, which, for the most part, are lies.

578. Now it would be useful and almost comforting to hear how some great holy men (as it is told in the holy scriptures about kings of Israel and Judah) ruled the country and the people in their regiment, how they taught and preached, what many a trial and challenge they endured; How also many learned men had been of counsel and comfort to kings, princes, and lords in great perilous courses; how they had taught and preached the gospel; what manner of battles they had endured with the heretics. So also the examples, where great special mercy of God is shown to the saints, are almost useful and comforting. As when we see that Peter, who denied Christ, obtained mercy, that Cyprian was forgiven fine NnZia. Item, we read that Augustine, having been deathly ill, first experienced the power of faith, and publicly confessed God with these words: Now only have I felt that God hears the sighs and prayers of the faithful. Such examples of faith, where one learns to fear God, to trust in God, from which one sees how God-fearing people in the Church, even in great matters of the high temporal regiments, fared, should have been written and preached diligently and clearly by the saints.

579. now some idle monks and loose boys (who did not know how great and (For the saints, who are not concerned about governing churches or other people, have invented fables, partly from pagan books, since they are nothing but examples of how the saints wore their hair shirts, how they prayed their seven times, how they ate water and bread, and have made all this up out of their creeds, out of the pilgrimages to make money. How then are the miraculous signs which they boast of the rosary, and how the barefoot monks boast of their wooden grains. And there is no great need to show examples here; their false legends still exist, so that one cannot deny them.

580 And such abominations against Christ, such blasphemies, shameful, impudent lies and fables, such lying preachers, the bishops and theologians can suffer, and have suffered for a long time, to the great hurt of consciences, that it is terrible to remember, for such lies have borne money and interest. But they would gladly destroy us, who preach the gospel purely, if we would therefore challenge the calling of the saints, that Christ alone might remain the mediator, and that the great abuse might be done away. Just as long before this time, before Luther wrote, their theologians themselves, as well as all pious, God-fearing, respectable people, cried out against the bishops and preachers, that they were over punishing abuses for the sake of belly and money, so our adversaries in their confutation do not think of such abuses with a single word, that if we accepted the confutation, we would at the same time have to enter into all their public abuses.

581 So their whole confutation is full of deceit and dangerous deceit, not only in this place, but everywhere. They pretend to be pure as gold, as if they had never grieved a victim. For in no place do they distinguish the public abuses from their eoAiuntidus or doctrines, and yet many among them are so respectable and honest, confessing themselves that much error is in the cedolnstieoruin and canonists' books, that also much abuse is broken in the church by unlearned preachers, and by so great, shameful imprudence of the bishops.

582. Luther was not alone, nor the first, to cry out and complain about such innumerable abuses. There have been many learned, honest people before this time who have pitifully complained about the great abuse of the monks, about the abuse of monasticism, item, about such avarice and money market of the pilgrimages. And especially that the most necessary article, of the atonement of Christ, without which no Christian church can be or remain, which before all other things is the most important one.

that is to be taught purely and correctly, was so miserably suppressed.

583 Therefore the adversaries have not acted faithfully nor Christianly in this, that in their confutation they tacitly pass over the public abuses. And if they were really serious about helping the church and the poor consciences, and not rather about preserving splendor and avarice, they would have had right access and cause here; and especially in this place they should have most humbly petitioned the imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, to abolish such great, public, shameful abuses, which are also a mockery to us Christians among Turks, Jews, and all unbelievers.

For we note clearly enough in many things that the imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, undoubtedly researches and seeks the truth with all faithful diligence, and would like to see the Christian church rightly ordered and arranged. But the adversaries are not much interested in how they do enough for the imperial majesty's imperial Christian mind, will, and laudable concern, or how they help things, but how they only suppress the truth and us. For they do not lie much unslept, that the Christian doctrine and the gospel may be preached purely. They leave the preaching ministry quite desolate, defend public abuses, and still daily shed innocent blood out of unheard tyranny and desolation, only to defend their public lies.

585 Even so they will not tolerate pious Christian preachers. Where this finally wants to go out, people of understanding can well decrease. For they will not long rule churches with vain violence and tyranny. And although the adversaries seek to preserve nothing but the kingdom of the pope, this will not be the way, but a vain desolation of the kingdom and the church. For even if they had thus slain all pious Christian preachers, and the gospel were suppressed, after that there will come red spirits and fanatics, who will also fight seditiously with their fists, 1) who will afflict the congregation and the church with false doctrines, 1) and destroy all the church order, which we would gladly preserve.

586 Therefore, most gracious Lord Emperor, since we have no doubt that your Imperial Majesty's mind and heart are that the divine truth, the glory of Christ, and the Gospel may come to pass. Majesty's mind and heart that the divine truth, the glory of Christ, and the Gospel may prevail.

1) Müller: "would". In Latin the future tense is used.

and always increase abundantly, we most humbly ask your imperial majesty not to grant the unreasonable actions of the adversaries, but to graciously seek other ways of unity, so that the Christian consciences are not so burdened, so that divine truth is not so violently suppressed, or innocent people are strangled by vain tyranny, as has happened until now.

587 For Your Imperial Majesty knows without a doubt that this is especially true of Your Imperial Majesty. Your Majesty knows without doubt that this is especially true of Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty is to preserve Christian doctrine, as much as humanly possible, so that it may be handed down to the descendants, and also to protect and manage pious, true preachers. For this is what God the Lord requires of all kings and princes, when he communicates his title to them, and calls them gods, saying [Ps. 82:6], "Ye are gods." For this reason he calls them gods, so that they may protect, save, and handle divine things, that is, the gospel of Christ and the pure divine doctrine on earth, as much as possible, and also have true Christian teachers and preachers, in God's stead, against unrighteous power, under their protection and protection.

Article XXII. (X.) Of both kinds in the Lord's Supper.

588 There is no doubt that it is divine and right, and according to the commandment of Christ and the words of Paul, to use both forms in the Lord's supper. For Christ instituted both forms, not only for one part of the church, but for the whole church. For not only the priests, but the whole church, need the sacrament by the command of Christ, and not by the command of men; and this the adversaries must confess.

589 If then Christ hath instituted the sacrament for the whole church, why take they the one form from the church? Why do they change the order of Christ, especially when he calls it his will? For if a man's testament be not broken, much less the testament of Christ. And Paul saieth, "I received it of the Lord, which I gave unto you." Now he has given them both form, as the text clearly indicates 1 Cor. 11:23: "This do," says he, "in remembrance of me." There he speaks of the body; then he lifts up the same words from the blood of Christ, and soon after [v. 28.] says, "But let a man examine himself, and so eat of the bread, and so drink of the cup." 2c. There he calls them both. These are the plain words of the apostle Paul; and he makes a preface just before, that those who have need of the sacrament shall use it at the same time in one supper. Therefore it is certain that it is not instituted for the priests alone, but for the whole church.

590 And such a custom is kept in the Greek church to this day; so also was it in the Latin or Roman church, as Cyprian and Jerome testify. For thus Jerome says of the prophet Sophoniam, The priests who administer the sacrament, and distribute the blood of Christ to the people 2c. The same is also testified by Synodus Toletana. And It would be easy to introduce many sayings and testimonies here, but for the sake of brevity we will refrain from doing so. For every Christian reader will be able to judge for himself whether it is proper to forbid and change the order and institution of Christ.

591 The adversaries do not think at all in their confutation how those consciences are to be comforted or excused from which a form is taken under the papacy. This would have been appropriate for learned and God-fearing doctors, who would have shown constant cause to comfort such consciences.

592 Now they insist that it is Christian and right to forbid both forms, and will not permit the use of both forms. As to the first, they invent from their heads that in the beginning of the church there was a practice of giving only one form to the laity, and yet they can give no certain example of the practice. They draw some sayings from the Evangelist Luke, concerning the breaking of bread, where it is written, that the disciples knew the Lord in the breaking of bread. They also refer to more sayings concerning the breaking of bread. Now, although we are not harshly opposed to the fact that some of the sayings about the sacrament are to be understood, it does not follow from this that only the one form was initially administered. For it is common to call one part and mean the whole. They also refer to the laiea eomwunio as if it were one form, which is not true. For when the canons enjoin the priests to use the luiu evwwurrio, they mean that they are not to consecrate a punishment themselves, but to receive it from another, although in both forms. And the adversaries themselves know this, but they make a pretense to the unlearned and inexperienced. For when they hear the word oornmunio Inioa, they think from the beginning that it was an eoIQinunio, as in our time, that the laity were fed with one form.

593 But let us see further, how impudently the adversaries write against Christ's institution and order. Gabriel, among other reasons why the laity are not given both forms, also puts this: there ought to have been a difference, he says, between priests and laity. And I think it is the greatest and noblest cause why they hold so firmly to-day, that the priesthood may seem holier than the laity. Now this is a man's thought; what it is based on is to be taken for granted. And in the confutation they refer to the children of Heli, 1 Sam. 2:36, where the text says, "He that is left of thy house shall come and worship him for a morsel of bread, and shall say, Let me to a priest's portion, that I may eat a morsel of bread." 2c. There, they say, is the one portion signified, and now say, So shall our laity also be satisfied with one priest's portion, that is, with one portion.

594 The masters of the Confutation are right impudent, coarse asses, they play and juggle with the Scriptures as they will, so the history of the children of Heli point to the Sacrament. For in that place is described the serious punishment of Heli and his children. Do they also say that a figure is given to the laymen for a punishment? They are foolish and mad.

595. The sacrament is instituted by Christ to comfort troubled consciences, and to strengthen their faith, when they believe that Christ's flesh is given for the life of the world, and that by meat we are united to Christ, and have grace and life. But the adversaries conclude that those who receive such a sacrament in one form are thus punished, and say: Let the laity suffice them, and let them suffice them. This is said proudly enough. How, sirs, may we ask why they should let them suffice? Or shall it be called the truth, what ye will, and what ye say?

But marvel how impudent and insolent the adversaries are, that they may set their words as the Lord's commandment, saying freely that the laity must suffice them. But how, if they must not? Are these now the reasons and causes by which those are to be excused before God's judgment who have hitherto kept people from both forms, and innocently strangled people for it? Shall they console themselves with this, that it is written of the children of Heli, They shall beg? That will be a poor excuse in the sight of God.

597. But they attract still more causes,

Why both forms should not be served, namely, for the sake of danger, lest a droplet be spilled from the cup. They have more such dreams, for which Christ's order should not be changed.

(598) But I will put it in the same way, that they might be free to use one or both forms. How then would they prove that they had power to forbid both forms? Neither is it the duty of men, or of the church, to make liberty itself, or to make it free on both sides out of Christ's order. The poor consciences, from whom the one form has been forcibly taken, and who have had to suffer such injustice, we will not judge here. But those who have forbidden both forms, and not only forbid them, but also teach them publicly, preach them, and see the people strangled because of them, invite upon themselves God's terrible judgment and wrath. And we do not know how to excuse them. Let them see how they will give account to God of their doings. And it is not so soon the church decides what the bishops and priests decide, especially as the Scriptures and the prophet Ezekiel [Cp.7,26.] say: Priests and bishops will come who know neither God's commandment nor law.

Article XXIII. (XI.) Of the marriage of priests.

599 Although the great unheard of fornication and adultery among priests and monks 2c. from high monasteries, other churches, and convents throughout the world is so reprehensible that it is sung and spoken of, yet the opponents of the confutation are so completely blinded and insolent that they defend the pope's law forbidding marriage, and do so with false pretenses, as if it were spirituality; though they should be ashamed in their hearts of the most shameful, lewd, free, loose lads in their monasteries and convents, and for the play's sake alone look not boldly at the sun; Though their evil, troubled hearts and consciences make them afraid to look up to such a praiseworthy, honor-loving emperor, yet they are bold, do like the devil himself, and all bold, wicked people, in their blind defiance, go away, forgetting all honor and shame. And the pure, chaste people may not let imperial Majesty admonish the Electors and Princes that they should not suffer the marriage of priests uâ iimruum st iMominiamdas is to German, the Roman Empire to shame and dishonor. For

These are her words. As if their shameful life of the church was very honest and praiseworthy.

How could the adversaries act and speak more clumsily, more insolently, and more publicly of their own disgrace and harm? Such impudent remonstrances before a Roman emperor will not be found in any history. If all the world did not know them, if many pious, honest people, their own concanonics among themselves, had not long ago complained of so shameful, lewd, dishonest a nature, if their dishonourable, disgraceful, ungodly, lewd, pagan, epicuric life, and the basic soup of all fornication at Rome were not so even in the day, which will neither be covered, nor dyed, nor adorned, one might think that their great purity and their unaltered virginal chastity would be a cause that they might not even hear a woman or marriage called, that they baptize holy matrimony, which the pope himself calls a sacrament of holy matrimony, inkurniurn impsrii.

(601) Well, we will relate their arguments and reasons hereafter. Let every Christian reader, every honorable, honor-loving, pious man, take this to heart, and consider how utterly without honor and shame people must be who call holy matrimony, which the Scriptures praise and commend to the highest degree, a stain, an infamy of the Roman Empire, as if it were such a great honor to the church and the empire to have its blasphemous, abominable fornication, as the Roman and the priests are known.

602 And, most gracious Lord Emperor, by your imperial Majesty, who in all writings is called a chaste prince and king, for indeed this saying is said by your imperial Majesty: kuâions kueis rsMndit yes, by your Majesty and the laudable estates such people may seek and impudently demand that your Majesty (God forbid!) should deal with such abominable fornication, should use their imperial power, which the Almighty has so far graciously bestowed upon your imperial majesty to be used victoriously and blessedly, to protect and defend shameful fornication and unheard-of vices, which are also considered abominable by the heathen. And as they are minded in their bloodthirsty, blinded hearts, that they would gladly, notwithstanding all divine and natural rights, notwithstanding the councils and their own canons, break up such priestly marriages by force at once, many poor, innocent people, for no other cause than the sake of matrimony alone, tyrannically with gallows and sword.

judge the priests themselves, who in greater cases have also spared the heathen, than strangle the great malefactors for the sake of marriage, drive so many pious, innocent women and children into misery, make them poor, abandoned widows and orphans, and avenge their diabolical hatred on innocent blood: to this they may admonish your imperial majesty.

603. Since God Almighty has graced Your Majesty with special innate goodness and discipline, that Your Majesty, out of a high, noble, Christian mind, should have such great fornication to handle, or such unheard-of tyranny to take care of, and should doubtless consider this act much more princely and Christian than the loose people, we hope Your Majesty will show Himself quite imperial and gracious in this, and consider that we have good reason and cause for this from the Holy Scriptures: We hope that your Majesty will show yourself to be quite imperial and gracious in this, and consider that we have good reason and cause from the holy Scriptures, whereas the adversaries bring forth vain lies and error.

604 Even so they are certainly not in earnest to advocate such celibacy and celibate state, for they know well how pure virgins they are, how few among them keep chastity. But they stick to their word of comfort, which they find in their Scripture: Si non eustis, turnen eauts, and know that to boast or call oneself chaste, and yet not to be, has a semblance of chastity in the world, so that even their prudery and parochialism seems all the more holy before the world. For Peter the apostle rightly warned that such false prophets would deceive the people with fictitious words [2 Pet. 2:1].

(605) The adversaries are not at all in earnest in the matter of religion, which is the principal thing. What they write, speak, and do, are vain words and unmeaning; there is no earnestness, no fidelity, no right heart for the common good, to help the poor consciences or the church. In the bottom of it they are concerned about the rule, they care for it, and support it finely with vain godless, hypocritical lies; so it will also stand like butter in the sun.

For this reason we cannot accept the law of celibacy, because it is contrary to divine and natural law, contrary to all sacred Scripture, and contrary to the Councils and Canons themselves. Moreover, it is pure hypocrisy and dangerous to the conscience and quite harmful, so that innumerable troubles, ugly, terrible sins and disgraces result from it, and, as can be seen in the right priestly cities and residences, as they call it, the destruction of all worldly honor and discipline.

607. the other articles of our confession, such as

But the truth of this article is so clear that it cannot be contested with any semblance of clarity. But this article is so clear that it needs no argument on either side. But he who is respectable and God-fearing can soon be a judge here. And even though we now have the public truth to ourselves, the adversaries are still trying to find some way to dispute our reasons.

608 First, it is written in Genesis 1:28 that man and woman were created by God to be fruitful, to beget children, and that the woman should be inclined toward the man, and the man toward the woman. And we do not speak here of the disorderly heat which followed after Adam's fall, but of the natural inclination between man and woman, which would also have been in nature if it had remained pure. And this is God's creation and order, that the male should be inclined toward the female, and the female toward the male. Therefore, since no one can or should change the divine order and the created nature except God Himself, it follows that the marriage state cannot be changed by any human statute or vow.

609. Against this strong reason the adversaries play with words, saying that in the beginning of creation the word was still true, "Grow and multiply, and fill the earth. But now that the earth is full, marriage is not commanded. But behold, how wise are the adversaries! By this divine word, "Increase and multiply," which still continues and does not cease, man and woman were created to be fruitful, not only at the beginning, but as long as this nature lasts. For as by the word of Genesis 1:11, when God said, "Let the earth bring forth grass and herbs," 2c., so the earth was created, that it should not bring forth fruit in the beginning only, but that it should bring forth grass, herbs, and other plants every year, as long as this nature endureth: so also man and woman were created to be fruitful, as long as this nature endureth. Now as the commandment and law of man cannot change that the earth should not become green, 2c. so also no monastic vow, no commandment of man, can change human nature, that a woman should not desire a man, a man a woman, without a special work of God.

610 Secondly, since the divine creature and God's order is naturally right and law, the jurisconsulti have rightly said that man and woman being together and belonging together is naturally right. But if no one can change the natural law, it must be changed.

marriage should be free for everyone. For where God does not change nature, the nature that God has implanted in nature must remain, and it cannot be changed by human laws.

006 For this cause it is very childish for the adversaries to say, In the beginning, when man was created, was marriage ordained, but now it is not. For it is as if they said: In the days of Adam and the patriarchs, when a man was born, he had a man's nature; when a woman was born, she had a woman's nature; but now it is different. In the old days a child born of a mother's womb had a natural nature, but now it does not.

(612) So now let us keep the saying, as the jurisconsulti have wisely and rightly said: That man and woman should be with each other is natural law. If it is natural law, then it is God's order, thus planted in nature, and is therefore also divine law. But since no one can change divine and natural law except God alone, the marriage state must be free to everyone, for the natural, innate inclination of woman toward man, of man toward woman, is God's creature and order. Therefore it is right, and no angel or man can change it. God the Lord did not create Adam alone, but also Evam, not only a man but also a woman, and blessed them to be fruitful.

613 And we speak, as I have said, not of the disorderly heat, which is sinful, but of the natural inclination which would also have existed between man and woman, if nature had remained pure. The evil desire after the fall has made such inclination even stronger, that we are now much more entitled to the marriage state, not only to beget children, but also to prevent more grievous sin. This is so clear that no one will overthrow it, but the devil and all the world will have to leave it alone.

614. As to the third, Paul saith, "To avoid fornication, have every man his own wife." This is a common command and precept, and concerns all those who are unable to remain without marriage. The adversaries demand that we show God's commandment, when he commanded that the priests should take wives, as if the priests were not men. What the Scriptures speak in general of the whole human race, that truly concerns the priests. Paul commanded that they should take wives who had not the gift of virginity, for he soon after interpreted himself, saying, "It is better to be married than to burn."

1, 9.] And Christ clearly says: "They do not all grasp the word, but to whom it is given" Matth. 19, 11.]

006 Since then, after Adam's fall, there are in all of us both the natural inclination and the inherent evil desire, which makes the natural inclination stronger, so that there is more need of the marriage state than when nature was undecayed, Paul speaks of marriage in this way, that our weakness may be helped thereby. And to avoid such burning he commands that those who need it should become married, and this word, "It is better to become married than to burn," cannot be done away by any human law, by any monastic vow. For no law can make nature different from what it is made or designed to be. Therefore we have liberty and power to be married, all who feel the burning. And all who are not able to remain pure and chaste are bound to obey this commandment and word of Paul. Let every man have his own wife, to avoid fornication: in this every man must examine his own conscience.

616 For that the adversaries say that one should pray to God for chastity, and call upon him to mortify the body with fasting and labor, they ought to begin such mortification. But, as I said above, the adversaries are not serious about this matter; they play and joke to please themselves. If virginity were possible for everyone, no one would be able to have it but God's gift. Now the Lord Christ says, Matt. 19:11, that it is a special, high gift of God, and not everyone understands the word; but God wants the others to use the marriage state that God has instituted. For God does not want His creatures and ordination to be despised; nevertheless, He wants them also to be chaste, namely, to have need of the marriage state which He has instituted for the preservation of marital purity and chastity, just as He wants us to have need of the food and drink which He has created for us for the preservation of the body.

(617) And Gershon, who shows that there have been many pious, great men, who have sought to keep chastity through corporal mortification, and yet have not succeeded. Therefore St. Ambrose also says rightly: "Only virginity is such a thing as may be advised and not commanded."

00618 Whether any man then will say here: The Lord Christ praiseth them which have made themselves unclean for the kingdom of heaven's sake, let him also consider that Christ speaketh of them which have the gift of virginity. therefore he adds, "Let him who can grasp it grasp it." For the Lord Christ is not pleased with such impure chastity as is found in monasteries and convents. We also let right chastity be a fine, noble gift of God. But we speak here of the unrighteousness of such a law and prohibition of marriage, and of those who do not have God's gift. Therefore let it be free, and let not such cords be cast upon the poor consciences.

(619) Fourthly, this also is Pabst's law against the canons and ancient councils. For the old canons do not forbid marriage, nor do they destroy the marriage state, although they deprive those who enter into marriage of their ecclesiastical office, which, in time, was more of a grace than a punishment. But the new canons, which are not made in the conciliis, but by the popes, forbid marriage, and tear those to oontruotg, mutrioniu, etc., to pieces. Now therefore it is in the day that such things are contrary to the Scriptures, and also contrary to Christ's commandment, for he saith Matt. 19:6, "Whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

620 The adversaries almost cry out that celibacy, or chastity of priests, is commanded in the Conciliis. We do not contest the Conciliæ in part, for they do not forbid marriage, but we contest the new law which the popes have made against the Conciliæ. Thus the popes themselves despise the Concilia, when they may command others to keep the Concilia in the face of God's wrath and eternal damnation. Therefore, the law that forbids the marriage of priests is quite Pabst's law of Roman tyranny. For the prophet Daniel foretold the kingdom of antichrist 1) that it should teach marriage and wives, even to despise the female sex [Dan. 11:37].

621 The fifth: Although they do not defend the ungodly law for the sake of holiness or out of ignorance, for they know well that they do not keep chastity, yet they give rise to innumerable hypocrisies, because they pretend to holiness. They say that therefore priests should keep chastity, because they must be holy and pure; as if the married state were impurity, as if one were made holy and righteous before God by celibacy rather than by the married state. And to this they refer to the priests in the law of Moses, for they say, When the priests ministered in the temple, they must abstain from their wives; wherefore, as in the new

1) So the Jenaer in agreement with the Latin. Müller lacks: "therefore".

The priests are to pray at all times, according to the will, and they are also to keep chastity at all times. They take such a clumsy, foolish rule as a very clear reason that priests are obligated to keep perpetual chastity, but even if the rule were true or rhymed, they would get nothing more out of it than that priests should abstain from their wives for a time only, namely, when they are about to do church service. Another thing is to pray, and another thing is to minister in the church. For many saints have prayed, even if they have not served in the temple, and their conjugal attendance has not prevented them from doing so.

622 But we will answer these dreams one by one. For the first, the adversaries must confess, and cannot deny, that the married state of believers in Christ is a purely holy state, for it is sanctified by the word of God. For it is instituted by God, and confirmed by the word of God, as the Scriptures abundantly testify. For Christ says [Matth. 19, 6.], "What God has joined together, let no man put asunder." Christ says that if God joins together husband and wife, it is a pure, holy, noble, and praiseworthy work of God. And Paul says of marriage, of food, and the like, "that they are sanctified by the word of GOD, and by prayer" [1 Tim. 4:5.] First, through the divine word, by which the heart is assured that the marriage state pleases the Lord. Secondly, by prayer, that is, by thanksgiving, which is done in faith, when we use the marriage state, food, drink, with thanksgiving. 1 Cor. 7, 14: "The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife," that is, the marriage state is pure, good, Christian, and holy, because of faith in Christ, which we may use with thanksgiving, as we use meat, drink, 2c. Item, 1 Tim. 2:15: "But the woman shall be saved through childbearing, if she continue in the faith." 2c. If the adversaries of their chastity could bring forward such a saying, how should they triumph! St. Paul says that woman is saved through childbearing. What could the holy apostle have said against the shameful hypocrisy of impious, lying chastity, but that he says: they are blessed by conjugal works, by bearing, by suckling and bringing up children, by keeping house 2c.? Yes, how does Paul mean this? He adds in plain words, "If they continue in the faith," 2c. For the works and labor in the married state for themselves, without faith, are not commended here alone.

623 Therefore, first of all, he wants them to have the word of God and to believe, through which faith (as he says everywhere) they receive forgiveness of sin and are reconciled to God. After this he remembers the work of their female ministry and profession. Just as in all Christians good works are to follow from faith, that each one may do something according to his profession, so that he may be useful to his neighbor, and as these good works please God, so also such works as a believing woman does according to her profession please God. And such a woman will be blessed who thus does her feminine work according to her profession in married life.

These sayings indicate that the marriage state is a holy and Christian thing. Now if purity also means that which is holy and acceptable in the sight of God, then the married state is holy and acceptable, for it is confirmed by the word of God, and, as Paul says [Titus 1:15], "To the pure all things are pure," that is, to those who believe in Christ. Therefore, as virginity is unclean in the ungodly, so the marriage state is holy in believers, for the sake of the divine word and faith.

625 But if the adversaries call it purity, when there is no fornication; purity of heart is called, when the evil desire is slain. For God's law does not forbid marriage, but fornication, adultery, and fornication. Therefore to be without a wife outwardly is not right purity, but there can be greater purity of heart in a husband than in Abraham and Jacob, than in many who keep their chastity right after physical purity.

626 Finally, if they call chastity purity, that by it one should be justified before God before marriage, it is an error. For without merit, for Christ's sake alone, we obtain forgiveness of sin, if we believe that through Christ's blood and death we have a gracious God. But here the adversaries will cry out that we, like Jovinianus, regard the married state as equal to virginity. But for the sake of their clamor we will not deny the divine truth and the doctrine of Christ, of the righteousness of faith, which we have indicated above. Nevertheless we leave to virginity its praise and honour, and say that one gift is greater than another. For as wisdom to govern is a greater gift than other arts, so virginity or chastity is a greater gift than the married state. And yet again, just as the ruler is not more righteous in the sight of God because of his gift and wisdom, than another is from because of his art, so the chaste is no more righteous before God on account of his gift than married people are on account of their status, but each one should serve faithfully with his gift, knowing that for Christ's sake he has forgiveness of sin through faith, and is justified before God.

627. The Lord Christ and Paul also praise virginity, not because it makes one righteous before God, but so that those who are single without a wife or without a husband may be all the freer, unhindered in keeping house, raising children, 2c. reading, praying, writing, serving. Wherefore Paul saith unto the Corinthians [1 Cor. 7:32.], For the cause that virginity is commended, that in that state there is more room to learn the word of God, and to teach others. So also Christ does not praise those who are made virgins, but adds, "for the kingdom of heaven's sake," that is, that they may the more easily learn and teach the gospel. He does not say that virginity deserves forgiveness of sin.

628 To the example of the Levitical priests we have answered, that it is not at all proved thereby that the priests should be without marital status. The law of Moses, with its ceremonies of purity or impurity, is of no concern to us Christians. In the law of Moses, if a man touched his wife, he was unclean for some time. Now a Christian husband is not unclean. For the New Testament saith [Tit. 1:5.], "Unto the pure all things are pure." For by the gospel we are freed from all the ceremonies of Moses, not alone from the laws of uncleanness. But if any one would advocate celibacy on the ground that he would oblige consciences to such Levitical purities, we must resist him as vehemently as the apostles resisted the Jews, Acts 15:10 ff. 15, 10. f., because they wanted to oblige the Christians to the law of Moses and to circumcision.

(629) Here, however, Christian, God-fearing spouses will know how to be moderate in their marital duties. For those who are in government or church offices and have to work will also have to be chaste in their marriages. For to be burdened with great things and great affairs, as they pertain to lands and people, to regencies and churches, is a good rsmsäium, that the old Adam may not become lustful. So also the godly know that Paul saith, 1 Thess. 4:4, 5, "Let every one of you keep his barrel in sanctification and honour, and not in lust." But, on the other hand, what chastity can there be in so many thousands of monks and clergy, who without

Do they live in all pleasure, idle and full, having no word of God, not learning it, and not respecting it? All fornication must follow. Such people can keep neither Levitical nor eternal chastity.

(630) Many heretics, not understanding the law of Moses, or how it is to be applied, speak shamefully of the state of matrimony, which, for the sake of such hypocritical appearance, is held to be holy. And Epiphanius complains vehemently that the Encratites, with their hypocritical appearance, especially of chastity, have gained a reputation among the inexperienced. They drank no wine, not even in the Lord's Supper, and abstained from eating both fish and meat; they were even holier than the monks who eat fish. They also abstained from marriage. This had first a great appearance. And so they thought that by these works and imaginary holiness they were propitiating God, as our adversaries teach.

631 Against such hypocrisy and angel holiness Paul fiercely argues with the Colossians [Cap. 2, 18]. For by this Christ is suppressed, when people fall into such error that they hope to be pure and holy before God through such hypocrisy. So also such hypocrites do not know God's gift nor commandment; for God wants us to use His gifts with thanksgiving.

(632) And I could well give examples of how many a pious heart and poor conscience have been grieved, and have come into trouble, by not being taught that the married state, the duty of marriage, and all that pertains to marriage, is holy and Christian. The great misfortune resulted from the unskillful preaching of the monks, who practiced celibacy, or chastity, without moderation, and proclaimed the married state to be an impure life, so that it was a great hindrance to salvation and full of sins.

633 But our adversaries do not hold so hard against the celibate state, for the sake of the appearance of holiness; for they know that in Rome, even in all her churches, without hypocrisy, without appearance, is all fornication; so also their earnestness is not to live chastely, but knowingly they make hypocrisy before men. For this reason they are worse, and their hypocrisy is uglier, than the heretics, who were more serious. But these Lpioursis are not in earnest, but they mock God and the world, and use this pretense alone to preserve their free life.

634 Sixthly, if we have so many reasons why we cannot accept the pope's law of celibacy, yet there are innumerable dangers of conscience about it, unspeakably much vexation. Therefore, whether such Pabst's law be not would be unjust, yet all respectable people should be justly deterred from such a burdening of consciences that so innumerable souls perish by it.

(635) Long before this time many honorable men, even among them their own bishops, canonici 2c. complained of the great, heavy burden of the celibacy, and found that they themselves and other men were greatly troubled in their consciences about it. But no one has taken up the complaint; it is in the day about how in many places, where there are priesthoods, common discipline is shattered by it, what horrible fornication, sin, and shame, what great unheard-of vice is caused by it. There are poets' writings and sat/ras available, in which Uornu may be reflected.

Thus God Almighty avenges the contempt of His gift and His commandments in those who forbid the marriage state. Now, if some necessary laws have often been changed for cause, when the common good requires it, why should not this law be changed, since there are so many excellent causes, so many innumerable grievances of conscience, for which it is expedient to change it?

We see that these are the last times, and as an old man is weaker than a young man, so also the whole world and all nature is in its last age and decline. Sin and vice are not diminishing, but daily increasing. Therefore, the more help God has given against fornication and vice, the more we should need it than the marriage state. We see in the 1st book of Moses that such vices of fornication had also prevailed before the flood. In Sodoma, in Sybari, in Rome, and in other cities, abominable fornication was committed before they were destroyed. These examples show how things will be in the last days, shortly before the end of the world. Therefore, if experience shows that in these last times fornication is more prevalent than ever, unfortunately, faithful bishops and authorities should rather make law and commandment to enjoin marriage than to forbid it, and also to exhort people to the state of marriage by words, deeds, and examples, which would be the office of the authorities. For they must be diligent to preserve honor and discipline.

638. Now God has blinded the world so that adultery and fornication are tolerated without punishment, but punishment is inflicted for the sake of matrimony. Is this not terrible to hear? The preachers should instruct both: those who have the gift of chastity should be admonished not to despise it, but to use it for the glory of God, and those who need the marital state should also be admonished.

Otherwise, the pope dispenses daily in many necessary laws that are of great benefit to the common good, since he should be reasonably firm. But in this law of celibacy, he shows himself to be as hard as stone and iron, although it is known that it is nothing but a human law. Many pious, honest, God-fearing people, who have done no harm to anyone, have been strangled usuriously and tyrannically, solely for the sake of matrimony, because they were married out of the necessity of their consciences. Therefore it is to be feared that the blood of Abel cries out to heaven so strongly that they will never get over it, but, like Cain, will have to tremble. And this Cainian murder of innocent blood shows that this doctrine of celibacy is the doctrine of the devil. For the Lord Christ calls the devil a murderer, who would gladly defend such a tyrannical law with blood and murder.

We know very well that some are crying out that we are making schisms. But our consciences are quite sure, after we have sought peace and unity with all faithful diligence, and do not want to let the adversaries suffice them, we then deny (God forbid!) the public divine truth, we then agree to accept with them the ugly papal law, to tear pious, innocent spouses from each other, to strangle the married priests, to drive innocent wives and children into misery, to shed innocent blood without any cause. For since it is certain that such things are not pleasing to God, let us be careful that we have no unity or fellowship, nor guilt in so much innocent blood with the adversaries.

641 We have shown cause why we cannot in good conscience hold with the adversaries who defend celibacy. For it is against all divine and natural rights, against the canons themselves; in addition, it is vain hypocrisy and driving. For they do not hold this pretended chastity to be so hard and holy, or that they do not understand it otherwise. They know well that everyone knows the nature of the high priests, whom we would name, but only to preserve their tyranny and rule. And no respectable man will have any objection to the strong and clear reasons given above. The gospel leaves the marriage state free to all those who need it, so it does not force those to the marriage state who have the gift of chastity, if it is only true chastity and not hypocrisy. We think that priests should also be granted this freedom, and we want them to be free.

not to force anyone into celibacy, nor to drive pious spouses away from each other, or to break up marriages.

642 We have now briefly indicated some of our reasons for this time, and we have also reported how the opponents have brought up such clumsy expedients and dreams against it. Now we will show with what strong reasons they defend their papal law. First, they say that such a law was revealed by God. Here we see how impudent these unholy people are. They may say that their prohibition of marriage is revealed by God, when it is publicly contrary to Scripture, contrary to Paul, who says: "To avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife" [1 Cor. 7:2]. Item, if the Scripture and Canons strongly forbid that marriage, when already consummated, should in no way be broken up: what may the boys say, and abuse the high, most holy name of the divine Majesty so insolently and impudently? St. Paul the Apostle says rightly who is the God that first instituted such a law, namely, the wretched Satan, for he calls it "the doctrine of devils" [2 Tim. 4:1]. And verily the fruit teacheth us to know the tree, when we see that so many dreadful and abominable vices are caused thereby, as is seen in Romans. Item, that also over this law of strangling and shedding of blood the devil makes no end.

643 The other reason of the adversaries is, that the priests should be pure, as the scripture saith [Isa. 52:11.], "Ye shall be pure, which bear the vessels of the LORD." The argument we have here above laid. For we have sufficiently indicated that chastity without faith is not purity before God, and the married state is holiness and purity for the sake of faith, as Paul says [Tit. 1:15]: "To the pure all things are pure." Thus we have said plainly enough that Mosh's ceremonies of purity and uncleanness are not to be drawn there, for the gospel wants to have purity of lifting. And there is no doubt that Abraham's, Isaac's, Jacob's, the archfathers' hearts, which had many wives, were purer than those of many virgins, who were pure virgins immediately after the purity of their bodies. But that Isaiah saith, Ye shall be clean, which bear the vessel of the Lord, is to be understood of entire Christian holiness, and not of virginity. And this very saying gives unclean priests who are not married to become pure priests who are married, for, as was said before, marriage is purity among Christians.

644 The third is first of all a terrible argument, that the priest's marriage should be heresy. Gna-det our poor soul, dear sirs! go beautiful! this is quite a new thing, that the holy marriage state, which God created in paradise, should have become heresy. In that way, the whole world would be vain heretics.

645. It is a great impudent lie that the marriage of priests should be a heresy of Joviniani, or that such priestly marriages should at that time be condemned by the church. For in Joviniani's time the Church did not yet know of this papal law, by which priests are forbidden to marry altogether, and our adversaries know this well. But they often draw on old heresies, and rhyme our doctrine with them, against their own consciences, only to make the unlearned believe that our doctrine was condemned by the church of old, and therefore to be moved against us manfully. They use such methods, and that is why they did not want to deliver the Confutation to us. They were afraid that they would be publicly accused of lying, which would be an eternal disgrace to them among all their descendants. As for Joviniani's doctrine, however, we have said above what we think of chastity and what we think of the state of marriage. For we do not say that the married state is equal to virginity, although neither virginity nor marriage makes one righteous before God.

646 With such weak, loose reasons they protect and defend the pope's law of celibacy, which has given rise to so many vices and fornications. The princes and bishops who believe these teachers will see whether such reasons hold water when it comes to the hour of death, that they should give an account before God why they have broken up the marriages of pious people, why they have strangled and staked them, why they have strangled so many priests, and have shed innocent blood over all the lamentations, weeping, and weeping of so many widows and orphans. For this they must not take from their minds; the ears and tears of the poor widows, the blood of the innocent is unforgotten in heaven, it will cry out in its hour as strong as the holy, innocent blood over them in high heaven, and cry out before God, the rightful judge. When God will judge such tyranny, they will know that their arguments are straw and hay, and God is a consuming fire, before which nothing can remain except divine word, 1 Petr. 1, 24. 25.

647 Our princes and lords, be it as it may, have to comfort themselves that they have acted with a good conscience. For I will say that the priest's marriage may be contested, as it is not, but that is contrary to God's will. The word and the will, that the adversaries thus tear up the marriages that have been consummated, and chase poor, innocent people into misery and strangle them. Our princes and rulers have no desire for innovation and discord, yet they are guilty of allowing the divine word and truth to be more valid in such just and certain matters than all other things. May God have mercy on them. Amen.

Article XXIV Of the Mass.

648] First, however, we must say this again here at the beginning, that we do not do away with the mass, for masses are held in our churches every Sunday and feast day, and the sacrament is administered to those who desire it, but in such a way that they are first interrogated and absolved. So also Christian ceremonies are held with reading, with songs, prayers, and the like 2c.

(649) The adversaries make a great noise about the Latin mass, and speak very clumsily and childishly of it, how even an unlearned man, who does not understand Latin, deserves great things by hearing mass in the faith of the church. Then they themselves invent to them that the bad work of hearing mass is a divine service, which is useful even if I do not hear or understand a word. I do not want to make such a point of it here as it would be worth; we want to let sensible people judge here. We therefore remember that we indicate that the Latin mass, lection and prayer are also held here.

650 If the ceremonies are to be held so that the people may learn the Scriptures and the Word of God, and thereby come to the fear of God and attain comfort, and thus pray rightly, for this is why ceremonies are instituted, we keep Latin for the sake of those who know Latin, and let German Christian chants go alongside it, so that the common people may also learn something and be taught the fear of God and knowledge. This custom is always considered praiseworthy in the church. For although in some places more, in some places fewer German songs are sung, yet in all churches something has ever been sung in German by the people, therefore it is not so new. But where is this Pharisaic doctrine written, that hearing mass without understanding ex opere operato is meritorious and blessed? Shame on you, you sophists, with such dreams.

651 But that we do not hold private masses, but only one public mass, when the people communicate, is nothing against the common Christian church. For in the Greek church no private masses are held on this day, but only one mass, and that same mass is held in public.

on Sundays and high feasts. This is all an indication of the old custom of the church. For the teachers who existed before the time of St. Gregory do not remember the private masses in any place. But how the individual masses or "private masses" had a beginning, we leave for the moment. This is certain, since the mendicant orders and monks thus gained the upper hand, the masses were founded more and more every day from the false teachings of the same and torn down for the sake of money and avarice, so that the theologians themselves complained about it all the time. And even though St. Francis, out of right good opinion, wanted things to happen, and decreed to his own that every monastery should be satisfied daily with a common mass, this same useful statute was subsequently changed by hypocrisy or for the sake of money. Thus they change the order of the old fathers when and where they desire, when it suits their kitchens, and then tell us: one must keep the order of the old fathers holy. Epiphanius writes that in Asia communion was held three times a week, and that mass was not said every day, and says that the custom was thus established by the apostles.

652 Although the adversaries in this place have boiled many words and sayings one into another, seeking to prove that the mass is a sacrifice, yet with this single answer the great clamor is soon quieted, and their mouths are soon shut, when we say, The sayings, the arguments, reasons, and all that have been brought forward, do not prove that the masses ex opere operato deserve forgiveness of sins, remission of chastisement, and guilt, to the priest or to others for whom they are applied. This few clear answers overthrow all that the opponents put forward, not only in the Confutation, but in all their books and writings which they have written about the Mass.

653 And this is the main question in this whole matter, of which we want to warn every Christian reader, that he should look carefully at the adversaries, whether they also remain with the main question. For they are wont to make much vain, unruly circumlocution out of the main matter. For if one sticks to the main question immediately and unvariedly, and does not add anything extraneous, it is all the easier to judge on both sides.

654 We have declared in our Confession that we hold that the Lord's Supper or the Mass makes no one pious ex opere operato, and that the Mass, if said for others, does not merit them forgiveness of sin, remission of chastisement, and guilt; and of the principal part we have wholly strong, certain reason, namely this. It is impossible that we should obtain forgiveness of sins through our work ex opere operato, that is, through the work done in Himself, sins done motu utentis, if the heart already has no good thought, but through faith in Christ the terror of sin, of death, must be overcome, if our hearts are raised up and comforted through the knowledge of Christ, as said above. When we feel that we have a gracious God for Christ's sake, that is, that His merit and righteousness are given to us, Rom. 5, v. 1: "If then we have been justified by faith, we have peace with God" 2c. This is such a strong and certain reason that all the gates of hell will not be able to oppose it. Of this we are certain.

655 And this would be just enough of the whole matter. For no reasonable man or man of understanding will praise the Pharisaic or pagan hypocrisy and the great abuse of the opere operato. And yet the same error has broken out all over the world. Hence so many innumerable masses have been instituted all over the world, in all monasteries, convents, churches, cloisters, in all corners. For for this purpose masses are held for money, to propitiate God's wrath, to obtain forgiveness of sins, redemption from torment and guilt, to redeem the dead from purgatory, to obtain health, wealth, happiness, and welfare in hand 2c. The hypocritical, pharisaical opinion was planted in the church by the monks and sophists. Although the error of the abuse of the Mass is sufficiently dispelled by the fact that one does not obtain forgiveness of sins through our work, but through faith in Christ, yet because the opponents introduce many sayings of Scripture quite clumsily to defend their error, we want to add something more here.

656 The adversaries speak much of sacrifice in their confutation, when we have diligently avoided the word sasriüsiirm in our confession for the sake of uncertain understanding, but have expressed their highest abuse in plain words, which they mean and do by the name saeriiieurci. That we may now lay aside the sayings which they have unjustly and falsely introduced, we must first say what the word saerikieium or sacrifice means.

657 They have written many books for ten years that the mass is a sacrifice, and none of them has ever defined what sacrifice is or is not. They seek only the vocabulum or word sacriueium, where they find it in eoneoräantü8 the Biblien, and stretch it hither, it rhymes or not. So do they also in the old fathers' books. Then they invent their dreams to it, as if sacrificiun must be called what they will.

What sacrifice is or is not, and how many kinds of sacrifice.

658 And lest any man fall blindly into the matter, we must first shew the difference between what is a sacrifice, and what is not a sacrifice. And this is useful and good for all Christians to know. The theologians are accustomed to distinguish snerikeiurü and 8aerainentirm, sacrifice and sacrament. Now the ZMU8 we will let be eererrrorüa or holy work. Sacramentum is an eeremoräa or outward sign or work, by which God gives us that which the divine promise attached to the same ceremony implies. Thus, baptism is a ceremony and a work, not that we give or offer to God, but in which God gives and offers to us, in which God baptizes us, or the servant in God's stead. There GOD appoints us and gives us forgiveness of sins according to His promise, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" [Marc. 16:16.]. Again, aeriUeiurir or sacrifice is an eeremonia or work that we give to GOD so that we may honor Him.

659 But it is chiefly two kinds of sacrifice, and no more, among which all other sacrifices are comprehended. One is a propitiatory sacrifice, by which the sin and guilt are atoned for, God's wrath is quenched and propitiated, and forgiveness of sin is obtained for others. For another is a sacrifice of peace offerings, by which forgiveness of sin, or atonement, is not obtained, but is made by those who are already atoned for, that they may give thanks for the forgiveness of sin obtained, and for other graces and gifts.

(660) These two kinds of sacrifices must be diligently observed in this transaction, and in many other disputations, care must be taken that these two are not mixed together. And this difference of division has strong evidence from the epistle to the Hebrews, and in many places in the Scriptures. And all the sacrifices in the law of Moses, as diverse as they may be, are divided and comprehended under these two kinds of sacrifices, as under their genera. For some of the sacrifices in the law of Moses are called expiatory sacrifices, or sacrifices for sin, for the sake of their signification; not that forgiveness of sin should be merited thereby 1).

1) Müller: "will". Latin: msrsrsutur.

before God, but that they were outward atonements for the sake of their meaning; for those for whom they were offered were atoned for by such sacrifices, that they might not be cast out from among the people of Israel. Therefore they were called expiatory sacrifices; but the other sacrifices were peace offerings.

661 So in the law there were meanings of the right sacrifice, but there was only one true atonement, sacrifice for sin in the world, namely, the death of Christ, as the epistle to the Hebrews says [Cap. 10:4.], "It was impossible that the blood of oxen and goats should take away sin." And soon after it is said of the obedience and will of Christ [v. 10.], "In which will we are sanctified by the sacrifice of the body of Christ once." 2c. And Isaías the prophet also before interpreted the law of Moses, indicating that the death of Christ is the payment for sin, and not the sacrifices in the law, since he says of Christ [Cap. 53, 11.], "If he hath given his life for a trespass offering, he shall have seed, and live unto length." For the Prophet has applied the word trespass offering to Christ's death, to indicate that the trespass offerings in the law were not the right sacrifice to pay for sin, but that another sacrifice must come, namely Christ's death, by which God's wrath was to be atoned for. The trespass offerings in the law had to cease when the gospel was revealed and the right sacrifice was offered. Therefore they were not true atonements before God, for they had to fall, and another had to come. For this reason, they alone have been meanings and examples of the right atonement. Therefore, it is certain that there was only one sacrifice, the death of Christ, which was to be applied to others to atone for God's wrath.

662. Now over and above this one atonement, which is the death of Christ, there are other sacrifices, all of which are only peace offerings, as all the sufferings, preaching, and good works of the saints. These are not the sacrifices by which we are atoned for, which may be done for others, or which merit ex opere operato forgiveness of sins or propitiation. For they are made by those who have already been atoned for through Christ. And such sacrifices are our sacrifices in the New Testament, as Peter the apostle saith, 1 Peter 2:5. "Ye are a holy priesthood, that ye offer spiritual sacrifices." And in the New Testament no sacrifice applies ex opere operato "ine dono motu utenti8, that is, the work without a good thought in the heart. For Christ saith John 4:23, "The right worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

that is, with heart, with heartfelt fear, and with heartfelt faith. Therefore it is a devilish, pharisaical, and antichristic doctrine and worship that our adversaries teach that their mass deserves forgiveness of sins and chastisement ox opere operato.

The Jews did not understand their ceremonies well either, and thought that they would be righteous before God if they had done the works ex opere operato. Against this the prophets cried out most earnestly, so that they might point the people from their own works to the promise of God, and bring them to faith and right worship. Jer. 7, v. 22 f.: "I did not speak to your fathers about sacrifices or burnt offerings when I brought them out of Egypt, but I commanded them this word: Hear my voice, and I will be your GOOD" 2c. What will the stiff-necked Jews have said to this sermon and teaching, which seems to be quite openly against the Law and against Moses? For it was ever public that GOD had commanded the fathers of sacrifices. Jeremiah could not deny this. But Jeremiah condemns their error concerning the sacrifices, of which there was no command from God, namely, that they thought that the sacrifices ox opere operato atoned for and pleased God. Therefore Jeremiah adds this to the faith that God has commanded: "Hear me," that is, believe me that I am your God, that I sustain you, have mercy on you, help you all hours, and may not your sacrifice; believe that I am your God, who justifies you and sanctifies you, not because of your merit, but because of my promise; therefore you shall wait for all comfort and help from me.

(664) Even so the 50th Psalm, v. 13, rejects the heathen opinion of the opere operato, saying, "Thinkest thou that I will eat the flesh of an ox, or drink the blood of a goat? Call upon me in the time of trouble," 2c. Then the opus oporaturu is rejected, saying, "Call upon me." There he indicates the highest service of God, when we call upon him from the heart. Item, in the 40th Psalm, v. 7. "Thou hast no pleasure in sacrifice and meat offering; but thou hast opened mine ears," that is, thou hast given me a word to hear, demanding that I should believe thy word, and thy promises to help me. Item, Ps. 51:18, 19: "Thou hast no desire to sacrifice, else I would give it to thee 2c. The sacrifices of GOD are a broken spirit" 2c. Item, in the 4th Psalm, v. 6. "Offer sacrifices of righteousness, and hope in the LORD." There he commands that we should hope in the Lord, and calls this a righteous sacrifice; there he indicates that the others are not righteous.

Sacrifices 2c. Item, Ps. 116, 17: "To you I will offer sacrifices of thanksgiving, and call on the name of the Lord" 2c.

(665) And all Scripture is full of such sayings, which indicate that no sacrifice, no work ex opere operato, propitiates God. Therefore it teaches that in the New Testament the sacrifices of the Law of Moses have been done away with, and are pure and without blemish, namely, faith toward God, thanksgiving, praise of God, the preaching of the Gospel, the cross, and the sufferings of the saints, and the like.

666. And of these sacrifices Malachias speaks, saying [Cap. 1:11.], "From the going forth of the sun even unto the going down thereof, my name is great among the heathen, and in every place a pure sacrifice shall be offered unto my name." The same saying the adversaries falsely and foolishly interpret to mean the mass, and attract the old fathers. But it is soon answered there: If Malachias spoke of the Mass when he did not, it does not follow that the Mass ox opere operato makes us pious before God, or that one can say Mass for others to obtain forgiveness of sin. This is not what the prophet says, but what the sophists and monks impudently invent from their own brains.

667 But the words of the prophet themselves bring right understanding. For first the prophet saith, Let the name of the Lord be magnified: which is done by the preaching of the gospel. For by this the name of Christ is confessed, and the grace promised in Christ is made known. Through the preaching of the gospel people come to faith, they call on God, they give thanks to God, they suffer persecution for God's sake, they do good works. Therefore the prophet calls it the pure sacrifice, not the ceremonies of the Mass alone ex opere operato, but all spiritual sacrifices by which God's name is magnified, namely a pure, holy sacrifice is the preaching of the Gospel, faith, calling, prayer, confessing the Gospel and Christ before the world 2c.

(668) And we do not greatly dispute whether anyone ever wants to apply it to the ceremonies of the Mass, if only he does not say that the bad ceremonia ex opere operato makes atonement for God. For as we call the sermon a sacrifice of praise, so the ceremony of the Lord's Supper may be in itself a sacrifice of praise; but not such a sacrifice as ex opere operato makes one righteous before God, or which one can do for others to obtain for them forgiveness of sin. But soon after this we will also say how the ceremony is a sacrifice. Because

But Malachias speaks of all the services and sacrifices of the New Testament, so he does not speak of the mass or the Lord's Supper alone. Item, because he refutes the same Pharisaic error of the opere operato, the saying does nothing against us, but rather for us, because it demands inwardly the heart to make a sacrifice of thanksgiving to God, through which the name of the Lord becomes truly great.

(669) There is also a saying drawn from Malachi, (Cap. 2:3), "And he shall make the sons of Levi to be as gold and as silver, and they shall offer unto God sacrifices of righteousness." There he says of sacrifices of righteousness, therefore the text is against the opus operatum. But the sacrifices of the sons of Levi, that is, of those who preach in the New Testament, is the preaching of the gospel, and the good fruits of preaching, as Paul saith Rom. 15:16, "I am to be a minister of Christ among the Gentiles, to offer the gospel of GOD, that the Gentiles may become an offering acceptable to GOD through faith." For the slaughter of oxen and sheep in the law signifies the death of Christ and the preaching of the gospel, by which the old Adam is daily put to death, and the new and eternal life begins.

670 But the adversaries everywhere apply the word sacrifice or sacrificium only to the ceremonies of the mass. Of the preaching of the gospel, of faith, of thanksgiving, and of calling upon the name of God, they speak nothing at all, though the ceremony is instituted for this purpose, since the New Testament has only spiritual sacrifices within the heart, and not such sacrifices as the Levitical priesthood.

(671) Even so the adversaries draw to the juge sacrificium, that is, the daily sacrifice, and say, as in the law of Moses there was a daily sacrifice, so the mass is the juge sacrificium of the New Testament. If the thing were to be done with allegories, every one would find allegories to serve him. But all those of understanding know that in such highly important matters before God, one must have God's word, certain and clear, and not forcefully draw in obscure and strange sayings; such uncertain interpretations do not hold the sting before God's judgment.

672 Although we would have the opponents call the mass juge sacrificium or daily sacrifice, if they called the whole mass, that is, the ceremonies with thanksgiving, with faith in the heart, with the heartfelt invocation of divine grace, juge sacrificium, because all this together would like to be called juge sacrificium.

juge sacrificium of the New Testament. For the ceremonial of the Mass, or of the Lord's Supper, is instituted for the sake of all this; for it is instituted for the sake of preaching, as Paul says [1 Cor. 11:26], "As often as ye eat the bread, and drink the cup, ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord." But this does not at all follow from the figure of the daily sacrifice, that the Mass is such a sacrifice, which ex opere operato atones for God, or which one can keep or do for others, in order to obtain forgiveness of sin for them.

(673) And if the sacrificium, or daily sacrifice, be rightly considered, it signifieth not only the ceremonies, but also the preaching of the gospel. For in the fourth book of Moses, 28th verse, 3rd and following, there are three parts which belong to the same daily sacrifice. First, a lamb was sacrificed for a burnt offering, and wine was poured on it. Then there was also offered a dish, mixed with breadcrumbs and oil.

674 The whole law of Moses is a shadow and figure of Christ and of the new testament. That is why Christ is pictured in it. The lamb signifies the death of Christ; the pouring of wine upon it signifies that all believers in all the world should be sprinkled with the blood of the lamb through the gospel, that is, that they should be sanctified, as Peter says, 1 Peter 1:2: "Through sanctification of the Spirit, in obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." The kuche signifies the calling and thanksgiving in all believers' hearts. Now as in the Old Testament is the shadow, and the signification of Christ, or of the gospel, so in the New Testament the same gospel and truth signified by the figure is to be looked for, and is not first to be looked for a new type or figure, which they would or would call sacrificium.

675 Therefore, although the mass or ceremonial in the Lord's Supper is a memorial of the death of Christ, yet the ceremonial alone is not the juge sacrificium or daily sacrifice, but the memorial of the death of Christ, together with the ceremonial, is the daily sacrifice, that is, the preaching of faith and of Christ, which faith truly believes that God was atoned for by the death of Christ. To the same juge sacrificio also belongs the fruit of the sermon, that we may be sprinkled with the blood of Christ, that is, be sanctified, that the old Adam may be put to death, and the Spirit increase, that is, be poured out. After this we should also give thanks and praise God, and confess the faith with suffering and good works, which is signified by flour and oils.

676 So, when the gross Pharisical error of the opere operato is done away, it is found that by the joZo saeritreium is signified the spiritual sacrifice and daily oblation of the heart; for Paul saith, [Col. 2:17], "In the old testament is the shadow of things to come; but the body and the truth is in Christ." Now this is the knowledge of Christ, and the Holy Spirit in the heart, which worketh vain thanksgiving and daily spiritual sacrifices in the heart. Now from this it appears enough that the likeness of saerilieio or daily sacrifice is nothing against us, but rather for us. For we have clearly shown that all that belonged to the daily sacrifice in the law of Moses must mean a true hearty sacrifice, not opus oporatuui. The opposer's dream is false, because they think it means only the bad outward work and ceremonies, when faith in the heart, preaching, confession, thanksgiving, and heartfelt invocation are the proper daily sacrifices, and the best part of the mass, they call it sacrifice or otherwise.

677 Now all godly, pious, honorable, Christian men can easily perceive that the adversary's accusation is unjust, since they say, we dismiss this to ao saeritioiuui. But experience shows that they are the true Antiochians, who show themselves to be raging tyrants in the church, with vain thirst and violence; who, under a semblance of spirituality, draw to themselves all the power of the world, and yet ask nothing of the preaching office, of Christ, or of the gospel. Above this, they are under the authority to set up new services of their own liking in the church, and to defend them with vain violence. For the adversaries keep only the ceremonies of the mass, but they abandon the proper custom of the mass, and use the mass only for avarice and shameful fairs, and then pretend that it is a work that benefits others, that earns others forgiveness of sins, torment, and guilt. In their sermons, however, they do not teach the gospel, nor do they comfort consciences, nor do they preach that sins are forgiven without merit for Christ's sake, but they preach about calling on the saints, about satsiskaotionidus, about pardon, about the statutes of men, and say that through these things men become pious before God. And though these public blasphemous abuses are many, yet, because they bear money, they seek to preserve them by force. And the most learned preachers among them preach confused philosophical quarrels and questions, which neither they themselves nor the people understand. Finally, whether some among them are not unlearned, they teach the law, and teach nothing of Christ or of faith.

678 The adversaries draw on Daniel, who says, [chap. 9:27], "There shall be abominations and desolations in the church;" and point this to our church, because the altars are not covered, neither are there lights burning therein, and the like. Although it is not true that we do away with all such outward ornaments. Nevertheless, if it were so, Daniel does not speak of such things, which are altogether outward, and do not belong to the Christian church, but rather means another more abominable desolation, which is strong in Pabstism, namely, the desolation of the most necessary and greatest service, the ministry of preaching, and the suppression of the gospel. For the adversaries preach the more part of the statutes of men, by which the consciences of Christ are led to their own works and trust. Thus it is certain that under the papacy no one has understood the preaching of repentance, or of the poonitontia, as the adversaries teach it, and yet this is the most necessary part of the whole Christian doctrine.

(679) The adversaries have tormented the poor consciences, and afflicted them with sins; and of faith in Christ, by which one obtains remission of sins, and of the right fight and temptation, which are the exercise of faith, they have taught nothing rightly, whereby the consciences might have consolation. All their books, all their sermons, have been of no more use than nothing, and have done untold harm. In addition to this, there is the terrible, horrible abuse of the mass by the opponents, the like of which has hardly ever been seen on earth, and countless other unchristian, foolish services; this is the real devastation of which Daniel says.

680. In our churches, however, the priests attend to their office, teach and preach the gospel, preach Christ, that we have forgiveness of sin and a gracious God, not because of our works, but because of Christ. This teaching gives the hearts a right, certain, constant comfort. They also teach the Ten Commandments, and of righteous good works, which God has commanded. They also teach about the proper Christian use of the holy sacraments.

681 And if the consecration feast or the mass should be called the daily sacrifice, then the mass would be called so with us. For in their churches their priests all say mass for the sake of their prebends and money. In our churches the holy sacraments are not abused in this way. For there is never-

For this purpose the people are instructed in the proper Christian use of the sacrament, namely, that it is instituted to be a seal and certainly a sign of the forgiveness of sins, by which the hearts are reminded and the faith is strengthened, so that they may certainly believe that their sins are forgiven. If then we keep the preaching of the gospel and the right use of the sacrament with us, we have without doubt the daily sacrifice.

682 And though it should be said of external well-being, our churches are better adorned than the contrary. For the proper outward adornment of the church is also the proper preaching, the proper use of the sacraments, and that the people may be accustomed to them in earnest, and come together, learn, and pray with diligence and modesty. Because, by the grace of God, Christian and wholesome things are taught in our churches, such as comfort in all disputes, the people gladly stay with good preaching. For there is no thing that keeps people more in the church than good preaching. But our adversaries preach their people out of the church, for they teach nothing of the necessary pieces of Christian doctrine, telling legends of the saints and other fables.

683 Above this, where our adversaries consider their candles, altar cloths, images, and such like ornaments, and worship with them, they are the servants of the Antichrist, of whom Daniel says that they honor their God with silver, gold, and such like ornaments.

684. even so they draw from the epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 5:1: "Every high priest that is taken from among men is set apart for men against GOD, that he may offer gifts and sacrifices for sin." There they conclude: Since in the New Testament there are bishops and priests, it follows that there must also be a sacrifice for sin. This would move the unlearned and inexperienced most of all, especially when they see the splendid splendor in temples and churches. And the clothing of Aaroni, since in the Old Testament there was also much adornment of gold, silver, and purple, they think that in the New Testament there must be the same worship, ceremonies, and sacrifices, sacrificing for other people's sins, as in the Old Testament. For the whole abuse of the masses and sacerdotal services is not a custom anywhere, because they have wanted to follow the ceremonies of Moses, and have not understood that the New Testament deals with other things, and that they have not understood that the New Testament deals with other things.

That such outward ceremonies, whether they be needed for the discipline of children, should keep their measure.

685. and although our cause is especially well founded in the epistle to the Hebrews, yet the adversaries draw from the same epistle some sayings garbled, as in the very place above mentioned, where the text saith, "Every high priest 2c. is set to sacrifice." 2c. The text soon refers this to Christ. The words which precede speak of the Levitical priesthood, and say that the Levitical priesthood is an interpretation of the priesthood of Christ. For the Levitical sacrifices for sin did not merit forgiveness of sin before God, but were only an image of Christ, who was the right, only, true sacrifice for sin, as I said above. And almost the entire epistle to the Hebrews deals with the fact that the Levitical priesthood and the sacrifices in the Law were not intended to merit forgiveness of sin or atonement before God, but only to signify the future true sacrifice, Christ. For the patriarchs and saints of the Old Testament were also justified and atoned for by God through faith in the promise of the future Christ, through whom salvation and grace were promised, just as we in the New Testament obtain grace through faith in Christ, who has been revealed. For all believers from the beginning have believed that a sacrifice and payment for sin would take place, namely Christ, who was future and promised, as Isaiahs Cap. 53, 10. says, "When he shall give his soul for a trespass offering for sin" 2c.

686 If therefore in the old testament by the sacrifices no man obtained remission of sins, because they only signified the one sacrifice of Christ, it follows that there is only one sacrifice, even Christ, who hath paid for all the sins of the world, and hath been sufficient. For this cause there is no other sacrifice in the New Testament to pay for sins, but the one death of Christ, which was once offered on the cross.

687 Therefore, when they thus say, that in the new testament there must be a priest that offereth, this only is to be yielded and understood by Christ. And to this the whole epistle to the Hebrews urges and strongly agrees. And this would also be to represent and to admit other mediators besides Christ, if we would admit any other satisfaction for sin and propitiation than the death of Christ.

688.           and           because           the           priesthood           of           the           new

For if the Holy Testament is an office by which the Holy Spirit works, it cannot be a sacrifice which ex opere operato helps others. For if my own faith and life be not wrought by the Holy Ghost, another's opus operatum cannot make me devout and blessed. Therefore the mass cannot be for others; this is clear and certain.

689 We have now shown the reason why the mass does not justify anyone before God ox opere operato, and why masses cannot be held for others. For both of these things are contrary to faith and the doctrine of Christ. For it is impossible that sins should be forgiven, or that the terrors of death and hell should be overcome by another's work, but only by faith in Christ; as the saying is Rom. 5:1: "If we have been justified, we have peace with God. To this we have shown that the sayings of Scripture, which are accused against us, prove nothing for the heathen and antichrist doctrine of the adversaries concerning the opere operato; and all godly, respectable people in all the world, in all nations, can now notice and judge of this. Therefore the error of St. Thomas is to be rejected, who writes that the body of the Lord was sacrificed once on the cross for original sin, and is sacrificed daily on the altar for daily sins, so that the church has a sacrifice to reconcile God daily. The other errors are also to be rejected, that the mass is granted ex opere operato to him who says it; item, if one says mass for others who do not say obicem, even if they are ungodly, that the same obtain forgiveness of sin and redemption from pain and guilt. All these things are vain errors and false, and invented by vain unlearned, unholy monks, who know nothing at all of the gospel, of Christ, and of the faith.

690 From this error, from such abuses of the masses, countless others have arisen, namely, that they dispute whether a mass, when it is said for many, is also [as] powerful as when each person has a mass said for himself. From this disputation the masses have grown and been sold higher and higher.

691 Further, they still say mass for the dead, to deliver souls from purgatory (which is a shameful fair), when the sacrament is useful neither to the living nor to the dead without faith. And the adversaries cannot produce one letter, not one syllable, from the Scriptures, to confirm the dreams and fables, which they have unashamedly and unashamedly, with great clamor, in great adulation.

They preach the truth when they have neither the testimony of the church nor the testimony of the fathers. Therefore, they are hopeless, blinded people who knowingly despise the public truth of God and trample it underfoot.

What the old teachers or fathers from the victim write.

692 Having rightly interpreted and accounted for the sayings which the adversaries draw from the Scriptures, we must also answer the sayings of the fathers of old which they draw. We know well that the fathers call the mass a sacrifice. But the opinion of the Fathers is not that by saying Mass ox opere operato one obtains forgiveness of sin, or that one should say Mass for the living and the dead in order to obtain for them forgiveness of sin, indulgence from chastisement, and guilt. For they will never prove that the fathers taught anything of such an abomination contrary to all Scripture, but the books of the fathers speak of thanksgiving and the sacrifice of thanksgiving; therefore they call the mass eucharistiam. But we have already said that the sacrifices of thanksgiving do not obtain forgiveness of sin for us, but are offered by those who have already been atoned for through faith in Christ. Just as the cross and tribulation do not merit atonement against God, but are thank-offerings when those who are atoned for bear and suffer such tribulation.

693 And these brief words are answer enough against the sayings of the fathers, and also protect us enough against our adversaries. For it is certain that the dreams of the opere operato are nowhere found in the books or writings of the fathers. But in order that this whole matter and business of the Mass may be the more clearly understood, let us also speak of the proper use of the Sacrament, and so, as is also found in the holy Scriptures and in all the writings of the Fathers.

Of the right custom of the sacrament and of the sacrifice.

(694) Some bold scholars invent for themselves that the Lord's supper is instituted for two reasons. First, that it is the motto and sign of a religious order, as the caps of their monks are a distinction and sign. Then they think that Christ was particularly pleased to give or set forth the same motto by means of a meal or supper, in order to show the friendship of brotherly relations that should exist among Christians. For to eat and drink with one another is a sign of friendship. But this is a human thought, and does not indicate the proper use of the sacrament. It speaks only of love and friendship, which worldly men also understand. But there is no mention of faith, or of the promise of God, which is the greatest thing; which faith is a much higher and greater thing than is thought.

695 But the sacraments are signs of the divine will toward us, and are not merely slogans or signs by which men know themselves. And those are right who say that the sacraments are signus gratiae, that is, the sacraments are signs of grace. And because in the sacrament there are two things, the outward sign and the word, so in the New Testament the word is the promise of grace which is attached to the sign. And the same promise in the New Testament is a promise of the forgiveness of sin, as the text says, "This is my body given for you. This is the cup of the new testament in my blood, which is poured out for many for the remission of sins." The word begets us to forgiveness of sin. The outward sign is like a seal and confirmation of the words and promise, as Paul also calls it. Therefore, as the promise is vain, if it be not made by faith; so also the ceremony or outward sign is not profitable, except there be faith, which verily believeth that we are forgiven of sins. And the same faith comforts the frightened conscience. And as God gives the promise to awaken such faith, so also the outward sign is given beside it and set before the eyes, that it may move the hearts to believe and strengthen the faith. For by these two, the word and the outward signs, the Holy Spirit works.

696 And this is the right use of the holy Sacrament, when by faith in the divine promise the terrified consciences are restored. And this is the right service in the New Testament. For in the New Testament the highest divine service takes place inwardly in the heart, that after the old Adam we should be put to death, and be born again by the Holy Spirit. And to this end Christ also instituted the sacrament, saying, "Do these things in remembrance of me." For to do these things in remembrance of Christ is not such a thing as is done only with gifts and works, only for a remembrance and an example, as is remembered in the Histories of Alexandria and the like, 2c. but is called rightly knowing Christ, seeking and desiring Christ's good pleasure. Faith, then, which recognizes the abundant grace of God, makes alive.

(697) And this is the noblest use of the sacrament, that it may be well remembered which are rightly sent unto the sacrament, namely, the affrighted consciences, which feel their sin, are terrified at the wrath and judgment of God, and long for consolation. Therefore the Psalm says: "He hath made a memorial of his wonders, the gracious and merciful Lord; he hath given meat to them that fear him." And faith, knowing such mercy, quickeneth. And this is the right use of the sacrament.

698 There also is, and is found, the sacrifice of thanksgiving or thanksgiving. For when the heart and conscience feel the great hardship, fear, and terror from which it has been delivered, it gives thanks from the heart for such great, unspeakable treasure, and also needs ceremonies or outward signs to praise God, and shows that it accepts such God's grace with gratitude, and esteems it great and high. Thus, the Mass becomes a sacrifice of thanksgiving or praise.

699 And thus the fathers speak of two effects or benefits of the sacrament. First, that thereby the consciences are comforted. Second, that praise and thanksgiving be given to God. The first actually belongs to the proper use of the sacrament, the other to the sacrifice. Of consolation Ambrose says: "Go to him, that is, to Christ, and receive grace, 2c. for he is the forgiveness of sin. But ask ye who he is? Hear him himself say, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall not hunger; and he that believeth on me shall not thirst." There he indicates that with the sacrament forgiveness of sin is offered. He also says that one should grasp this with faith. There are innumerable sayings in the Fathers' books, which the adversaries all point to the opus operatum and to the keeping of the Mass, which is done for others, while the Fathers speak of faith in the promise of God, and of the consolation which consciences receive, and say nothing at all about uxplotions.

700. There are sayings in the Fathers about thanksgiving, as Cyprian speaks almost sweetly of Christian communication: "A Christian heart (he says) divides its thanks in one part for the treasure given; in another part for the sins forgiven, and gives thanks for such abundant grace, that is: A Christian heart looks at what has been given to it in Christ, and what has been forgiven it for great sins out of grace; holds our sorrow and the great mercy of God against each other, and gives thanks to God 2c. And Therefore it is called Eucharistia in the church. Therefore the mass is not such a thanksgiving as should be done or held ex opere operato for others, to obtain forgiveness of sin for them. For this would be contrary to faith, just as if the mass or the outward ceremony without faith made someone pious and blessed.

From the word Mass.

701 Here we see what gross asses our adversaries are. They say that the word missa comes from the word misbeach, which means an altar; from which it is supposed to follow that the mass is a sacrifice, because on the altar one sacrifices. Item, the word liturgia, as the Greeks call the mass, is also said to mean a sacrifice. To this we will briefly reply. All the world sees that for these reasons this pagan and antichristic error need not follow, that the Mass helps ex opere operato, sine bono motu utentis. Therefore they are asses, that in such a great matter they bring up such an inconsistent thing. Even so the asses know no grammatica. For missa and liturgia do not mean sacrifice. Missa is Hebrew for a tax gathered together. For this was the way that Christians brought food and drink to the poor in the assembly. And such a manner was the custom of the Jews, who had to bring such a tax to their feasts, and they called it missa. So liturgia in Greek is actually called an office, where one serves the congregation. This fits in well with our doctrine, that the priest serves as a common minister to those who want to communicate, and administers the holy sacrament.

702 Some think that missa does not come from the Hebrew, but is much the same as remissio, forgiveness of sin. For when one communicated, one spoke: Ite, missa est, Go, ye have forgiveness of sins. And that it be so, they suppose that it was said among the Greeks, Lais aphesis "--? ), that is also so much: they are forgiven. If so, this would be a fine understanding, for forgiveness of sin is always to be preached and proclaimed at this ceremony. But this trade is of little avail, for the word Missa means whatever it wants.

Of masses for the dead.

703 But that the adversaries still want to defend this, that the mass helps the dead, whereof they have made a fair of their own, and special unspeakable cretinism, of which they have no testimony nor command of God in the Scriptures. Now it is an unspeakable, great abomination, and not a small sin, that they may worship in the church without God's word, without all Scripture, and may take the Lord's supper, which Christ instituted, to preach the word, and at the same time to commemorate his death, to strengthen the faith of those who need the ceremony, and impudently draw it upon the dead. For this is rightly taking God's name in vain against the other commandment.

704 For first of all, it is the greatest dishonor and blasphemy of the gospel and of Christ, that the evil work of the mass ex opere operato should be a sacrifice that atones for God, and is sufficient for sin. It is a rather terrible, ugly sermon and doctrine, and a great, unspeakable abomination, that the bad work done by a priest should be counted as much as the death of Christ. It is certain that sin and death cannot be overcome except through faith in Christ alone, as Paul says in Romans 5:1. Therefore masses cannot help the dead in any way by means of surgery.

(705) We will not here relate how weak are the reasons of the opponents of purgatory. We do not wish to tell them how weak are the reasons given by the opponents of purgatory, or how the doctrine of pardon and satisfaction first arose, as we have said above, that it is a vain dream and a fanciful man. But this we will tell them, that it is certain that the Lord's Supper really belongs to the forgiveness of sins. For what consolation would we have, if forgiveness should be offered to us, and yet it should not be forgiveness of sins? Now if the ceremonies imply forgiveness of sins, it follows that it is impossible that they should be a satisfaction ex opere operato, or that they should help the dead. For if it belongs to the forgiveness of sins, it must serve only to comfort consciences, so that they may believe that their sins are truly forgiven.

706 And truly it would be no wonder that all pious Christian people would think themselves bloody with fear and sorrow, if they thought rightly how unspeakable, atrocious, and terrible is the abuse of the masses under the papacy, namely, that the mass is used for no other purpose than for the dead, and to relieve the chastisement of purgatory.

707 They cry, we do juge sacrificium, or the daily sacrifice. This is called right z'uZo saorilloiriin, the daily sacrifice taken away from the church, this is a right tyranny and despotism of the godless Antiochi, so the whole gospel, the whole doctrine of faith, of Christ under-and on such dreams of satisfactionibus preach such lies of the opere operato instead. That is, to trample the gospel underfoot, to shamefully pervert the use of the sacraments. These are the true blasphemers, as Paul says of them that they are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, who suppress the doctrine of Christ, of the faith, and abuse the mass and the Lord's Supper to a shameful, impudent, public avarice, to a fair and cretinism. And all this under a hypocritical appearance of satisfaction. And precisely because of this great, unspeakable blasphemy, the bishops will have to await severe punishment from God. One day God will make the other commandment truly true, and pour out a great, fierce wrath upon them. For this reason, we and all of us must take care that we do not allow ourselves to be subjected to the abuse of the adversaries.

708 But let us return to the matter in hand. If, then, the mass is not a satisfaction, either for punishment or for guilt ex opere operato, it follows that the mass said for the dead is useless and nothing. And there must not be a long disputation. For it is certain that there is no reason in Scripture for such a mass to be said for the dead. Now it is an abomination to worship in the church without all God's word, without all Scripture. And if it is necessary, let us speak of this matter more abundantly, more and according to all necessity. For why should we now quarrel much with the adversaries, if they do not understand what sacrifice, what sacrament, what forgiveness of sin, what faith is?

709 Nor does the Greek Canon apply the mass as a satisfaction for the dead, for it applies it at the same time to all the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles. From this it appears that the Greeks also sacrifice as a thanksgiving, but not as a satisfaction for the chastisement of the purgatory. For it will not be their opinion to deliver the prophets and apostles out of purgatory, but only to offer thanksgiving, beside and with them, for the high, eternal goods, which are given to them and to us.

710 The adversaries contend that it should be condemned for heresy that one man, called Aerius, should have held that the mass is not a sacrifice for the dead. But here they make do with their usual devices, that they invent that our doctrine has been rejected from time immemorial. But the asses are not ashamed of lies. Thus they do not know who Aerius was, or what he taught. Epiphanius writes that Aerius held that prayer for the dead is useless. Now we do not speak of prayer, but of the supper of Christ, whether that ex opere operato is a sacrifice to help the dead? This business of ours concerns Aerial nothing.

711 Whatever else the fathers may have said in favor of the mass, none of it concerns this matter. For the good, pious fathers did not teach this abominable, blasphemous, antichristic error, that the mass ex opere operato merits forgiveness of sins and trespasses for the living and the dead. For this error of the opere operato is a public heresy against all Scripture, against all the prophets and apostles. And all Christians should learn that such papist masses are vile and terrible idolatry.

712 But such idolatry remains in the world as long as the Antichrist reigns and remains. For as in Israel a false worship was established with Baal, even unrighteous worship was established under the appearance of the worship which God had ordained, so also in the church the Antichrist has made a false worship out of the supper of Christ. And yet, just as God nevertheless preserved His Church, that is, some saints, among Israel and Judah, so God nevertheless preserved His Church, that is, some saints, among the papacy, so that the Christian Church has not completely perished. Although the Antichrist will remain in part with his false worship until Christ the Lord comes in public and judges, all Christians should be warned to beware of such idolatry, and should learn how to serve God rightly and obtain forgiveness of sins through faith in Christ, so that they may honor God rightly and have constant comfort against sin. For this is why God graciously made His gospel shine, that we might be warned and saved.

713 We have briefly said this about the mass, so that all God-fearing, pious, respectable people in all nations may understand that we have with all faithful diligence preserved the right honor and the right custom of the mass, and that we have great, highly important reasons why we do not keep it with the adversaries. And we want to warn all pious, respectable people that they do not share the great abomination and abuse of the Mass with the adversaries, so that they do not burden themselves with other people's sins. It is a great bargain and a very important thing. For this abuse is no less than the matter was in Elijah's day with the false worship of Baal. We have looked upon

But if the adversaries will not cease from blasphemy, let them know that we also will be more severe to them.

Article XXVII. (XIII.) Of the monastic vows.

714 In the city of Eisenach, in the country of Thuringia, there was about thirty years ago a Barefoot monk, called Johannes Hilten, who was thrown into a dungeon by his brothers, because he had challenged some public abuses in the monastic life. We have also seen some of his writings, from which it is evident that he preached in a Christian manner and according to the Holy Scriptures; and those who knew him say today that he was a pious, quiet, old man, of an entirely honest and honorable nature and conduct. He had prophesied much of these times, and had said beforehand that things had already happened, and also some things that were yet to happen, which we do not wish to relate here, lest anyone should think that we were doing this out of envy or to please someone. Finally, when he had fallen into an illness because of his age and also because the prison had ruined his health, he asked the guardian to come to him and told him of his weakness; and when the guardian, out of Pharisaic bitterness and envy, attacked him with harsh words, because such preaching would not be useful in the kitchen, he refrained from complaining of his body's weakness, sighed deeply, and said with earnest gestures: he would gladly bear and suffer such injustice for Christ's sake, even though he had neither written nor taught anything detrimental to the monks' standing, but had only attacked gross abuses. Finally he said: "Another man will come when it is written in 1516, who will destroy you monks, and he will remain before you, and you will not be able to resist him. The same word, how monasticism would fall, and the same year, were found afterwards in other of his books, and especially in the Commentariis on the Danielem. But what to think of this man's speech, we leave to each his own judgment. But there are other signs that the monk's being could not last long.

715 It is a fact that the monasteries are nothing but impudent hypocrisy and deceit, full of avarice and pride, and the more unlearned asses the monks are, the more stiff-necked, fierce, and bitter, the more poisonous vipers they are, to pursue the truth and God's word. Thus their sermons and writings are all childish, unrational, foolish things, and all their being is directed to fill their belly and their avarice.

716 In the beginning the monasteries were not such dungeons or eternal prisons, but schools, where the youth and others were educated in the holy Scriptures. Now such noble gold has become dung, and wine has become water. Almost all the greatest monasteries and convents are full of lazy, useless, idle monks, who, under the appearance of holiness, live on common alms in all splendor and pleasure. Christ says that the dead salt is of no use except to be thrown away and trampled under foot. Therefore, if the monks lead such an ungodly life, they are in fact singing their own requiem, and they will soon be finished.

717 There is another sign that the monks will perish, that they are the originators, founders, and instigators, that many learned, honest men will be innocently slain and judged, that Abel's blood will cry out over them, and God will avenge it. We do not say of all of them; there may be some in monasteries who know the holy gospel of Christ, and do not put holiness on their traditions, who are also not guilty of the blood which the hypocrites shed among them.

718 But we speak here of the doctrine which the masters of the Confutation praise and defend. We do not dispute whether one should keep vows to God. For we also hold that one is obliged to keep true vows; but of this we speak, whether by the vows and such monasticism one obtains forgiveness of sin before God; whether they are satisfaction for sin; whether they are equal to baptism; whether they are perfection, by which the prasespta and consilia, that is, not only the commandments, but also the counsels are kept; Whether they are evangelical perfection; whether the monks have merita supererogationis, that is, so much remaining merit and holy works that they cannot do all of them; whether their merits, if they communicate them to others, make them blessed; whether the monastic vows are Christian, according to the opinion thus done? Whether the vows of monasteries, which are forced upon the unwilling, and upon those who, being young, have not understood what they do, whom parents or friends have thrust into monasteries, for the sake of their belly, to save their paternal inheritance alone, are Christian and divine; whether the vows of monasteries, which certainly give rise to sins, are Christian, namely, that the religious must praise and accept the ugly abuse of the mass, the invocation and adoration of the saints, and make themselves partakers of the innocent blood that has been shed until now? Item, since the vows are not kept because of weakness, whether these are true vows and Christian?

719 Of these questions is our controversy and disputation. And as we have also said in our Confession of many unfit vows, which the canons of the popes themselves reject, neither do the adversaries wish all that we have put forward to be rejected. For thus they say in plain words, that all things which we have put forward are to be rejected.

020 But it is necessary here to show how they dispute our reasons, and what they plead to maintain their cause. Therefore, we will briefly describe what the opponents have to say. And since this matter has been diligently and abundantly dealt with in the Book of Doctoris Martini of Monastic Vows, let us consider that same book to be renewed and raised here.

721 For the first thing is certain, that such vows are not divine nor Christian, when I thus make my monastic vow, that I think thereby to obtain forgiveness of sins against God, or to do enough for sin. For this is error, which is openly contrary to the gospel, and is blasphemy against Christ. For the gospel teaches that we obtain forgiveness of sins through Christ without merit, as we have abundantly said above. Wherefore we have rightly introduced St. Paul's saying to the Galatians in the 5th, v. 4: "If ye would be justified by the law, ye are fallen from Christ and from grace." For they that seek forgiveness of sins, not by faith in Christ, but by monastic vows and monasticism, rob Christ of his glory, and crucify him anew. But hear this. Hear, beloved, how the masters of the Confutation would gladly seek a remedy here, saying that Paul is to be understood only from the law of Moses; but the monks do and keep all things for Christ's sake, and take pains to live most closely according to the gospel, that they may merit eternal life, and add a terrible word to it: Therefore it is (they say) unchristian and heretical what is brought against the monastic life. O Lord Jesus Christ, how long wilt thou suffer and endure such public reproach of thy holy gospel, when our enemies blaspheme thy word and truth?

722. we have said in our confession,

That one must obtain forgiveness of sins without merit through faith in Christ. If this be not the pure and upright gospel preached by the apostles, and if this be not the voice of the gospel of the everlasting Father, which thou, O Lord, who sittest in the bosom of the Father, hast revealed unto the world, we shall be justly punished. But thy bitter death on the cross, thy Holy Spirit, which thou hast abundantly given, thy whole holy Christian church, strongly, powerfully, and assuredly testifieth, which is as bright and manifest as the sun, that this is the summa, the core of the gospel, that we obtain forgiveness of sins, not for our own merit, but through faith in Christ.

723 If Paul may say that we do not merit forgiveness of sins by the holy divine law of Moses and its works, he intends that we do much less so by human statutes; and this he indicates clearly enough to the Colossians. For if the works of the law of Moses, which was revealed by God, do not merit forgiveness of sins, how much less do the foolish works, monasticism, rosaries, and the like, which are neither necessary nor useful for worldly life, much less do they give eternal life to the sea?

724 The adversaries invent a dream of their own, that Christ hath done away with the law of Moses, and is come after Moses, and hath brought a new good law, whereby one must obtain forgiveness of sins. By this fanciful, foolish thought they put down Christ and his good deeds. Then they go on to invent that among those who keep the new laws of Christ, the monks live and walk in the closest likeness to Christ and the apostles by their obedience, poverty, and chastity, when all monasticism is vain, shameful hypocrisy. They speak of poverty, when they have never been able to experience, before great abundance, what a true poor man's heart is like. They boast of their obedience, that no people on earth are freer than the monks, who have made a master of their obedience to bishops and princes. Of their holy, great, dangerous chastity I cannot say; I will let Gerson say it, who also says of those who earnestly strive to live chastely, truly not much purity and holiness; although this is more hypocrisy and not one in a thousand who earnestly intends to live purely and chastely, that we inwardly keep silent the thoughts of our hearts.

725 Is this then the great holiness? Is this what Christ and the gospel mean?

lives? Christ did not come after Moses to bring new laws to forgive sins because of our works, but he set his own works against God's wrath for us, so that we might receive grace without merit. But whosoever, without the atonement of Christ, sets his own works against the wrath of God, and for his own merit would obtain forgiveness of sins, bringing the works of the law of Moses, the ten commandments, the rules of Benedict, Augustine, or other 1) rules, casts away the promise of Christ, and falls away from Christ and his grace.

(726) Now here let imperial majesty, all princes and estates of the realm, notice how exceedingly insolent the adversaries are, that they are allowed to say, in spite of themselves, that all that we have brought forward against monasticism is ungodly, when we have taken up quite certain and clear sayings of Paul, and there is nothing clearer, more certain, in the whole Bible, than that we obtain forgiveness of sins through faith alone in Christ alone. And this 2) certain divine truth the masters of confutation, the desperate evildoers and unholy knaves, may call ungodly doctrine. But we have no doubt, where imperial. Majesty and the princes will be warned of this, they will have such a public blasphemy eradicated and torn out of the Confutation.

727 But since we have above abundantly shown that it is an error that we should obtain forgiveness of sin for our own merit, let us here speak the more briefly. For any intelligent reader can easily understand that we cannot be delivered from death and the devil's power and earn forgiveness of sin through the wretched works of the monks. Therefore also the blasphemous, ugly word, which Thomas writes, is in no way to be suffered, that going into a monastery should be a new baptism, or be like baptism. For it is a devilish madness and error that one should compare an unholy human statute and commandment, which has neither God's commandment nor promise, to holy baptism, which is a promise and promise of God.

728 Secondly, these things, willing poverty, obedience, chastity, if they be not otherwise unclean, are mere adiaphora and bodily exercise, wherein neither sin nor righteousness is to be sought. Therefore the saints used it much differently than St. Bernard,

1) Müller: "other", but according to the Latin (aliarura reAularuin) it must be "other".

2) Müller: "the". Latin: 1ia,oe.

Franciscus and others, than now the monks. For these have used such things for the exercise of the body, that they might the more easily wait for teaching, preaching, and other such things, not that such works should be the service of God, to make them righteous before God, or to merit eternal life; but Paul quite disparages the works, saying [1 Tim. 4:8], "Physical exercise is of little use." And it is possible that in some monasteries there are still some pious people who read and study, who need such rules and statutes without hypocrisy, and with this report that they do not consider their monasticism to be holiness. But to hold that these works are a service of God, whereby we become godly before God, and merit eternal life, is contrary to the gospel, and contrary to Christ. For the gospel teaches that through faith in Christ we are justified and obtain eternal life. So also it is contrary to the word of Christ [Matt. 15:9], "They serve me in vain with the commandments of men." So it is against this saying of Paul [Rom. 14:23.], "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." But how can they say that they are services which please God and are pleasing in His sight, if they have neither the word of God nor the command?

729 But here it is to be noted how impudent hypocrites and knaves they are. They may say that their monastic vows and orders are not only divine services that make them righteous and pious before God, but add to this that they are states of perfection; that is, more holy and higher states than others, such as the married state and the regency state. And so, in their monkish hypocrisy and pharisaical nature, there are countless other horrible, heretical errors. For they boast of being the most holy people, who keep not only the commandments or prusespta, but also the eorisilia, that is, the high counsels, which the Scripture gives of high gifts not a commandment, but a counsel. Whereupon, if they themselves invent that they are so rich in merit and holiness that they still have left over, yet the pious saints are so mild that they offer their insrita kuxersroZutioniis, their other merits, to others, and let them be due for an equal penny, for money. All this is vile, abominable, lying, hypocritical holiness, and vain Pharisaical hypocrisy and glitter.

730. for since the first commandment of GOD, "Thou shalt love GOD thy Lord with all thy heart, with all thy soul,"

It is the highest theology, from which all the prophets and all the apostles have drawn their best and highest teachings as from the well; Indeed, if it is such a high commandment, then all worship, all honor to God, all sacrifices, all thanksgiving in heaven and on earth must be regulated and judged according to it alone, so that all worship, no matter how high, delicious, and holy it may seem, if it is outside the commandment, is vain shells and husks without a core, even vain filth and abomination before God; which high commandment no saint has ever perfectly fulfilled, so that Noah and Abraham, David, Peter and Paul still confess themselves to be imperfect, sinners, and must remain here below: It is outrageous Pharisaic, even diabolical pride, that a lousy barefoot monk or such a wicked hypocrite should say, even preach and teach, that he has thus fully kept and fulfilled the holy high commandment, and has done so many good works according to the requirement and will of God, that he still has merits left over. Yes, dear hypocrites, if the holy ten commandments and the high first commandment of God could be fulfilled in this way, as bread and parcels can be put into sacks! They are impudent hypocrites, so that the world is afflicted in these last times.

The Prophet David says [Ps. 116:11]: "All men are liars," that is, no man on earth, not even the saints, esteem or fear God as highly and greatly as they should. No man on earth believes and trusts God as fully as he should 2c. Therefore, it is lies and hypocritical imaginary dreams that the monks boast that they live according to the perfection of the Gospel and the commandments of God, or that they do more than they owe, so that good works and several cents of remaining, superfluous holiness remain in store for them.

732 And so it is false and untruthful, that the monastic life should be a fulfillment of the counsels in the Gospel. For nowhere in the Gospel did it advise such a distinction of clothing and food, or to suck the goods of the people by such a begging rod. For they are vain ordinances of men, of which Paul says [1 Cor. 8:8], "Food doth not make us holier in the sight of God." 2c. Therefore they are not divine services that make us godly before God, nor are they evangelical perfection; but when they are taught, preached, and expounded with magnificent titles, they are, as Paul calls them, true doctrines of the devil [1 Tim. 4:1].

733 Paul commendeth virginity, and preacheth it as good counsel unto them that have the have the same gift, as I have said here above. Therefore it is a shameful, infernal error to teach and hold that evangelical perfection stands in human statutes. For in this way the Mahometists and Turks would also boast (for they also have hermits and monks, as there are credible histories) that they hold evangelical perfection. So also evangelical perfection is not in things that are adiaphora, but because this is the kingdom of God, that inwardly the Holy Spirit enlightens, cleanses, strengthens our hearts, and that he works a new light and life in the hearts, so the right evangelical Christian perfection is that we daily increase in faith, in the fear of God, in faithful diligence of the profession and office that is commanded us, as Paul also describes perfection, since he says 2 Cor. 3:18, "We are being transfigured into the same image, from one glory to another, as of the Spirit of the Lord." He does not say, we pass from one order to another, we put on nowand this, then those caps, nowand this belt, then that cord 2c. It is wretched that in the Christian church such Pharisaic, even Turkish and Mahometan doctrine has prevailed, that they teach that evangelical perfection and the kingdom of Christ, by which eternal goods and eternal life are here raised up, are to be found in caps, in garments, in food, and such childish things.

734 But here let us hear further the excellent teachers, how in their confutation they have set up such a public blasphemy and ugly word. They may impudently say that it is written in Holy Scripture that the monastic life and holy orders deserve eternal life, and that Christ has promised the same especially to the monks, who thus leave house, court, brethren, and sister; these are the clear words of the adversaries. But is not this a very impudent, ugly lie, that it is written in the holy Scriptures that one can earn eternal life through the monastic life? How bold you are! Where does the Scripture speak of monasticism? So the adversaries do these great and excellent things, and so they introduce the Scriptures. The whole world knows, the histories are before their eyes, that orders and monasticism are an entirely new thing, nor may they boast that the holy Scriptures speak of their monasticism.

735 Thus they blaspheme and revile Christ, saying that one can earn eternal life through monastic life. God does not honor His own law, that by works one may earn eternal life.

of the law should merit eternal life, as he clearly says Ezekielis on the 20th, v. 25: I have given them law, by which they cannot have life. For the first thing is certain, that by monasticism no one can merit eternal life, but for the sake of Christ's merit, through pure mercy, eternal life is given to those who through faith obtain forgiveness of sin, and hold the same against God's judgment, not their poor merit. As St. Bernard also spoke a fine word, that we cannot have forgiveness of sin, but only through God's grace and goodness. Item, that we can have nothing at all of good works, if he does not give it. Item, that we cannot earn eternal life by works, but that it is also given to us by grace; and St. Bernard speaks much of the same opinion, as we have told above. And at the end St. Bernard adds: Therefore let no man deceive himself therein, nor deceive; for, if he will consider it himself aright, he will certainly find that with ten thousand he cannot meet him (that is, God) who with twenty thousand is pressing towards him. If then we do not merit forgiveness of sin or eternal life by the works of the divine law, but must seek the mercy promised in Christ, we merit it much less by monastic life, monasticism, which are vain statutes of men, and the honor should be given much less to mendicant statutes.

736. Those who teach that by monasticism we can merit forgiveness of sin, and so put the trust which belongs to Christ alone in wretched statutes, tread badly under foot the holy gospel and the promise of Christ. And for the Savior Christ they honor their shameful caps, their monkish works. And if they themselves still lack grace, they do as the wicked, unholy people, that they still invent their merita supererogationis, and sell to other people the rest of the portion of heaven.

(737) We speak here the more briefly of this matter, for from what has been said above of repentance, as zn8t16outi0ii6, of the ordinances of men 2c., it is enough to note that the monastic vows are not the treasure by which we are redeemed, and obtain eternal life 2c. And if Christ calls these statutes vain services of God [Matt. 15:9], they are in no way an evangelical perfection. Yet some sensible monks have been shy of praising their monasticism so highly that it should be called Christian perfection, They who have moderated this high glory have said: it is not Christian perfection, but it is a state which is to serve to seek Christian perfection. Gerson also remembers such moderation, and rejects the unchristian speech that monasticism is Christian perfection.

738. Now where monasticism is only a state of seeking perfection, it is no more a state of seeking perfection than it is of farmers and husbandmen, of tailors and bakers Life 2c. For all these are also states of seeking Christian perfection. For all men, be they in whatsoever estate they will, each according to his profession, ought to strive after perfection as long as this life endureth, and always to increase in the fear of God, in faith, in love toward their neighbor, and such spiritual gifts.

739 One reads in vitae patrum of St. Anthony and several other great saintly hermits who, through experience, have finally come to realize that their works do not make them more pious before God than the works of others. For St. Anthony at one time asked God to show him how far he had come in the life of perfection. A shoemaker in Alexandria was shown to him, and he was told that he was like a craftsman in holiness. Soon the next day Antonius set out, went to Alexandria, spoke to the same shoemaker, and asked with diligence what kind of holy life and conduct he was leading. Then the shoemaker answered him, I do nothing in particular; for in the morning I say my prayers for the whole city, and after that I work my trade, and wait on my house 2c. Then Antonius soon understood what God had meant by the revelation. For one is not justified before God by this or that life, but only by faith in Christ.

740 But the adversaries, though they are now ashamed to call monasticism perfection, yet in reason they think it so, for they sell their works and merits, and pretend that they keep not only the commandments, but also the counsels and counsels, and think that they still retain merit. Does this not mean that they boast of perfection and holiness in deed, even if they moderate the matter a little in word? It is also clearly stated in the Confutation that the monks live more closely and exactly according to the Gospel than other worldly men. Now if it is their opinion that one lives closer to the Gospel by not having anything of one's own, by living outside of marriage, by wearing special clothing or a cap, by fasting and praying in this way, then it is true that they do not live more closely to the Gospel.

their opinion that their monasticism is Christian perfection, because it is supposed to be closer to the Gospel than common life.

741 It is written in the Confutation, that the monks obtain eternal life more abundantly than others, and they refer to the scripture Matt. 19:29, "He that leaveth house and home" 2c. There they also praise a perfection which should be in monasticism. But the saying speaks nothing of monasticism. For Christ does not mean that leaving father, mother, wife, child, house, and farm should be such a work as to merit forgiveness of sin and eternal life, but that leaving father and mother in this way is not pleasing to God at all, and is condemned to hell. For if anyone forsakes parents, house, and farm to earn forgiveness of sin and eternal life, he blasphemes Christ.

742 But there are two kinds of abandonment. One is by profession and God's commandment. The forsaking that is done without a calling and God's commandment is not acceptable to the Lord Christ. For the works that we ourselves choose, the Lord Christ calls useless, futile service. But from this it is seen more clearly that Christ does not mean such a fleeing of wife and child. He says: "He who leaves wife, child, house and farm" 2c. Now we know that God commanded not to leave wife and child. But it is another forsaking if we forsake parents, wife, child 2c. out of God's commandment, and if we do it ourselves. For if tyrants would force me to deny the gospel, or drive me out, we have God's command that we should suffer injustice before we are driven out, not only from wife and children, house and farm, but also that our life and limb should be taken from us. Christ speaks of abandonment; therefore he adds to it, "for the sake of the gospel," indicating sufficiently that he speaks of those who suffer for the sake of the gospel, not abandoning wife and child of their own accord. For we also are guilty of laying down our own lives for the sake of the gospel. It would be foolish, and quite absurd, if I were to kill myself without God's command. It is also foolish to consider it holy and a service to God that I should leave my wife and child of my own accord without God's command.

743 Therefore the saying of Christ is evil interpreted of monasticism. But it would seem to apply to the monks, that they received a hundredfold things in this life. For monks are much for the sake of the belly, and that they have idleness and soapy kitchens, since they nevertheless come to rich monasteries as beggars. But as all monasticism is full of hypocrisy and deceit, so they also put on the Scriptures falsely. So they commit two terrible sins. One, that they deceive the world with idolatry; the other, that they put on the name and word of God falsely to adorn their idolatry.

744. There is also a saying used in this way [Matt. 19:21], "If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and follow me." The saying has troubled many, that they think to have is the highest holiness and perfection, not to have things of their own, not to have house, farm, goods. But the Cynici, as Diogenes, who would have no house, but lay in a barrel, may boast of such heathen holiness; Christian holiness stands much on higher things than on such hypocrisy. For having goods, house and farm, are worldly regiment ordinances, which are confirmed by God, as in the seventh commandment: "Thou shalt not steal" 2c. Therefore to leave goods, house and farm is not commanded or advised in Scripture. For evangelical Christian poverty does not consist in leaving goods, but in not trusting in them, even as David was poor, with a great power and kingdom.

745 Therefore, since such abandonment of goods is nothing but a human statute, it is a useless service of God. And the pope's extravagant praises and extols far too highly such monkish hypocritical poverty, saying, Not to have one's own for God's sake is a meritoriously holy thing and a way of perfection. When inexperienced people hear such a boast, they think it is unchristian to sit in goods. From this follows much error and rebellion. By such boasting Muenzer was deceived, and by it many Anabaptists are seduced.

746 But they say, Christ himself hath called it perfection. I say no to this, for they do violence to the text, that they do not put it on altogether. Perfection is found in this passage, where Christ says, "Follow me." And therein is the perfection of every Christian, that he should follow Christ, every man according to his calling; and yet the callings are unequal. One is called to be a ruler, another to be a householder, and the third to be a preacher. Therefore, although that young man is called to sell, his calling does not concern others, as David's calling to be a king does not concern all; does not concern others. So the professions are unequal, but obedience should be equal; and in this is perfection, if I am obedient in my profession, not if I take upon myself a strange profession, not having commandment or God's commandment from it.
Abraham's calling to sacrifice his son is not the same.

747 For the third, one of the substantive monastic vows, is chastity. Now we have said above of priestly marriage that by no law or monastic vows can natural or divine law be changed, and if all men have not the gift of chastity, they also keep the same, that [it] may be charged to God; so also no monastic vows nor law can change the Holy Spirit's commandment, since Paul says [1 Cor. 7:2], "To avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife." Therefore monastic vows are not Christian in those who have not the gift of chastity, but fall and make it worse from weakness. Of this article we have here above said. And truly it is a wonder, when the adversaries see before their eyes so many innumerable dangers of conscience and vexations, that they nevertheless, as foolish, furious men, press on to such statutes of men, contrary to the public commandment of God, and do not see that the Lord Christ so severely punishes the Pharisees, who taught statutes contrary to God's commandment.

(748) Fourthly, the abominable and dreadful abuse of the masses, which are said for the living and for the dead, ought to deter every man from the monastic life. Item, the invocation of the saints, which is all directed to avarice, to vain abominations of the devil. For there are two abominations in the calling of the saints. The first is that the service of the saints is based on avarice. The other is that the saints are set up in the place of Christ, and that they are idolatrously worshipped and taken for mediators against God. How alone the preacher monks (let alone the innumerable mad dreams of the other monks), with the brotherhood of the Rosary, have wrought a quite impudent idolatry, which now both enemy and friend mock. Item, the Gospel, which preaches forgiveness of sin for Christ's sake, of right repentance, of right good works, which have God's command, they do not hear, nor do they teach it, but teach from their sermons fables of saints, and their own false works, by which Christ is suppressed. The bishops have suffered all this.

749 Let us here be silent of the innumerable childish ceremonies and foolish services with lessons, with songs and the like, which in part might be tolerated if they had a

They say that these ceremonies are of a certain measure, and are used for good training, as lessons in school and sermons are used to make the hearers better. But now they themselves invent that such various ceremonies are to be the service of God, to merit forgiveness of sin thereby for themselves and others; therefore they also make new ceremonies without ceasing. For if they directed such church services and ceremonies to the end that the youth and the common man might be exercised in the word of God, then short and diligent lessons would be much more useful than their babbling in the choir, which has neither measure nor end. Thus the whole monastic life is full of idolatry and hypocritical errors against the first and other commandments, against Christ. In addition, there is the danger that those who are in monasteries or convents must knowingly help to persecute the truth. For this reason there are many great causes why pious, honest people may flee or even leave the monastic life.

(750) The canons themselves absolve those who are persuaded with good words before they have reached their proper age, or whom their friends have cast into a monastery against their will. From all this it appears that there are many causes which indicate that the monastic vows which have hitherto been made are not truly Christian, consistent vows. Therefore one may leave monastic life with a good conscience, after it is full of hypocrisy and all manner of abominations.

751 Here the adversaries accuse us of the Nazarenes in the law of Moses. But they did not take their vows in order to obtain forgiveness of sin, as we have said above about the monks' vows. The Nazarene order was a bodily exercise with fasting, with certain food, by which they confessed their faith; not that they thereby obtained forgiveness of sins, or were thereby delivered from eternal death; for this they sought elsewhere, namely, in the promise of the blessed Seed. As circumcision in the law of Moses, or the slaughter of sacrifices, is not now to be set up for a divine service, so the fasting or ceremonies of the Nazarenes are not to be set up or put on as a divine service, but are to be kept for a mean thing and bodily exercise. For this reason, they cannot compare their monastic state, which is ordained without the word of God, as a divine service by which God is propitiated, with the Nazarene state, which God had commanded; and it was not intended that the Nazarene should thereby obtain a gracious God, but that it should be a divine service.

An outward discipline and exercise of the body, like other ceremonies in the law of Moses. The same is true of other vows of various kinds that are made in the Law of Moses.

752 Even so the adversaries draw upon the example of the Rechabites, who had no goods, neither did they drink wine, as Jeremiah saith, Cap. 35, 6. f. Yea, verily the example of the Rechabites rhymeth with our monks, when their monasteries are more magnificently built than the palaces of kings, when they live in all abundance. Even so the Rechabites, though they were poor, were husbands and wives; our monks, when they have all splendor, all abundance, pretend to chastity in their hypocrisy.

753 Now the wise and learned know well that all examples are to be interpreted or instituted according to the rule, that is, according to the clear Scriptures, and not contrary to the rule or Scriptures. Therefore, if the Rechabites are praised in Scripture, it is certain that they did not keep their ways and ceremonies in order to merit forgiveness of sin or eternal life, or that their works in themselves could atone for them before God, but that they believed as pious, God-fearing children in the blessed, blessed Seed, in the future Christ. And because they had the commandment and the commandment of their parents, their obedience is commended in the Scriptures, of which the fourth commandment speaks: "You shall honor your father and your mother."

0754 For the manner of the Rechabites hath another cause. When they were among the heathen, their father distinguished them from the heathen by some signs, that they should not fall again into ungodliness and idolatry. For this reason their father wanted to remind them of the fear of God, of faith, and of the resurrection of the dead, and this is a good reason. But the monks have many other causes. They invent that monasticism is a service of God, by which one earns forgiveness of sin and is propitiated to God. Therefore it is no comparison at all with the example of the Rechabites, that I, to say nothing of the innumerable mischiefs and vexations which are still in the monastic life.

755. Even so they bring forward from the first epistle to Timothy, 5 Timothy, v. 11, 12, of the widows that served the churches, and were fed of the common church goods, Paul saying, "For if they have been lewd against Christ, they desire to be free, and have their judgment that they have transgressed the first faith." I will set it at once, that since the apostle speaks of the vows...

But if he speak, as he does not, the saying does nothing to make the vows of the monastery Christian. For the vows of the monastery are made for this purpose, that they should be a service of God, whereby a man may merit forgiveness of sin. But Paul rejects all laws, all works, all services of God, which are thus kept and accepted, in order to merit forgiveness of sin and eternal life, which we obtain through Christ alone. Therefore it is certain, though the widows had made some vows, yet they were unlike the present monastic vows.

756 Moreover, if the adversaries would ever draw and stretch the saying of Paul upon the vows of the monastery, they must also suppose that Paul saith, Let no widow be taken that is younger than threescore years. So then all monastic vows, which were made before the time of old age by younger people, will be unbinding and nothing. But the church has not known anything about monastic vows for a long time. Paul therefore rejects widows, not because they become married (for he calls the young married), but because they let themselves be fed out of the common church treasury, abused it for their lust and lustfulness, and thus broke the first faith. That is, he means that they abandoned their first faith, not their monastic vows, but their baptism, their Christian duty, and their Christianity. And so he also speaks of faith in the same chapter, v. 8: "If any man provide not for his household, he hath denied his faith." For he speaks differently of faith from the sophists. Therefore he says that they deny the faith who do not provide for their householders. So also he says of the forward women, that they forsake the faith.

757 We have shown some causes, and have set forth what the adversaries have brought forward. This we have told, not only for the sake of the adversaries, but much more for the sake of some Christian hearts and consciences, that they may have it clearly before their eyes why monastic vows and all manner of monasticism are not right or Christian, which also all together may cast down to the ground the one word of Christ, when he says, "They serve me in vain with the commandments of men." For from the word alone one has briefly that all monasticism, caps, ropes, girdles, and all one's own fictitious holiness before God are useless, vain services of God. And let all Christian pious hearts consider this quite certain, that this is certainly a Pharisaic, damnable, ugly error, that we should by such monasticism forfeit forgiveness of sin or eternal life.

rather than to obtain them through faith in Christ.

Therefore, pious men who have been saved and preserved in the monastic life must at last have come to the point of despairing of all their monastic life, despising all their works like dung, condemning all their hypocritical services, and holding fast to the promise of grace in Christ, as there is an example of St. Bernard, who said, Perdite vixi, I have lived sinfully. For God does not want any other worship than that which He Himself has established through His Word.

Article XXVIII. (XIV.) Of the could Ecclesiastica.

The adversaries here make a great clamor about the liberties and privileges of the clergy (as they call them), and then make such a resolution: "It is (they say) all nothing and incompetent what is brought forward in this article against the liberties and privileges of the churches and priests. But here the masters of the Confutation act<sup>once</sup> again<sup>as</sup> knaves to denigrate us. For in our Confutation nothing is said against the liberties of churches or priests, that they may be graced by temporal authorities, emperors, kings, and princes. For we teach that secular order and law are to be observed.

But, God willed, that the adversaries would also hear the unspeakable, miserable great lamentation of all the churches, the great cries and groans of so many pious hearts and consciences. The adversaries do not forget the freedom of the churches, and what concerns money and goods. But as to the most necessary and useful offices in the church, they care nothing; they ask nothing at all how one teaches or preaches; they do not ask how the Christian custom of the sacraments is preserved; they ordain coarse asses; thus Christian doctrine has perished, that the churches are not staffed with competent preachers. They make traditions and infallible burdens to corrupt souls. And because of their traditions they hold much tighter than because of God's commandments. Many poor souls are now in doubt and do not know what to hold. Then it behooves the prelates to hear what is right and what is wrong, and to change the abuses, to help the poor people out of doubt, and to take the burden from their burdened consciences. But what they do is in the daylight; they make edicts against public truth, show outrageous tyranny against pious people for the preservation of some of their traditions, which are publicly against God. So they now boast of their privileges, they should also consider their office, and listen to the sighs and lamentations of many pious Christians, which God undoubtedly hears, and will one day demand an account from the prelates.

(761) Nor does the Confutation answer our reasons, but takes a rather papal position, and says of the great power of the bishops, and does not prove it; saying, therefore, that the bishops have power to rule, to judge, to punish, to compel, to make law, conducive to eternal life. Thus the consutation of the bishops boasts of power, and yet does not prove it. Now from this article the controversy is, whether the bishops have power to make laws apart from the gospel, and to command that the same should be kept as a divine service, thereby earning eternal life.

762. Whereupon we make this report: This doctrine must be kept in the church, that without merit we obtain forgiveness of sins through faith for Christ's sake; so also must the doctrine be kept, that all the ordinances of men are of no use to make an atonement for God. Therefore neither sin nor righteousness is to be put into food, drink, clothing, and the like. For Paul says [Rom. 14:17.], "The kingdom of GOD is not eating and drinking." Wherefore the bishops have no power to make statutes apart from the gospel, so as to obtain forgiveness of sin by them, or that they should be divine services, for the sake of which God justifies us, and to which they oblige the consciences in case of mortal sin. All this is taught by some of the sayings in the Acts of the Apostles in the 15th chapter, v. 9, 10, where Peter says, "that hearts are purified by faith." And after this they forbid to put a yoke or burden on the disciples, saying how dangerous it was. They also state that those who sin terribly and act against God and tempt God, who thus burden the church, sin terribly and act against God. For they say, "Why do you tempt God?" This hard and serious word of the apostles, which should have frightened them as a thunderclap, the adversaries do not let them go to their hearts, but still want to defend their imaginary church services with all tyranny and violence.

763. Article, wherein we have set forth that we do not merit forgiveness of sin through the ordinances of men, they condemn, saying here, "The ordinances of men are useful and profitable to merit eternal life. But it is a public fact that they do not comfort the heart inwardly, so they do not bring any new light or life into the heart, as Paul says to Colossians (Cap. 2:8), that therefore the statutes do not help,

To obtain eternal righteousness or eternal life. For the statutes teach of the difference of meat, and of raiment, and of things that consume themselves with the hands. But eternal life, which begins inwardly by faith in this life, is wrought in the heart by the Holy Spirit through the gospel. Therefore the adversaries will never prove that eternal life is earned by the deeds of men.

764 If then the gospel clearly affirms that the church and conscience are not to be burdened with such statutes, that is, that one must thereby obtain forgiveness of sins, or must hold them as necessary divine services, without which Christian holiness cannot be, or that one is to be obliged to hold them in case of mortal sin, then the adversaries will never prove that the bishops have power to establish such divine services.

765 But what office or power the bishops have in the church, we have said in the Confession. The bishops who now bear the name of bishop in the church do not do their episcopal office according to the Gospel. But let them be bishops at once, according to the "anoniea politia, which we leave in its value, but we speak of true Christian bishops. And I do not dislike the old division or partition, that they have said: Episcopal power stands in these two, "Potestat" ordinis and "Potestat" surisäletlonis, that is, in the administration of the sacraments and spiritual jurisdiction. Thus every Christian bishop has potsstatsrn oräinis, that is, to preach the gospel, to administer sacraments. Also he has power of a spiritual judicial compulsion in the church, that is, He has the power and authority to exclude from the Christian congregation those who are found in public vices, and, if they are converted, to receive them back, and to give them absolution. But they have not a tyrannical power, that is, to judge without certain laws; neither have they a royal power, that is, to establish over the given laws; but have a certain commandment of God, and a measured command, under which they are, according to which they are to use their spiritual power and judicial compulsion. Although they have such jurisdiction over public vices, it does not follow that they have power to establish new services. For jurisprudence and the making of new services are far apart. Neither does the backsliding extend to sins against their new laws, but only to those sins which are against God's commandment. For the gospel doth not judge them a re giment apart from the gospel, that is clear and certain.

766 Although in the Confession we have set forth how far the bishops may make statutes, namely, that they should not establish and teach them as necessary services, but that they should be quiet and orderly in the church. But let not the consciences be entrapped thereby, as if they were necessary services. For Paul saith unto the Galatians in the 5th chapter, v. 1: "Stand ye therefore in liberty, as Christ hath made you free, and be not brought again under the yoke of bondage." So then one must leave free to need, or not to need, such outward statutes, that they be not thought of or kept for such divine services as should be necessary to salvation. But one is obliged to avoid trouble. So the apostles ordained many things in the church for the sake of good discipline, which have been changed in time. They did not make ordinances so that they should be necessary or remain forever, for they did not act contrary to their own Scripture and doctrine, in which they argued vehemently that the church should not be burdened or bound with ordinances as if they were necessary for salvation.

767 This is a simple and clear teaching of the ordinances of men, namely, that we know that they are not necessary services, and yet that they ought to be kept according to opportunity, to avoid offence. And thus many learned, great men have held and taught in the church, and it is certain that the adversaries can raise nothing against it; so it is also certain that this word of Christ's Lord, "He that heareth you heareth me," does not speak of the ordinances of men, but is flatly against them. For the apostles did not receive a manäaturn "urn lidsra, that is, an entirely free, appropriate command and authority, but have a measured command, namely, not to preach their own words, but God's word and the gospel. And the Lord Christ, in the words, "He who hears you hears me," wants to strengthen all the world, just as it was necessary that we should be quite sure that the bodily word was God's power, and that no one from heaven should seek or wait for another word. Therefore this word, "He that heareth you heareth me," cannot be understood of statutes. For Christ's intention is that they should teach in this way, so that Christ himself may be heard through their mouths. They do not have to preach their own words, but his word, his voice, and his gospel are to be heard. This comforting word, which is most powerfully un-

The rude asses point to their foolish statutes, to their food, drink, clothing, and such childish works as confirm our doctrine, and have much needed teaching and consolation for the Christian conscience.

768 They also use this saying to the Hebrews, Cap. 13, 17: "Obey them that go before you" 2c. This saying requires that one should be obedient to the Gospel, for it does not give the bishops a dominion of their own, or lordship apart from the Gospel. So also the bishops are not to make statutes contrary to the gospel, nor to interpret their statutes contrary to the gospel. For if they do, the gospel bequeaths us to be obedient to them, as Paul saith to the Galatians [Cap. 1:3], "If any man preach any other gospel unto you, let him be accursed."

769. we answer the same to the saying of Matt. 23:2, v. 3: "In Moses' seat sit the scribes, 2c. all things therefore whatsoever they tell you to observe, observe and do it:" which is certain, that it is not commanded universallitsr, in general, that we should observe all things whatsoever they command, even contrary to the commandment and word of God. For in another place the Scripture says [Acts 5:29], "One must obey God more than men." Therefore if they teach unchristianly and contrary to the Scriptures, they are not to be heard. Neither does this saying set up a government apart from the gospel; therefore they cannot prove their authority, which they have set up apart from the gospel, by the gospel. For the gospel speaketh not as traitionidus, but of God's word to teach.

770 But that the adversaries, at the end of the confutation, revile us, and complain that this doctrine is a cause of disobedience and other more grievances, such is unreasonably laid to the charge of this doctrine of ours. For it is public that authority is highly praised by this doctrine. Thus it is known that in the places where this doctrine is preached, by the grace of God, the authorities have hitherto been held in all honor by their subjects.

771 But that there is disunity and division in the church is known, how these quarrels first took place, and who gave cause for division, namely the Jndulgenzkraemer, who preached insolent lies impudently, and afterwards condemned Luther, that he did not approve of the same lies, for this caused for and for more quarrels, that Luther was caused to challenge other more errors. But because our antitype did not want to tolerate the truth, and was under

If you are still able to handle public error by force, it is easy to judge who is guilty of the separation. All the world, all wisdom, and all power should give way to Christ and his holy word. But the devil is God's enemy, therefore he exerts all his power against Christ to suppress and oppress God's word. So the devil with his members, who opposes God's word, is the cause of division and disunity. For we have sought the highest peace, of which we still desire the highest, so far that we are not urged to blaspheme and deny Christ. For God knows, who is the judge of all hearts, that we have no pleasure or joy in this terrible disunity; so the opposite has not wished to make peace until now, lest we should, through no fault of our own, abandon the wholesome doctrine of the forgiveness of sins through Christ, thereby blaspheming Christ to the highest degree.

772 And though it is not unknown that, as the world is wont to do, some offence has occurred in this division through iniquity and unskilful men, for the devil causes such offence to the dishonour of the gospel, yet all these are not to be esteemed against the high consolation which this doctrine has brought with it, which teaches that for Christ's sake, without our merit, we have forgiveness of sins, and a gracious God. It also teaches that worship is not the abandonment of worldly statutes and authorities, but that such statutes and authorities please God and are truly holy works and worship.

773. If we were to tell the opposite story, which we truly do not want to do, it would be a terrible record of how the mass has been turned into a shameful, blasphemous fair by the opposite party, and how a lewd life has been caused by their celibacy, how the popes have been in war with the emperors for more than four hundred years, and have forgotten the Gospel, and have sought only to be emperors themselves, and to bring all Italy under them; how they have played with the "goods of the church," and how, through their carelessness, much false doctrine and false worship have been set up by the monks. Their worship of the saints is a public pagan idolatry. All their scribes say not a word about this faith in Christ, by which one obtains forgiveness of sins; they place the highest holiness in the statutes of men, of which they write and preach chiefly. It is therefore to be counted among their vexations, that they publicly show what spirit they have, that they have so much innocent piety.

Some people are now murdering for the sake of Christian doctrine. But we do not want to talk about this now, because these things should be judged according to God's word, and the anger of both sides should not be considered in the meantime.

774. we hope that all godly men will see sufficiently in this scripture of ours, that our teaching be Christian and comforting and salutary to all the pious. Therefore we ask God to grant grace that His holy Gospel may be known and honored by all to His praise, and to the peace, unity and blessedness of all of us, and we hereby request, where necessary, to report further on all articles.

1032 Speech of the Elector of Brandenburg on behalf of the Committee to the Protestant Estates, Aug. 7, 1530.

From Müller's Hist. 2c., p. 714.

The Lutheran princes would know from what faithful diligence was obtained from the imperial majesty that first of all friendly and amicable dealings should be held with them, whether ways of unity could be found.

could; For this reason he also wanted to admonish them to consider how the opinion they had recently adopted was so publicly against the gospel and all apostolic writings, how great the destruction of souls, bloodshed and other harm to the whole German nation would result from it, if they did not obey the imperial majesty's search and commandment, and were lacking in themselves, so that that which should be acted upon and decided at the Imperial Diet for the welfare of Christendom and the peace of the common German nation could not be carried out. Therefore, his admonition and request would be that they grant the request of so many of their lords, dear friends, and relatives, that they refrain from their false opinion, and that they no longer be separated from the Christian church; for although some abuses have occurred in the Christian church, the Imperial Majesty is of the opinion that they should be stopped in Germania with the Pope's assistance, and that unity should be established in the empire.

1033: Answer handed over to the Protestant Estates Aug. 9, 1530, to the presentation made to them by Churbrandenburg.

In Chyträus, p. 322 and Müller, p. 714.

Although we, Your Lordships and Princely Graces, next reproach, so that Your Lordships and Princely Graces may kindly and graciously warn us of our, and the German nation's, harm and disadvantage, Your Lordships and Princely Graces will not receive us in any other way than kindly and humbly.

it is to us to hear and to hear, as your Lordships and Your Royal and Princely Graces themselves can consider. Your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has had the articles presented to him, we would not compare ourselves to them. For Your Lordships and Princely Graces know that His Imperial Majesty's invitation to this Imperial Diet is clearly intended to ensure that every opinion and good opinion is heard between ourselves in love and kindness, and that what would not have been rightly interpreted and acted upon by both parties is to be done away with, and that we all adopt a single true religion. Thus, at the beginning of this Imperial Diet, the Imperial Majesty requested in her Majesty's speech that such an opinion and view be expressed in writings. With this we have, for our part, made up our minds, as much as was possible in a hurry, and in the time determined for us, we have presented our opinion, and that of our pastors and preachers, by means of double writings and languages, with strong reasons from the Holy Scriptures, to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty humbly. Thus we have also presented to the Imperial. Majesty, as Your Honors, Electors and Princes know. After we have been informed of our opinion and that of ours concerning the interpretation of the disputed articles, we have also humbly appealed to Her Majesty to have her gracious understanding, so that henceforth her Majesty's letters, as mentioned above, may be complied with. And in the preface to our submitted articles and opinions, we have requested that, in order to arrive at such a discussion, we should be pleased to compare notes with your dearest and most gracious, and to unite in everything that may be done with God and conscience according to His holy Word and its strong interpretation. But there is next a writing before the imperial majesty, in the form of a transposition and confutation of our articles, with some attracted. However, it has been publicly read before the Imperial Majesty in the form of a transfer and confutation of our articles, with some related writings, sayings of the fathers, and the decree of some conciliation. Gn. know, because it has been difficult for us for the aforementioned reasons, they should not have been delivered to us. Therefore, Your Lordships, the Electors and the Princes. Your Grace, how we have to respond to the articles that the Imperial Majesty has presented to us. Majesty has had presented to us, which have been considered by Your Grace and Grace to be founded in Scripture and the Holy Gospel, as well as in the sayings of the Fathers, we can unite and compare ourselves in this way. For Our Lord, the Church and the

Your Royal Highnesses have to consider that we have indicated so much from the Holy Scriptures in our submitted articles, and have also offered to indicate upon request that we will refrain from it with a sure conscience and peace of heart, because we find such a transfer based on God's Word and truth that we would like to guide our conscience peacefully and safely. Although we are also graciously and kindly served by Your Lordship and Prince. If it were ever thought among us that the abuses of the clergy were the cause of this error, they would be obliged to advise us of it, and to let us be instructed in that which has been done improperly. Majesty's decree no otherwise than that, after each part has presented its opinion and opinion, it should be discussed between us in love and kindness what has not been rightly interpreted or acted upon on either side, and that therefore abuses of the clergy and churches should be acted upon. Nor could we judge how the reported abuses of the clergy and churches might be fruitfully dealt with in another way. Thus, Your Lordships and Prince and Electors know Gn. know that they, we, and all the estates have spoken of a common, free, Christian council for the sake of this most important matter at almost all the imperial congresses held, and that it has been unanimously decided that the Emperor and his Majesty are to be humbled by it. Majesty, so that this may be done in a beneficial manner in the German nation; and the Imperial Majesty is more than once requested by the German people. Majesty more than once by writs, so that Her Majesty's Governors and decreed Commissars, E. Liebden and Chur- und F. Gn., also we and other estates, have been made known to Her Majesty the farewells and actions of the Imperial Diet held, have been most humbly requested to do so. Thereupon Her Majesty, according to the Instruction issued a year ago at the Imperial Diet against Speier, has graciously consented to the same, as we mentioned in the preface to our confession, with the indication that Her Majesty has also obtained approval from the Pope. Thus, the next Speierian farewell gives the time between which such a common, free, Christian concilium should be announced and begun. For all this, after the reported Diet of Speier, we have appealed to the Imperial Majesty for these matters. Maj. and a common council, as is proper. Therefore we do not hope that Imperial Majesty, as a right loving Majesty, as a right-loving Emperor, our most gracious Lord, will blame us for this, or allow himself to be moved to be ungracious, that we, out of persistent Causes cannot deviate from it, that in such cases the proper way is also already granted, and that we need legal means of rights, so in many lesser and worldly matters no one is deprived of. For Imperial Majesty Majesty, together with Your Honour, Lord and Grace, can well accept where these matters would have a different form, and that we, without such a noticeable danger to our salvation and consciences, as Imperial Majesty desires, and that we have the right to take legal action. Majesty desires, and E. Dearest and Grace have also sought from us, that we would much rather dispense with such unrest. It would also be terrible that such complaints should be made and carried out, as indicated and reproached to us by E. L., the Electors and the F. Gn., when these matters can be dealt with in other Christian and proper ways; we would also, as E. L., the Electors and the F. Gn. themselves can consider, have given no cause or reason for this. And since E. L. and the Elector and F. G. understand sufficiently from this that E. Liebden and Gn. We would like to provide ourselves to Your Lordship and Your Grace, and have also kindly and humbly reminded them that they will allow themselves to be heard in other possible ways of their offered friendly and amicable negotiation, in which we do not want to let anything happen to us in all that we may always do with God and a good conscience.

By the Grace of God, John, Duke of Saxony and Elector,

Georg, Margrave of Brandenburg, Ernst, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philipp, Landgrave of Hesse, Johann Friedrich, Duke of Saxony, Franz, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, ### 1034. of the further committee the 11th of August was counter-answered.

At Chyträus and Müller at the places indicated at the previous number.

After they, of the committee, and other estates of the realm, more kind, faithful, and gracious Opinion undertake to be friendly and faithful mediators in honour of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, for the welfare of the Holy Empire, and for our friendship and grace, to be friendly and faithful mediators, and to use all diligence so that the discord of faith between Imperial Majesty, the estates of the Empire, and us may be amicably settled. Majesty, the estates of the empire and us, be settled and amicably reconciled, as they have therefore recently done their faithful reminder and exhortation, and have also proposed to us as a means of helping Imperial Majesty and the estates of Christianity. Majesty and the estates' Christian and faithful goodwill, as this was understood and read out in the answer to our submitted confession, to be accepted and accepted once again; they had also provided that such their friendly and Christian goodwill should have produced more and better fruit with us than they still feel. And when we complained about four articles, among others, in our document that was read out to them, the Committee: Firstly, as if no satisfaction had been given to His Majesty's invitation to this Imperial Diet, in which His Imperial Majesty mentions that the Imperial Diet is to be held. Majesty mentions that the parties are to be heard against each other according to necessity; item, that the answer of the Estates to our Confession may not be copied for us; item, that for the sake of our conscience we could not consent to their proposal, and that Imperial Majesty has often refused to accept it. They then said and asked that we would not understand their loyal action otherwise than in good opinion, and that we would never regard them as a party, but rather as friendly conciliators and mediators. They could not, however, refrain from calling upon Imperial Maj. Maj., our most gracious Lord, and the estates for the sake of the above-mentioned articles. And in the first place, Imperial Majesty Majesty that she has not, in accordance with her invitation to this Imperial Diet, graciously given all parties sufficient and also superfluous hearings. For we would have presented our confession in writings according to length, and thereupon the confutation and rebuttal of the estates, as they were heard, would have taken place according to necessity, with such a request from the Emperor. Majesty's request, whether we or the other party think of or want to add anything further: that it may also be graciously granted by Imperial Majesty. Majesty also wished to hear it graciously and according to necessity, but neither party made any further complaint, as then Imperial Majesty reportedly wishes. Maj. might be accused of this.

But that we should have been refused the Confutationschrift Copia, would not have been without important honest

1) "of length" put by us instead of "lengthwise" in the old edition.

For we and our counsellors, experienced in the law, would have to remember in good measure that the imperial laws expressly forbid, in case of loss of life and limb, to discuss or ponder anything in the articles of faith. Thus we would know that the Imperial Majesty's edict and serious commandment and prohibition in this matter of faith, which not only have not been lived up to, but which have been held in complete contempt, mocked, ridiculed, and ridiculed, to noticeable imperial disgrace and disgrace. Maj. disgrace and ignominy. Should they now issue their Confutation again into the community and send it to us, such scorn, ridicule, 2c., as well as all kinds of disputation and ineptitude would be to be expected, which, as has been heard, is forbidden. As it is, they would not be opposed, but would be obliged to send us a copy of the Confutation of the Estates, with the condition and difference that was held out to us before, or, if we did not want to have it, to have their Confutation read out to us as often as we wanted, at which we would also be satisfied, and would not ask for anything more from them.

As for the excuse of our consciences, they considered (but we should forgive them) that we made consciences when there were none to be made, and when we should have consciences, we would have none. For it would not be known to us that our preachers, contrary to the holy Scriptures and the Christian church, have made their own unchristian laws and ordinances, have seduced the common man, and have caused all kinds of trouble: This one would be an iconoclast, this one a desecrator of the sacraments, this one an Anabaptist, and another one a garden friar, and thus no one would compare himself with the other, and all would be inclined to seduction in general; whether they, the preachers, were now such persons, on whom we ought to found and build more than on the holy whole Christian church, they held that our conscience should show us otherwise, and namely, that we would rather be obliged to adhere to the common church than to these seducers.

That Imperial Majesty also offered to promote a free Concilio with Papal Holiness would be true, and Imperial Majesty would still be inclined to do so. Maj. would still be inclined to do so. But the fact that it has not yet been done would have been prevented by the great wars and uprisings in German and French lands, for which reason such a thing could not have been done.

But they were concerned, whether a concilium was gathered in a short or long time, that it would be very little. We do not believe that the Concilium of the past would have any place or fruit among us, because our preachers let themselves be heard to say that the old Conciliation had erred, and that the future Conciliation would also err, and therefore it is probable that much more ridicule, insult, and scorn than salvation would result from it; therefore we do not want to accuse ourselves of any Concilium, or that the Imperial Majesty has not yet instituted such a thing, with the request that we still find ways and means by which the matter might be remedied and come to unity. And although they would not consider any other means than as they have proposed before, they still want to hear us speak and propose it. And if it were something that might have a standing with the Imperial Majesty, they would faithfully bring it up and promote it; but if it were not to be done, they would return it to us together with their discretion.

V, p. 104; in the Altenburg, vol. 230; and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 213. From a copy in the common archive at Weimar in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 201. According to the latter we have improved our copy.

Dear Sirs, Grandparents, Cousins, Brothers and Friends in Law, and especially dear, gracious, gracious and favorable Sirs. We have heard your most recent presentation at length, and have retained the following opinion:

(2) First, how and in what manner Your Lordship and Grace have heard our next written and oral reply to Your Honour and Grace's faithful, friendly admonition that we wish to settle with Imperial Majesty, and also with the Princes and Estates of the Empire, by means of the document read next. Majesty, as well as Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, by means of the document read out next, and that Your Majesty's diligent, faithful diligence should have produced more fruit than has happened, which they are truly sorry for. However, in order that they might be flushed into all ways as faithful and well-meaning negotiators, they have diligently inspected the document, considered it, and found that our complaint as to why we could not settle with E. L. and G. would be safely based on four articles.

(3) Firstly, as if we had not been sufficiently informed by Imperial Majesty. Majesty's invitation not enough or according to necessity.

nor would not comply with the same imperial majesty's request with friendly action in love and kindness.

(4) Secondly, that we have considered how the next writing, Imperial Answer, or, as we call it, Confutation, would have been denied us. Maj. answer, or, as we call it, Confutation, would have been denied and rejected something of our oversight.

005 For the third thing, that we may further draw upon our conscience, even beside this, and the fourth thing, that we may press upon the concilium, and therefore the promise made. 1)

(6) And because E. L. and Gn. wanted to use their next reproaches, as touched, friendly good opinion done, and what they still knew, which would serve or promote Christian common unity, gladly possible diligence, and then found that in our answer we attributed something unequal to Imperial Majesty, and in which we err ourselves, so that we would be led into other ways, E. L. and Gn. would have decided that it was necessary for us to take care of the matter, as they did. Majesty, and in which we ourselves are mistaken, so that we might be led into other ways, the E. L. and G. have decided and deemed it necessary to give us the following notice of the matters as they are everywhere; however, not at all in the opinion that they would thereby make themselves parties, but only to show themselves to be the friends and negotiators, so that we ourselves might not be mistaken or misled.

(7) And first of all, as far as the summons to this Diet is concerned, E. L. and G. deem with them that Imperial Majesty may not be summoned to it as if Her Majesty had not complied or had sufficiently complied. Majesty may not be imposed in the same, as [if] her Majesty had not complied with it, or had sufficiently obeyed it. For Her Majesty had quite graciously heard us in writings and orally, and had indicated whether we had anything further to present, which we also wished to do, so that one thing might go with another. So we would have left it at that, and [let ourselves] be heard that we wanted to stand and remain with the confession that was handed over. And as to the other part of this article, Imperial Majesty would have granted and permitted amicable negotiations; accordingly, E. L. and G., as a committee of the other Princes, Princes, and Estates, would have agreed to such action. From this it can be sufficiently judged that Her Imperial Majesty is not obliged to do anything in this matter. Majesty in this, as if she had not sufficiently obeyed the summons, or had refused to act in love and kindness.

008 Secondly, let it not be laid to her majesty's charge, that the scripture read in her name hath been denied us. For her majesty

1) What is written in square brackets is mostly the reading of Chyträus, partly also still in the Brandenburg copy and in Müller.

We would have been obliged to send such a document, albeit with a measure; which we complain of, but Her Imperial Majesty cannot grant in any other form. Majesty could not grant it in any other form; and we respect that nevertheless Her Imperial Majesty had cause for it. Majesty has had cause for this. For we would know in what way the imperial edict and commandment issued at Worms would have been scorned, disgraced, and struck out, to the noticeable disgrace, scorn, and derision of the imperial majesty and all the estates, and would have to inquire from our scholars that in imperial law it is highly forbidden to dispute about the articles of faith under penalty of life. If now her imperial majesty Majesty should have handed over the said document to the Confutation, as it would have been called, without a preface, the same might, as the imperial edict before it, have been crossed out, perverted, and falsified by some unstable people, preachers, and others. Majesty, the Estates and common Christendom to noticeable disadvantage; that then Imperial Majesty and the Estates do not unreasonably bear the burden, nor do Princes, Princes and Estates therein mean honor to Imperial Majesty. Majesty's honor and to preserve it. However, the fact that such a document of the Confutation was not promoted would not have been due to Imperial Majesty 2c. but to us.

009 Thirdly, if we were to draw upon consciences, E. L. and Gn. could not so understand the same, but consider that we would have consciences made for us, when we ought not to have them; and again, when we ought to have them, we would not have them. For we let our preachers, as individual persons, lead us away from the holy common Christian church, even from the faith of our forefathers and ancient fathers, founded in Scripture, and also confirmed by the holy fathers' conciliarities and doctrine, and thus from the unanimity of the whole realm and Christendom, which teachers or preachers made their own law, Scripture, and order, and interpreted and perverted everything to their liking. But how the same Scripture and doctrine were founded was evident by day, and as plain as the bright sun, namely, that they were not one among themselves in matters, but repugnant, one black, the other white, writing today yes, tomorrow no, and could nowhere compare themselves in matters; From this, then, and from such ambiguous doctrine, so many and grievous sects and ineptitudes would have arisen with rebaptizers, sacrament abusers, iconoclasts, and garden brethren and sisters, and in other ways [that it would be frightening to hear].

(10) Thus it would be sufficiently evident what life, respectability, and conduct these preachers and teachers had. And whether they were the ones in whom we should trust our souls and consciences, and in whom we should place more faith than in the whole of Christendom, the imperial majesty, the princes and rulers of the holy empire, as their born friends and relatives; without doubt, if ours thought rightly, we would refrain from this, and compare ourselves with common Christendom.

(11) Fourthly, let us [now] go to a council, and let the same way be the nearest and most convenient, for the putting away of this error.

(12) Now they would not have us behave as Luther did at the Diet of Worms, when he stood before the imperial majesty and was heard, and his doctrine was then acted upon, and the council was proposed. Now if they did not want us to behave as Luther did at the Diet of Worms, when he stood before the imperial majesty and was heard, and his doctrine had been acted upon at that time, and the council had been proposed, he would have destroyed and ridiculed it, and he would also have allowed himself to be heard in the presence of the imperial majesty. His books would also have gone out in such a way that he would have despised the concilia and their authority, and would have stated that, if they were to do something, one would not be obliged to keep them; as such would be indicated by his treatises, if necessary.

013 And though we would gladly have held a council, yet we have good knowledge that the wars in German and French lands, and also the grievous affliction with our and all Christendom's hereditary enemy, the Turk, have been such as would have prevented them.

(14) After all this, while things were thus going on, we should go into ourselves and remember better. And thereupon E. L. and G. would again make a friendly, diligent request, also a faithful and high exhortation, that we compare ourselves with the imperial majesty, also with the princes, princes and estates of the empire, and with the holy common Christian church, according to the Scriptures, which are founded in the Word of God, so that our confession would also be sufficiently established.

(15) Whether we also need such writings as were read out next, so that there would be no lack of them everywhere, E. L. and G. promised that Imperial Majesty would let them come to our hands again with the measure as indicated next. Majesty would let them come to our hands again with the measure as indicated next, without complaint, so that we would have to see all necessity therein.

016 But if we have any doubt or complaint about it, so that we have nothing to complain about, the articles in which we are in dispute with each other should be read to us as often as is necessary.

(17) If, however, all this should be considered and regarded by us as burdensome [or unhelpful and unserviceable], E. L. and G. would kindly request and ask that we be at ease to indicate to us the ways and means by which we believe that amicable negotiations and Christian unity might be achieved. If then the same ways were thus proposed by us, that they might provide themselves with fruitful action and elevation at the Imperial Majesty, we would ask that they be made known to us. Majesty, they would gladly let them reach Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and in part use all possible diligence to this end. If, however, they were regarded as unprofitable and unhelpful by His Majesty and His Grace, they would inform us of this and would be happy to help in other ways, so that the matter would be brought to a beneficial and Christian unity; and that we would like to receive and understand it from His Majesty and His Grace in such a way that they meant it kindly, faithfully and quite well for us, and would not like to see some confusion in the Empire, as we have noted in the above opinion.

(18) Nevertheless, we would not have provided ourselves with such a report and reminder. For the fact that E. L. and Gn. The fact that E. L. and Gn.'s negotiation has hitherto been irrevocable is not due to us, but because E. L. and Gn. and proposal have hitherto been based solely on the fact that we have renounced our Christian confession in those articles in which the opposing party does not agree with us, and that we have agreed with Imperial Majesty, E. L., that we will not be bound by the Christian confession in the articles in which the opposing party does not agree with us. Majesty, E. L. and Gn. in those. Which, however, for the aforementioned reasons, we cannot accept without burdening our consciences, but have asked that, since E. L. and G. have agreed to negotiate, they indicate to us other, more convenient means, we would listen to them, and not allow anything to happen to us on our account that might happen with God and conscience.

(19) In like manner, (1) we again find from E. L. and G.'s recent reproaches that they are once again of the opinion to lead us away from our Christian confession, as much as we do not agree with them, and to induce us to compare read writings, and that for this reason they are trying our causes, which we have constantly and with good reason objected to, by many and various means.

Reasons to reject are subject, which however with us again the effect are not, but much other form, for which we hold it and do not have doubts.

20 For as far as Imperial Majesty's We are of the opinion that, as far as Your Majesty's invitation to this Imperial Diet is concerned, we did not use it to cause Your Majesty any displeasure. Majesty's displeasure, we are also blameless, since we know that Her Majesty has graciously offered to act in accordance with the same invitation. We still bear the same hope and trust in her Majesty. But we have taken up such a tender in the opinion that the proposals, matters or opinions made by your Grace and Grace are somewhat far-reaching. Proposals, matters, or opinions are somewhat more extensive than those of Your Imperial Majesty. Maj. because this clearly implies that every part's opinion and opinion should be heard, that it should be spoken of in love and kindness, and that what is not rightly interpreted on either side should be dismissed; and then this opinion alone and straightforwardly leads to the conclusion that we should renounce our confession as stated above, and yet at the same time the other part, which has not been rightly interpreted, is not thought of, so that our doctrine and our confession may be judged as if we should have separated ourselves from the common Christian church in this, or thought to do so, which we should be heartily and faithfully sorry for, and, if God wills, shall never be found among us; and if we want to understand this, with God's help we would not like to remain in it for a moment. For the more we have read the writings of His Imperial Majesty and the articles of the same. Majesty and its articles, which we have not received until now, the same does not conclude against us on the basis of the Holy Scriptures. For we hold and believe that our opinion and confession, as we have recently handed it over, is founded in Holy Scripture, and again, if it is necessary, and if there is further negotiation, we have offered to declare the same in Holy Scripture.

(21) Secondly, concerning the refusal of the writ of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, for what causes the same with a measure, and otherwise not, should be delivered to us, we can ever not consider that such writing should behave to us for the causes mentioned, or to be delivered to us with such measure, be ordered 1); for we ever never mocked or ridiculed Imperial Majesty's edict. Majesty's edict never mocked or ridiculed, we shall also be faithfully sorry for it.

1) With Förstemann: "forbidden".

be. For this reason, we have never given cause for such delusions or suspicions as that something has been changed or reversed, or may yet be.

22 Because E. L. and Gn. have entered into an amicable agreement, we had hoped that E. L. and Gn. would have promoted this with the Imperial Majesty for many just causes indicated. Majesty that we had received such a writing in accordance with our request, and had not allowed ourselves to be compensated for it, whether someone had acted unskillfully on account of such an edict, for which we were not to blame.

(23) In the same way, the other reason does not exclude this, although in imperial law it is forbidden to argue about faith, as we still cannot find the same thing among the jurists in the above-mentioned form, that they should or may refuse to give us a copy of the submitted document other than with a burdensome measure. For ever our need to have such a writing and to actually consider how much would have required to be reported. Thus, by the grace of God, we know quite well how far one should or should not dispute articles of faith. Moreover, we do not put any article [of faith] in doubt, and we are not forbidden by law to confess our Christian faith, and to denounce in a friendly, amicable, and Christian manner whatever abuses have been introduced against it, even to abolish it in our principalities, provinces, and cities. But we shall not take into account the attitude of other people in this matter, nor shall this cause us any harm.

24th And when E. L. and Gn. again requested to deliver [and] to obtain the writing with the indicated condition, we have beforehand notified Imperial Majesty, also E. L. and Gn. our complaint, namely, because we have heard many times before that things negotiated among few people have been brought out 2) and come into print; if such should happen in this case, though not by us, also in the same way, E. L. and G. would have to consider themselves how burdensome it would be for us to take over the copy of the desired measure, and to burden such suspicion on us.

(25) However, the fact that they intended to read out the writing to us as much as we wanted may not be of any service to this matter. For we do not doubt, E. L. and G. can consider, how it would have been possible for the other part to actually grasp our articles from mere reading out into the air.

and to give an answer to it; if it had been in our hands for many weeks, if it had sought to do so, and if it had thus written its counter-report, however unfinished: how then would it be possible for us to advise or assume such a thing, or in such a great matter, touching soul and conscience, that we should join together without a copy of this writing for a quite thorough refutation of it? And whether it would be possible for us to do so, or to assume that it is not, we do not know what would be helped by this, since no other means or way than we have so far heard from E. L. and Gn. will be proposed. But that the burden of our consciences has been so deceived, we, together with what is further attached to it, affecting our souls, honor and duty, are due an answer and instruction to our need.

(26) For although we confess that we are human beings and sinners, in matters concerning God's glory and the holy Christian faith, we do not like to knowingly act against God's word and burden our conscience with persecution of the truth. For this reason, we do not doubt that our consciences are calmer, by the grace of God, than those who have persecuted this doctrine, driven out the preachers, and refused to accept the truth, since this matter has never been interrogated or acted upon as it should have been.

027 But let not our consciences be upon the person of our preachers, but, finding that their doctrine is founded in the word of God, we have shunned to oppose it, and do so still, because we acknowledge ourselves guilty of honoring and promoting the word of God to the highest degree, and anything that is preached or acted contrary to it, or not conformably, we are conscience-stricken about, most of all, if it should be confirmed, approved, or admitted by us. And it would be highly contrary to our conscience that we should hold or allow to be preached any article of faith contrary to the holy Scriptures or the Christian conciliarities of the fathers. And so we have not turned away from the unity of the kingdom and of holy Christendom, because we have faithfully and firmly held to all the articles of the holy Christian faith, and have diligently promoted them to the right understanding of the apostles and fathers, and thus to maintain the right and true unity of the church, by admitting the word of God. And it is public that they have been

1) Förstemann: "furgezogen".

We are taught that even the opponents now compare themselves in many things to the same doctrine, and are taught 2) more properly than ever before.

028 But that sects have arisen in other places is not the fault of this doctrine, which the princes allow in their countries, but ours have fought most fiercely against such errors; and if they had not been, the others would have endured little, as everyone must confess. For this reason these errors have not broken out in our country, which in other places, when they attempted to defend themselves by force alone, have done greater harm, so that the pure doctrine cannot be blamed, but the devil, as the gospel says, while the tiller sleepeth, he soweth tares among the wheat. What were the apostles able to do, that some accepted their doctrine commanded by Christ, and thereafter, by inspiration of the devil, separated themselves from them in one or more articles, and practiced false doctrine and preaching; wherefore their preaching, the apostles', was not unjust, nor condemned as unchristian.

029 It is also known that it is proper to keep conciliarities and synods for the good of the doctrine, and always to have understanding in the doctrine. Without this being seen, monks and other preachers, out of carelessness and neglect on the part of those to whom it was due, have taught and done what everyone likes about these things, and so many abuses have resulted from them that they have finally ceased to be sound, and have thus given rise to a great change; as is known, then, that the matter of indulgences, indulgences, pilgrimages, sanctuaries, and other innumerable things has come to pass.

(30) Now if this had been done properly, and the bishops had then had an understanding of Christian doctrine and preaching, as they are guilty before God and the world, peace and unity might easily have been obtained. Now they only complain about ours, as if the bishops and other clergymen had never acted criminally, but had always waited for their office, as Achab complains about Heliarn, as if he had confused 4) the kingdom of Israel; but the prophet Helias said to Achab, he is the one who confuses Israel [1 Kings 18:17, 18].

31: As then Pope Hadrianus himself said in the Reichstag at Nuremberg in the 22nd year has let present and confess that all this complaint from the court of Rome and other ecclesiastical prelates Herkommen 2c.

32. Therefore, although we have had cause to report in our confession further abuses, vexations, and unmistakable grievances, which for a long time and many years have manifoldly occurred and still exist in the Roman church, we have nevertheless bypassed the same, for the sake of more peace and unity, in the hope that Christian and reasonable means would be thought of to bring about Christian and necessary improvement in all parts of the holy church, for the sake of more peace and unity, in the hope that Christian and reasonable means would have been thought of, so that we might come to Christian and necessary improvement in the holy faith, and otherwise also to peaceful unity, so much more quickly and kindly; Therefore, in our opinion, our and the wholesome Christian doctrine should be spared with the unwarranted impositions and burdens mentioned.

(33) But when the life and conduct of our preachers is also considered, we report that we do not knowingly tolerate, or are inclined to tolerate, any priests in the service of the Church and of the Word of God who live in public levery.

(34) But what good examples are to be seen in the clergy of the opposite part, knowing only how they keep house with lewd persons, contrary to the canons. How they treat the mass carelessly, how they practice simony, and many other vices, of which there is no need to speak.

35 We have always been obliged, and still are, to help maintain the bishops' proper obedience and obedience, as much as is founded in the Word of God, and to compare ourselves in all things with others, as far as we can with God and a good conscience.

036 But that we do not approve all abuses, we are compelled by the word of God, which we must set higher than the obedience of men.

037 Now that we have come to a council, it is in the opinion that there are no other more lawful ways in matters concerning the faith than this way, and we hope that we have not sought anything contrary to law here.

038 Moreover, we have given notice thereof, signifying our obedience, that it may be known that we do not intend to disunite ourselves from the holy Christian church 1).

39) So it is also to be hoped, where the treatise of these things, as we for our part did not like to do, should now come into being 2) that the same be-

1) "Church" is missing in Förstemann.

2) "arise" here will have the meaning of "break down". In Luther it does not occur in this meaning. quemlicher shall be heard in a Concilio, than otherwise done.

(40) And although there would be something difficult in a concilium, this is nevertheless the only lawful way of dealing with such matters. For this reason, we have deemed it necessary to convene a council, just as such a council was deemed necessary a year ago at the Imperial Diet held at Speier, and, in view of the agreement made and established there, was concluded with the Emperor's gracious permission. Majesty's gracious permission, and a considerable time has also been fixed, as indicated in the next of our answers to our need.

041 And what some of the concilii have written or taught, we leave to every man's charge; for we give to the Christian concilii their due honor, as the ancient canons hold of them.

(42) And let us therefore take care that E. L. and G. will be of service to the common Christianity, in case they do not want to compare or unite here in goodness, to promote the Concilium granted and promised before more than to be inclined to hinder it by such their report.

But we hope to God that such a willing and requested common free Christian council, where we finally do not want to unite here, as, as often indicated, should not happen to us, would be promoted by Imperial Majesty and many learned and brave people would speak of the negotiations and move them to God's almighty mercy, so that, after the announcement of the Emperor, they would be able to take part in it. Majesty, and many learned and brave people will speak of the trades, and move them that God Almighty will bestow His divine grace, so that, after notification of Imperial Majesty, the present call for tenders will be granted. Majesty, everything that has not been rightly interpreted or acted upon will be brought to a unified, right, Christian truth.

44 From all of this, E. L. and G. can easily conclude and judge for themselves how their presentation could have had such an effect on us as they had intended.

(45) Where, however, other and more possible ways, which lead to a complete amicable settlement of these differences, or, at least, to a convenient handling of them in love and kindness, by virtue of Imperial Majesty, are open to us. Majest. The fact that the Imperial Majesty has issued a letter to this effect, and that it has been proposed or will be proposed again by E. L. and G. in the course of their official duties, should not meet with any justification on our part.

(46) For our part, however, we have thought that it would not be an inconvenient way and means, even according to the Emperor's decree. Maj.'s request that an equal, but small number of special persons from both parts be appointed who understand the matter and are inclined to peace and unity.

who, of the articles in dispute, and especially of those which are in the use of the Church, acted in love, kindness, and friendliness among themselves; in the consoling hope that the same would endeavor to bring matters to good agreement, of which we, on our part, according to our oft-made request, shall not be lacking in all that we may always do with God and a good conscience.

1036 Letter of Landgrave Philip to the Elector of Saxony left behind, in which he indicates the causes of his departure.

August 6, 1530

From Müller's History 2c., p. 713.

Reverend Prince, kind dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather! I cannot reproach E. L. for the fact that my wife has now written to me twice about how she is afflicted with illness, which has caused me to ride to her and visit her; I also have other reasons that move me to do so, as my Chancellor will report to E. L., but I have ordered my advisors to stand by E. L. and keep watch. If my friendly request is that E. L. keep his guard up and not deviate from God's word in any way and not be frightened, for there is nothing behind it, then E. L. should provide for me that I will leave my body and goods, land and people with E. L. and God's word. On the other hand, my friendly request is that E. L. do the best in Duke Ulrich's cause, which I will kindly earn. My chancellor will tell E. L. something in secret, and E. L. will believe it, so that E. L. may command God. Date Saturday after the Feast of the Chains of Peter [August 6], Anno Domini 1530.

Philipps, L. of Hesse.

1037 Answer of the protesting estates to the emperor's inquiry about the landgrave's departure, and about the gate guard ordered by the emperor for that reason.

From Müller's History 2c., p. 711.

That they may credibly report to Imperial Maj. Maj. that they would like to report that they received no knowledge of the Landgrave Philip's departure before it happened. When they heard about it in the morning, they would not have liked to have heard it; and although it was their Lordships and their Imperial Highnesses, as well as the cities, for the fact that such a thing had not happened for the Landgrave's sake without important causes; but where he had sought the advice of their Lordships and their Imperial Highnesses, as friends, they wanted to have advised his Highnesses as they themselves would still be willing to do at present, namely to persevere with the action; they also did not want to leave without Imperial Majesty's prior knowledge. Maj. prior knowledge. They knew, however, that Imperial Maj. Maj. for their necessity in subservience, what reaches their Electoral and Princely Graces, that is to say, that they would not leave without their Imperial Majesty's prior knowledge. They would not let go undisclosed to their Imperial and Princely Graces what happened this morning with the closing and order of the gates, and how it reached their Imperial and Princely Graces should have been decreed for them. Where it has now been her Majesty's knowledge and command, it serves them, as their Majesties may graciously respect. Her Majesty also knows that such a thing was not customary with Her Majesty's ancestors, nor did it happen before at Her Majesty's Imperial Diet, especially the first one held by Her Majesty's own person in the Empire of the German Nation, that the Princes, Princes and Estates required to attend the Imperial Diet should be hindered and delayed in such a way; with most humbly request to have a gracious understanding that it would be stopped, considered what disadvantage and danger, since such order of the gates and equal from due causes occur, if no one knew what it should be, or where Elector and Princes should hold themselves in the cases, her Majesty would carry such on him. ...even for her Majesty's sake, would bear such a thing upon him. For with her Majesty's ancestors it would have been held in such a way, if the Guard or Thor had been specially ordered, that it would have been announced by her Majesty's Marshals of the Realm 2c.

1038 Spalatin's historical news about the serious speech of the bishop of Augsburg, Christoph von Stadion, held right at the beginning of this above-mentioned action, and the fierce dispute that arose between him on the one side and the bishop of Salzburg and Churbrendenburg on the other; as well as about the landgrave's uncouraged departure and its consequences.

This document is the continuation of the report given in No. 1023. The same is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 423d; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 98; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 224 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 232.

1. sexta Augusti the negotiation was made, the bishop of Augsburg, vir xruã6Q8 6t 60Q8taii8, as diocesan of the place, stood up, gave him cause to speak, and admonished the princes and bishops that they should see to it, and not do anything against the law; for it is true that the Lutherans do not hold against any article of faith; therefore one should seek ways and means for the peace of the church.

002 Whereupon the bishop of Salzburg said, how he was now so holy; he had known him otherwise. To which the bishop of Augsburg answered: unfortunately, he knows well that he has done much wrong up to now, and of that, he says, it is time to stop; and, dear lord of Salzburg, you are also like me in evil, and want me to help protect against that wrong; God shall protect me for that.

After this, Brandenburg clumsily cried out that it is not true that the Lutherans do not hold to any article of faith. The bishop of Augsburg, it is true. Margrave Joachim, it is not true. Augsburg: What are the articles called? Margrave Joachim: eatkolieam, Kurielorum invoeuiionenv they have.

not. Augsburg: Invocatlo Sactorum is not an article of faith; so the Lutherans hold of the true Christian church. Their dispute is only against the abuses of the Roman church; so no one can deny that the Roman church has many abuses.

The bishop of Mainz asked them to refrain from such bickering, and to help everyone to improve matters and to make peace, and in the morning nothing was done. In the afternoon, they again told each other lies, and they were almost at each other's throats.

5th In the evening, the 6th of August, the landgrave went out to the city and became quiet about it, the king and others.

6th Septima Augusti, the Imperial Majesty demanded of our princes and chieftains, and asked for the reason why the landgrave rode away. Our people answered that it had happened without their knowledge and advice, and placed it at his responsibility. His Imperial Majesty requested that they not hurry, but wait for the matter to be resolved, and advise them to help make peace; his Majesty would not like to have it said that his Majesty wanted to hurry someone and act differently than graciously with him.

The eighth section of the thirteenth chapter.

Of the narrower committee of the fourteen and its acts ordered with the emperor's approval.

A. From the first longer conversation which started 16 August 1630 and lasted until 21.

1039. of D. Joh. Eck by order of the Cardinal of Mainz and Duke George of Saxony, before the beginning of the discussion, concerning the articles of the Augsburg Confession, in which one agrees, which on the other hand are disputed, and how the latter are to be compared.

This writing is found in Latin in Cölestin, torn. III, x>. 36; German by Chyträus, p. 346.

The first article, of the one divine being and three persons, is in agreement with the Christian church.

The other article, that there is original sin, agrees with the church. But as to the explanation of original sin, he does not agree with the church. The middle way would be for them to say that inherent evil desire was sin before baptism, and after baptism it was a consequence or punishment of original sin, and not sin in itself.

In the third article, of Christ JESU, one is equal.

The fourth article, in which he says that we cannot be saved by our own efforts, agrees with the church. But in this he disagrees, that he assigns righteousness to faith, and excludes our merit altogether. The middle way to unity would be, that they should ascribe righteousness to faith, which is active through love, which St. Paul teaches to the Galatians in the 5th verse. But they are to omit this word SOLA; for the one word SOLA is the one word SOLA.

Those who are falsely led to believe that faith alone, without the grace of God and good works, makes them righteous.

As to merit, they would agree with us if they declared that works are not merited by their nature and by themselves, but only by the mercy of God, by the grace of God, which assists us, precedes us, and works with us. Thus the Lord gives His saints reward for their work.

The fifth article agrees with us that the Holy Spirit is given through the word and sacraments, as ordained means. But faith and the merit of works are to be held as stated in the fourth article.

The sixth article, that faith with love bringeth good works, agrees with the church. Faith is to be held as reported above.

The seventh article does not agree, because they say that the Christian church is an assembly of the pious alone, since there are both the wicked and the pious in it. It could be compared if they said that the Christian church is an assembly of the saints, just as we also call the Christian church holy because of the holiness of faith, sacraments, graces, and gifts. For of the most excellent thing a thing has its name, so they themselves allow that ministers of the church may be who are not pious.

The eighth article, of priests who are not pious, concurs.

Likewise the ninth.

The tenth article agrees with us as to the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, but that it should not be interpreted to mean that the laity should receive both.

The eleventh article compares itself with the church as far as absolution is concerned; but does not compare itself as far as confession is concerned, of which in the other part, in the fourth article.

The twelfth article, that those who have sinned after baptism may repent, agrees with the church. But as far as the pieces of repentance are concerned, it does not agree. But it might be compared in this way, because they put repentance and sorrow for the first part, but we put faith for both parts, and here they put faith for a part of repentance; we say that faith is not a part of repentance, but that faith precedes it, as the ground of repentance. Therefore it is more a quarrel about words than about the matter itself. And because they admit confession, they should set the same with the church for the whole part of repentance. For this we set the sufficiency thereof for the third part of repentance. But they confess that the fruits of good works shall follow. This is more a quarrel about words than about the matter itself.

The thirteenth article agrees with the church.

The fourteenth article agrees with the church as far as the words are concerned. But in fact they hold it differently, because they do not appoint pastors and preachers according to the common rights or order of the ordinary bishops, which would be a legitimate profession.

The fifteenth article agrees on the most important point. The statutes of men are dealt with below in the last article.

The sixteenth article, of secular authority, agrees with us.

The seventeenth article, of Christ's future, agrees with us.

The eighteenth article, of free will, is the same.

The nineteenth article, of cause of sin, agrees with the church.

The twentieth article, of faith and good works, excuses only the preachers; therefore it is not to be respected, only that it is taught, as is stated in the fourth article.

The first and twentieth articles, of the service of the saints, do not agree with us. For here are three parts, the honor of the saints, the invocation of the saints, and the intercession of the saints, which they do for us. The Lutherans give way to the honor, but deny the other two parts. The intercession of the saints is admitted by the Sacramentarians. 1)

Here no agreement can be reached, for they confess with the Church that since a living man can call upon the living, a dying man upon a mortal, a sinner upon a sinner, a poor man upon a poor man for intercession, why then should he not be able to call upon one who is immortal, righteous, pure from sins, rich in graces, goodness, and mercy, and who zealously takes care of us in perfect love.

The other part, of the abuses.

The first article does not agree with our doctrine. But it should be compared in this way. Since communion under both forms is not contrary to the faith, and since it has been held in this way in many churches from time immemorial, communion under both forms could be allowed freely, as is permitted to the Bohemians in the Concilio of Basel, but with three conditionibus attached.

1) Here we seem to have corrupted the text.

First, that one would not let the little children communicate.

On the other hand, if it were held that both forms were not necessary.

Third, that under one form no less than under both is received by those who communicate in the Christian church. But whether it be of use that communion should thus be tolerated until the future Council, let those of understanding judge.

The other article argues with the Christian church. For such a marriage, if a priest is free in the priesthood, can never exist by right. It could be compared, because from the time of the apostles until the Cyprian, almost four hundred years ago, married people were required to be priests. But whether this is of any use now, I doubt. As for the priests who now take wives, a settlement could be made if they were not tolerated otherwise than common fornicators until the future Council, since they no longer preach or serve in the church, nor would they be allowed in secular offices.

The third article, of the Mass, is not agreed with the Christian Church. But it could be compared that there was no more bloody sacrifice in the Lord's Supper than there was on the altar of the cross, if only they did not deny that, as Christ's body was figuratively sacrificed in the Old Testament, and truly sacrificed on the cross in suffering, so it was sacrificed in secret in the mass. This secret sacrifice is a memorial of the sacrifice made on the cross. But private masses should not be abolished for this reason.

The fourth article, of confession, does not agree with us; but might be compared according to their adopted saying from the 18th Psalm [19:13], "Who can perceive how often he faileth?" For the church also bindeth no man to tell sin, which he himself knoweth not, nor understandeth. For this reason they should give way to confessing the sin that one understands, so that they will be in agreement with the Christian church.

The fifth article is judged from the seventh.

The sixth article, concerning monastic vows, is not the same as the church, nor can it be compared. For although vowing, or making vows, is free, it is necessary by God's commandment to pay the vow, by divine right. Now those who consent to this article are guilty of all breaches of vows that occur; nor could the whole general church admit this article.

The seventh article does not agree with the church, for it takes from her the rule and authority to make statutes for her subjects, that they may come to eternal life. Which authority has always been in the church, as may be seen from St. Paul's statutes and commandments, and from the decrees in the first Concilio of the Apostles, and subsequent holy Concilii. This article would also abolish church discipline, and cut up all good order, and strengthen all disobedience and wantonness. But this article could be compared to the toleration or alleviation of some church ordinances, but that no carnal liberty would arise from it.

In sum, these are articles that can hardly be tolerated and accepted by the church:

From the Holy Service.

Of the Communion under both forms.

Of the priestly marriage.

Of the monastic vows.

From the victim in the Mass.

Of human statutes.

These six articles I consider to be the most burdensome; but in other articles, if two princes and two scholars on both sides were to come together, agreement would easily be reached.

1040 Philipp Melancthon's and the other theologians' misgivings, in which it is advised to use all means for peace.

15 Aug. 1530.

German in Spalatin's Annals, p. 229; in Chyträus, p. 350, and in the 6orx. "Lei.", vol. II, 281; Latin in Cölestin, tom. III, p. 31.

(1) We humbly consider that the princes are obliged to diligently seek and try all ways and means that are not contrary to the word of God, to make peace, to prevent their own harm and corruption of country and people.

(2) Thus, it is not acceptable before God to persist in unnecessary division. For God has commanded nothing higher than to keep the peace.

(3) We also see what has happened in this division, how the mob has become wicked, what errors, sects, and factions are daily arising, and to be concerned that God will graciously prevent, where there would be war, that more sects and errors would break in, so that the church would be torn apart by irretrievable errors, and the temporal government destroyed by war, both of which would be the result of the war.

spiritual and temporal government have fallen to the ground, and will never be raised up again until the end of the world.

004 Now it behoveth the princes in particular to prevent in all their ways such an abominable outrage and destruction of the government: as Isaias saith, Let the princes consider the things of the princes, and let not the government that is established fall.

005 Jteyr, because the division standeth, there can be no discipline in the schools and churches. Everyone is afraid to teach their children, and not unreasonably so. For no man would willingly put his child in danger, where they that have studied must come, as long as this dissension standeth.

006 Neither can such things be kept in the churches. What is not tolerated in one place is suffered in another. And it is not possible to establish obedience.

007 Therefore we humbly beseech the princes to work for God's sake, and for their own good, that peace may be made. And though it is to be feared that our adversary is too hard, and will not yield in any matter, yet our consciences are safer, and our rejoicing before the world greater, if the lack of us were not.

008 In such an action it is necessary that we yield a little to the opposite, and, as much as can be done with God and conscience, escape. For without this there is no action. Therefore it is necessary to consider in what things we can give way, even what parts cannot suffer any action.

009 And these are the following, from which it is impossible to depart in any way, because we deny God and his gospel.

010 First, that the doctrine, as heretofore taught among us, of the articles of faith, of good works, and of Christian liberty, according to our confession and confessed creed, may be freely kept and preached.

011 Secondly, that after the institution of Christ our Lord, both forms of the sacrament may be administered and given.

(12) Thirdly, it cannot be granted in any way that the Missa privata, the angular masses, as they have been held by the opposite party until now, should be permitted and held henceforth as a sacrifice to obtain grace and forgiveness of sins before God for the living and the dead, in order to diminish the death of Christ.

013 Fourthly, the marital state shall and must be left free to all men who are not specially endowed by God with chastity, whether they be priests or other ministers.

(14) We think that it is not necessary to speak of convents. For when marriage is free, and the sacrificial measure have fallen, then the answer to this question has already been given that one cannot, with God, again erect the monasteries as a blasphemy, as has been the case up to now.

015 On the other hand, let the princes in general offer to yield to the opposite in those things in which one can yield with God and a good conscience.

(16) Namely, that in common public and unpleasant ceremonies in churches one compare oneself harmlessly; as, with the singing in churches and public form of the mass 2c. But that for the betterment of the people German songs are not forbidden.

017 For there must be order in the church, for the children's sake, and for the sake of the simple people: and it is not good that any man should make any particular thing.

(18) Secondly, the bishops may be given their authority over the pastors in the church government, as with ordinances 2c., if they do not follow our doctrine, and do not bind the priests with ungodly oaths and burdens.

019 For the ordinance that the bishops are set over the priests as superintendents, hath doubtless had many just causes. For the priests must have superintendents. In this way the temporal princes of the church government will not wait, nor is it possible for them. In addition, it costs them a great deal, while the bishops have their goods to carry out such an office.

020 Neither is it fitting for us to break up this order, that bishops should be over priests, which have been in the church from the beginning, without great and pressing cause. For though the pope be antichrist, yet may we be under him, as the Jews were under Pharaoh in Egypt 2c., and afterward under Caiapha 2c., if yet right doctrine be left us free.

021 Thirdly, the bishops may be granted their jurisdiction, as, in matrimonial matters; item, the excommunication for the punishment of public sins, and not in matters belonging to secular courts.

(22) But that the princes complain that many worldly things are brought into the bishops' court, is perhaps the fault of the princes, usAiAsutia prinoiMm auxit xotsutlam Lxi86ox>orum. Where also the princes punished public vices with seriousness, the Officials would not get much money 2c.

(23) Neither is it necessary to dispute how far the oUस्कisntia and juri8ckiotio shall extend. For these things may be spoken of in dealings, if God would have mercy that they should come to that.

024 From difference of meat, fasting, and such like, it is to be sought that it may be left free; but where it would not, it may be further considered.

025 Christ rebuketh the Pharisees, because they consented unto them concerning small matters, and let go the great, saying, They cowardly flies, and swallow up a camel.

026 Now outward peace is much more excellent and good than outward liberty. Item, if one were to prevent the gospel from coming to others, it would also be burdensome. But of this we may speak further. Of monastery estates and other church estates, where such are thought of, it is due to offer what Imperial Majesty has granted to the church. Majesty 2c. will order for the good of the church to follow the same 2c.

This was done in an unobjectionable manner, asking 1) that the matters be conducted without bickering; 2) that he compare himself with the person who had made the complaint in the council, but that if one or the other complaint was lost, he should indicate sufficient causes; 3) that if some things were thought to be abuses, he should think of ways to remedy them; and finally 4) that all actions should be kept secret until the end.

2nd Reply of the Chancellor of the Church of Saxony, on behalf of the Protestants.

The Electors, Princes, and Estates would doubtless know how they, the Protestants, had hitherto always sought not to enter into the matter otherwise than amicably; but that a settlement would afterwards be requested, their Electoral and Princely Graces would know how they had always complained that the Confutation would not be communicated to them. They complained that the confutation would not be communicated to them; in which case, and since they had not seen such a document, it was not possible for them to settle. But because they noted that Imperial Majesty's opinion and command. Majesty's opinion and command to put an end to the abuses, they had indeed attracted some in their confession, and had already put an end to the same in their principalities out of distress to their consciences; however, they did not want to be without sufficient reason to accomplish this, and in doing so to prove themselves Christian in all respects; they were also requested not to let the action reach any further than their relatives.

3. other lecture of the chancellor of Baden.

Their princes and lords thanked them for their offer to act kindly (as they also offered to do), and also not to let the things get further than to the relatives. Now one could resort to the act itself, but as far as it is not contrary to faith and the Christian common church.

against. Why the Confutation had not been communicated, however, had already been reported earlier, and they again left it at that, as they also considered that the communication would only be a hindrance to the matter. It was also known that in the confession that had been handed over, several abuses had been reported, which were to be changed, but meanwhile there were two distinctions in this confession, namely 21 articles as a confession of faith and 7 or 8 articles of abuses. Grace considered that one must first know how the confession of faith, as the most important, is constituted: so one wanted to deal with the same first, whereupon the other 7 or 8 articles could also be made, since they wanted to help faithfully, where possible, to improve it.

4. another reply from the Chancellor of the Church of Saxony.

Because the settlement cannot take place without a confession, the confession and the confession should be made and considered from article to article.

5. third lecture of the chancellor of Baden.

They would be inclined to take up the matter, but they were certain that it would only lead to disputation and bickering if the Confutation were to be considered along with the Confession; rather, it would be more advisable to consider only the Confession from article to article, and to deliberate on each one in particular, whether it could be settled for the sake of it, but if there were conflicting opinions, to let it go to the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty.

6. the third reply of the Chancellor of the Church of Saxony.

To avoid the disputation, one would put up with this way, and would also be obliged to follow it willingly.

As the Confession is made to be read from article to article.

I. From God.

The first article has had no challenge.

II. of original sin.

As to the other article, D. Eck says: the main article is according to the Christian church, but in the definition they have one defect, and that is, that he calls covetousness an original sin, that it remains a sin before and after baptism, because one speaks of it as St. Augustine speaks, so it would be more <sup>1)</sup> a battle of words, than that they are far from each other. That the words, Lins Mueiu st tiinors [etc.]. Mr. Ph. Melancthon has offered to speak peaceably; has two challenges: 1) of the words "without fear and confidence," 2) of the Fomes. He did not want to speak of it as in the school, for they call it eurentiurn rsetituäiriis oriZinalis, which he had called "without fear and confidence"; D. Eck said to this that it was a new form of speaking, otherwise one was already concordant of the article, only that one had not used the common words, otherwise it was the same in their opinion. On the other hand, D. Eck has also confessed that the inatsriuls remains pseeati, and one is thus compared to the article.

III. of the person of Christ.

Of the third article, of Christ, both parts and parties have also been agreed.

IV. From justification.

V. Of the Word and the Sacraments.

VI Of good works.

As to the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles, D. Eck says that there should be an explanation, for the main article is not inappropriate to the Christian faith. He also says that faith, which works through love, justifies, and makes righteous, De meritis, or of merits, he also considers it a fighting word. So Christ said, If ye do all that ye ought, say, We are unprofitable servants. St. Paul adds, Romans 8: "We do not believe that the sufferings of this world are worthy of the glory to come, which will be revealed to us. Item Solomon and Peter: Love covers the multitude of sins. Ecclesiastes 9: Man knows not whether he is in grace or in disgrace. Besides, hath also drawn from the apostles' histories Cornelius the man of war, with his good works. They call it merita, that the most gracious Father would reward works, and that meritum is nothing but gratia Dei. Saying that no work was meritorious in himself, but the grace of God was to be regarded.

Then Doctor Wimpina says: If our works are done by our will without divine grace, they are unmeritorious, otherwise they would be meritorious for the sake of Christ's communion with the Church, for he has ever said: vis inZrodi vitam, 86rva mandata, that is, if you want to enter into life, keep the commandments.

On this the Lord Philip Melanchthon said: You know how the disputation de merito and de congruo would have been aroused; likewise also in<sup>1)</sup> the repentance of satisfaction, and that one would have spoken nothing at all of faith in the repentance, the word meritum he had bypassed.

Philip Melanchthon also said that he believed that they could suffer the definition of faith, namely, when the heart concludes that God has forgiven its sin for Christ's sake, as the ancients, as well as Thomas Aquinas, interpreted it.

Since it now comes to this proposition and speech that sola fides justificire, that is, that faith alone and heartfelt trust in God's grace for Christ's sake make one pious and righteous before God, then D. Eck of Ingolstadt said, first, that one could not suffer such speech, for it causes annoyance, and crude, wicked, insolent people; second, he said that no old holy doctor, teacher, and father ever spoke in this way; third, he said that faith alone does not make one righteous, but love does, and more love than faith, and he also pointed out the following sayings: St. Paul to the Ephesians says, "I am righteous in the sight of God. Paul says to the Ephesians that love is a bond of perfection; item, to the Corinthians, that faith without love is nothing; item, also to the Corinthians, that love is the greatest. Therefore, in the end, D. Eck also said: One should send the soles 3) to the cobbler for a while. Eck was allowed to speak so brazenly before the above-mentioned four princes, as given commissioners and commanders, regardless of the fact that the above-mentioned speech, that faith alone makes one righteous and pious before God, is not only carried out according to the meaning and understanding of St. Paul in Romans, Corinthians, and Romans 1). Paul to Romans, Galatians, and Ephesians, but also that only many old holy great fathers, doctors, and teachers have spoken in such a way, both Greek and Latin; and especially Greek Eusebius, Basil, Athanasius, Origen; Latin Hilarius, Am-

1) So in Spalatin's Annals. Förstemann offers: "da auch der" 2c.

2) "Band" put by us after Col. 3:14. instead of "covenant" by Förstemann.

3) "Solen," a mockery of so'a üds, by faith alone.

brosius, Jerome, Augustine, Bernardus, also St. Thomas Aquinas, Order of Preachers.

Doctor Eck also said that they spoke of merit, not as if merit were like a painted man, but as of a convenience and superfluous grace of God.

The Lord Philip says that this form was used for three reasons: 1) that St. Paul uses it in this way; 2) if one puts oaritatem or otherwise, one points to us, and not to God's grace; 3) so that it is understandable and clear, because every Christian feels the faith.

Doctor Eckius says: the three causes would not be sufficient, 1) that this form is not in Paulo nor in all Scripture; 2) so oaritas is God's grace, and not our work; 3) so one is not more intelligible than the other.

Doctor Eck also thinks that it is said äs opsribus IsZis sudaioas and of o6r6monii8, that 8ola can also make no unity.

Doctor Eck also says that for forgiveness one must first have God's grace and faith and divine love.

Lord 4) Phil, said: Forgiveness of sins is obtained when first the heart is frightened, and then faith and God's love are found, which comfort can also be felt.

Doctor Eck says: sin is a condemnation of God, therefore sin must be forgiven by love, 6ds8 is pra68ux>po8itum su8ti6oationi8, and not ju8titia.

Brentius says that the word 8ola is not to be rejected, for the word 8o1a was also used by Ambrose and Hilarius, and was drawn from Paulo; nor was it alone spoken äs op6vidu816Z18 judaioao, the word sola standing alone against the merita.

Doctor Eck relied on it, that it was spoken äs opsri1)U8 IsAis zudaioas, because the Jews, if they had been converted to the Christian faith, would have taken it for granted that they nevertheless had to keep Mosi's ceremonial law.

Mr. Philippus Melanchthon drew on the words of Paul ad Lpliss: I'ido 8alvati 68tis, that is, ye are saved by faith.

D. Eck says they confessed that the forgiveness of sins was psr Zratiam st kidom Zratum Laoiontom kormalitm, st xor vorbum ot 8aoramsnta in8truni6ntali6r. So one is to put the article.

Cochläus talked a lot, but little to the,

It's official business.

4) In the old edition: "D". In this case it is to be resolved by domiuus, not by doctor.

VIII. Of the Christian church and evil priests.

D. Eck says: he hopes there shall be no dispute of this article either, for the church is well beautiful and yet black, as 6s viiBnidns and 6s pi8oibu8. Holds it serviceable for comparison, that not the word 8UQotoruin, but the word 8LMotuin would stand. V. Eck also says that he considers it that we are not unequal in kunäuirwuto and in reason.

IX. From baptism.

The ninth article, of baptism, has had no contestation.

X. Of the Lord's Supper.

The tenth, äs 6uoliari8tia, of the most reverend sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, has also had no lack, for alone to put the word realiter to it, or 8ufi8tuir1iulit6r, or in German, "essentially."

XI. Of the Confession.

Of the eleventh article, confession, D. Eck says that in the main he is unanimous with the Church, that sin which one does not know, one must not confess.

XII. Of repentance.

Of the twelfth article, of repentance, O. Eck says, the principal article is also not unequal to the Christian church, and is right, considering it also only a battle of words. In the first, they are unanimous; in the other, the inequality is, that faith is included, that faith is a part; to the third, of satisfaction or correction, for they are called 8uH8kaotion6rn the correction. Then Philip said what caused him to put in the word faith, because it is the way xo6niand repentance, that first one is frightened of sins, and then that one again acquires faith and hearty confidence in God's grace and mercy, as then happened with David.

D. Eck has also said that one is not displeased in rs. Much has been said about the word 8oti8ku6tio, or satisfaction.

Philip said he was talking äs xsvpstna xosnitDntin.

Wednesday after Assumptionis [August 17] in the forenoon, the action is further taken, especially of the parts of the penance.

Since, furthermore, one wanted to resort to action, the theologians of the opposite kind have on our They do not want to suffer a notary, but let it be heard that where they wanted to have a theologian as notary, they wanted to use Faber as their notary. So I went away from Spalatinus in God's name. God grant that something fruitful may be accomplished in this action, amen.

44. declaration of the evangelicals, in which articles they have united.*18 Aug. 1530.

This document is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 4465; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 103 d; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 230 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 218. Also in Müller, p. 745; in Chyträus, p. 263 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 230 from Spalatin's manuscript in the Ansbachische Acten. In the determination of the time we have followed Förstemann.

The first article is the same. That in the other Latin article it is said that man is born by nature without the fear of God and without faith in God is to be understood not only that children so young cannot have this effect, but also that they are not able by natural powers to have the fear of God and faith, and so are born without such powers and gifts, is a lack of the righteousness which we should bring with us from Adam.

In the German articles this point is clearly stated so that it cannot be contested, namely, that we are not able by nature to fear and believe in God; with this also the ancients are understood.

Of natural lusts we hold that the nature of sin remaineth, but the guilt is taken away by baptism.

In the third article, one is the same.

Declaration of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Articles, 1) we confess that forgiveness of sins is by grace, through which we have a gracious God, and by faith is done in us, and by God's Word and Sacrament, as by instrument.

In the seventh article one is the same.

In the eighth article, of the church, we confess that in the church in this life there are many wicked and sinners.

1) Instead of the preceding words, Spalatin had written, "In the fourth article we confess," 2c. Likewise, "In the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles we are equal." The words underlined by us Melanchthon crossed out, and put in the margin instead: "Declaration of the 4th, 5th, and 6th articles."

In the 9th 10th and 11th articles one is the same.

In the 12th article, of repentance, we do not refuse to put three parts of repentance, as namely contritio, repentance, which is fright, when one knows sin.

Confession; but in this we are to look for absolution, and believe that sin is forgiven us for Christ's merit.

The third part is satisfactio, the good fruit of repentance. But sin is not forgiven by the merit of satisfaction. So we hold at the same time, but we do not agree whether satisfaction is necessary for the forgiveness of penance.

In the 13th article, you're the same.

In the 14th article is also the same as that in words; but so much of the same declaration is concerned, is kept under the title of spiritual power.

The 15th article has been saved to the article of episcopal authority and monastic vows.

In the 16th 17th 18th 19th article, you're the same.

In the twentieth article, as far as the preachers and their excuses are concerned, it is left as it stands, since it is not charged in this negotiation. But as far as faith is concerned, the fourth article and its declaration are left as they are. But as far as good works are concerned, it is the same that good works must and should be done, and that works done by faith and grace are pleasing to God. But whether the same works are meritorious, and how they are meritorious, also whether and how one should hope in them, they have not been able to compare. This is the other matter.

In the 21st article, two articles are compared, namely, that all the saints and angels in heaven pray to God for us, and also that the use of the church, which keeps the memory of the saints, and prays to God that the prayers of the saints may be granted to us, be kept Christian and good; but concerning the invocation of the saints, there is agreement that there is no expressed commandment in Holy Scripture that anyone is commanded to invoke the saints. But in that the saints may well be invoked according to the customary usage of common churches of Christian opinion, therein one is so divided that the princes and rulers hold with their kinsmen that such a thing is a doubtful and grievous thing, from many 2) because of the abuses, and that there is no expressed Scripture about it.

1) Förstemann: "the".

2) That's because of the crowd.

1045. Proposal which the Protestants made at the request of the papists because of some external ceremonies.

From the uuetor npolo. lutue. in Müller, p. 754; in Brück's Geschichte des Reichstags zu Augsburg, p. 95 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 249 from the Markgräflich Brandenburgischen Acten.

Yesterday we heard your and the others' statements and discussed them, and we considered the matter most diligently, but we can think of no other means or way, after further discussion, than to leave us the Communio sub specie, and our clergy the marriage, even at the masses as they are held here, until further action in a common, free, Christian Concilio. In order that Christian unity may nevertheless be preserved in these articles, and that the church may remain in orderly government, to which we are highly inclined, we are requested, and thereafter, as far as the other articles are concerned, to refrain from the bishops' authority, from the difference of food, and from ordinary church ceremonies, or hereafter at a convenient time and place, to confer and compare with the Oræinurii8 loooruin, that due obedience may be done to them by our clergy, and their due jurisdiction not be hindered, and, as much as possible and Christian, equality in churches in doctrine and ceremonies be kept.

1046. the so-called indefeasible, intangible, Christian means proposed by the papist side and handed over on August 19, 1530.

In the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 443; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 99 b (wrong 92 b); in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 226; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 214; in Chyträus according to the German edition, pp. 386, and according to the Latin, p. 257; in Müller, p. 755; in Spalatin's Annals, p. 170, and from the Margravia Brandenburg Acts in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 250.

Of common ecclesiastical and spiritual authority, also of common ecclesiastical statutes, customs, ceremonies, usages, and episcopal authority.

That there should be fasting, feasting, confession, prayer, procession, ceremonies, different times, foods, and other such traditional customs, administration of the sacraments, and also with

It is the custom of the common church, and has been in use among them from time immemorial, for the episcopal authority and sovereignty of princes, princes, and their relatives to be held. But what abuses or complaints have been raised about this, that reported sovereigns and princes compare themselves with common estates, help them to consult with common estates, and as usually decided, they will also comply with this.

Also the Electors, Princes, and their relatives shall be at liberty, and not included therein, if they have special differences, <sup>1)</sup> errors or defects with archbishops, bishops, or prelates, of the same jurisdiction or otherwise, which they shall otherwise settle amicably or legally with each other.

Distribution and reception of the Sacrament under both forms.

That by permission of papal holiness or their legate, with the knowledge and approval of imperial majesty, as the supreme advocate of the church, it may be granted that only in the places and parishes, and in the subjects of the same parish, as it has now been customary for some years, the sacrament of the communion of the body and blood of Christ, and yet with preceding confession, as was the custom of old, may be administered or administered to the desires in both forms; But with the following measure, namely, that at paschal times, when this sacrament is administered, it should also be taught and preached among them, not by divine commandment, that both forms must be received, that the whole Christ also be and be received under either, as well as both forms.

Item, that every one who desires to receive the Sacrament under one form of bread shall not be denied it, but shall be communicated to the Church according to the ancient custom; and that this permission shall not last longer than until the next Concilii of final decision.

That also by ecclesiastical and secular authorities it be seriously threatened that the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ be destroyed by 2) or

1) In the old editions: "sphen" (if) - offence, disagreement. Compare: "spännig", St. Louis edition, Vol. III, 115, ? 33.

2) "Verrören" put by us instead of: "verehren" in the old edition. Both the Wittenberg and the Jena editions read: "verören," which will probably be interpreted by spilling. In Spalatin's Annals, p. 172:

otherwise no dishonor is done, and where it happens in a dangerous or unseemly 3) way, that this is seriously punished by ecclesiastical or secular authorities.

For this reason, the form of wine for the sick is not kept in vessels, nor is it carried to anyone, but if someone wants to communicate under both forms, it is consecrated and distributed in the church or in the homes of the sick under the office of the masses. And for the sake of honoring the sacrament, it is considered good that when both forms are distributed among a multitude of people, that it be received and enjoyed through a chalice.

Concerning the Office of the Masses.

That the common and special private monks be kept in ordinary dress, on the altars with the inclusion of the great canon, as has hitherto been in use and practice in common Christian churches of the German nation and their regions from time immemorial.

And after there had been in the small and great Canon of the Mass more a controversy or division in words, than in the right understanding of the words hostia, odlatio, saeritieurQ or sacrifice, that such words should be drawn into Christian right understanding, namely, when Christ in the paschal lamb, in the Old Testament ilguralitsr and that is, meaningfully sacrificed, and afterwards the same Christ offered Himself on the trunk of the cross, a true, living sacrifice to God the Father for the sin of men, so now and then the kuerilleium or sacrifice of the masses is a or in m^steriis 6t rgruksgrituvuin, that is, a sacramental and memorial sacrifice, practiced and used daily in the church, in remembrance and commemoration of the suffering and death of Christ.

Of the 4) married priests listed.

When they were prevented from taking their vows of priestly status, into which they had willingly surrendered, and the statutes of the church did not allow them to accept permanent marriage, it was decided that, in order to spare poor seduced wives, to feed innocent children, to avoid all kinds of trouble, and to avoid other possible hardships, they should be allowed to marry.

vereeren". Förstemann: "verörn". In the Weimar copy: "increase", which is, however, corrected to "verören".

3) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Förstemann: "sinseliger," which he explains by: "more muthwilliger".

4) "stated"

alleged.

Causes, the priests, who now sit in the specified matrimonial cohabitation, would thus, without confirmation and approval of their conduct, be tolerated until the future Council, only in the places where it has been their supposed use for some time. But in such a way and to such a degree that no one may marry before the decision of the Council, and whoever does so may be deprived of his priestly office or benefices and expelled from the country, or otherwise be punished externally. But whosoever would abjure his marriage estate, and abstain from eaelidutn, such should be allowed, and not be denied; neither should he remain with his Ursisüeio and Moio. That also in the places where the married priests are, and especially where they are in the churches, diligence be taken to obtain others, as beneficial as this may always be, who are and remain in the eaelidatn and unmarried, and the married ones suspended ad otUeio and dsneücio; unless by papal sanctity power or its legate tolerance be obtained in the ministerio of their otUeii and bsrisüeii.

In this connection it is also necessary to consider that the eon6ubinurio8, so that they sit annoyingly in many places, should be completely abolished and no longer tolerated.

That no tolerance be given to this by the ordinaries; and whether it would not be good that at a future council, in so far as it is necessary, it be proposed that the conjugates be taken to the priestly state and ordained, as was the custom in the first church some hundred years ago.

Of oen monasteries and monastic vows.

The following means are intended, namely, that all and every monastery, male and female, as yet undestroyed, remain with them, and in singing, reading, and other services, in the dress of their rules, also in the visitation and obedience of their prelates, as happened before this division, be left in peace, and where there is a lack of prelates or provincials, that they be made by ordinary election, as before old age. Also, no one who wants to join them in the rules and orders, or who wants to come out of this division and return to it, shall be ordered or restrained to do so; that they also be protected and handled from violence and violence that they might encounter to their persons or goods, as of the end of the future Conciliar.

And which religious come out of the monasteries without proper admission, that they should return to the monasteries, or if they do not do so that they would otherwise (they would then have permission for this from ecclesiastical authority, which has power to do such) not be tolerated anywhere (nyndert) in the lands, and the prelates are not to be deprived of acting against the same in an orderly manner.

But in consideration, occasion and many of the now expired religious, that against the same with no farther, than with essay of a penitence, punishment is made.

Those, however, who would henceforth come out of the monasteries without proper permission, shall be punished according to ecclesiastical and secular rights, and the punishment of the prelates and ordinaries shall not be prevented.

Which monasteries, however, are completely closed, and there is no one left in them, nor would they be occupied after the request of their superiors, so that they will be tolerated until the future council; but that their monastery dues and income not be collected for the own benefit of each local superior, but that the dues be deposited and preserved by special persons who are appointed for this purpose in each place by the prelates of the order together with the bishops, and until the future decision of the Council as to how and what is to be done with them. As soon as a monastery is occupied, however, its revenues and income are to be transferred to it as before.

And after some articles have been set in this amicable negotiation for a future council, it is necessary that Imperial Majesty and other estates of the empire be concerned about this and other excellent and necessary causes for reforming the church in its head and members for the time being. Majesty and other estates of the empire be concerned, on account of this and other excellent and necessary causes, to reform the church in the head and members, conducive to time, place and place, as the imperial majesty, with papal sanctity, legates all this to himself. Maj. compare them with Papal Holiness Legates, to proclaim and hold a Univerfalconcilium in the German Nation.

1047. the Protestants thereupon the 20th of August brought in an indisputable and unassailable answer to the means proposed yesterday.

This immediately follows the previous number at the locations indicated there.

Of the Most Reverend Sacrament.

Let it be known that the reverend Sacrament of the true Body and Blood of Christ, according to our confession, cannot be performed in any other way than with prior confession, in our principalities.

tern and territories, as before, shall be served and taken.

But that it is desired to teach, that it is not unjust to receive but one form, is known in what manner we have reported it.

Moreover, before the reverend sacrament is received, the people must be informed that they know that it is right to receive both forms.

However, it should be ensured that the pastors and preachers keep such measures as are conducive to peace, until further action in a concilio.

And so it is confessed that the whole body of Christ is under the form of bread; nevertheless, because the holy sacrament is thus instituted with both forms, and the words of Christ signify it more clearly, this use of receiving both forms is according to the institution of Christ.

In our principalities and territories, too, no one has been prevented from seeking the sacrament of his own pleasure, wherever he may know it.

Also the institution is to be made that the reverend sacrament be held in honor; as has been done hitherto, also, without glory to speak of, it should be imposed and tolerated unwillingly otherwise; so also the form of wine has not been held nor carried in vessels with us hitherto.

From the fair.

Furthermore, if the masses in our principalities and territories have hitherto been held in ordinary church clothes, they shall also be held also.

And since the masses, by virtue of our confession, are held honestly in our principalities and territories with their substantials, even with ordinary ceremonies after the institution of Christ, it is with God's help that they shall continue to be held with due reverence.

Of the clerical marital state.

As far as the marriage of priests is concerned, we have shown in our confession many well-founded reasons why we consider our and other clergymen's marriage to be Christian and right.

We have also had to allow the clergy marriage all the more because we have seen and experienced the manifold, great and mean abuse and sinful immorality of the clergy before. Because from the way in which

and in many other places it is still evident that few priests have the high gift of God of chastity, and that such priests, who should sit in an unrighteous, licentious life, are not acceptable to us: Let it be considered, how in this part of ours, after the death of the present ordained priests, not to accept again other ordained priests, nor as many pastors and preachers, skilful and learned, as are necessary for the order of our churches in our lands and territories, who have the gift of chastity, because your beloved and you yourselves indicate in your sent means that they have considered that the priests concubinarii, who sit in a lewd life, should be completely abolished, and no tolerance should be given to them henceforth by the ordinaries. And your beloved and yourselves consider whether, therefore, it would not be good that at a future council it be proposed that the eonjngati be admitted to the priestly state, in moderation, as was the custom in the first church some hundred years ago.

Of monastic vows".

About monastic vows 1) your beloved and you know what we have indicated on our part in our confession; therefore, we do not want to complain about them to anyone. But how the monks and nuns, who still remain in monasteries in our principalities and territories, should and will keep themselves among one another for the sake of their going out or remaining in them, or not, will be left to their own responsibility to God until further consideration and consideration in a common free Christian council, nor will they be given any measure in this.

And although what concerns the monasteries does not belong in this action, but nevertheless all and every monastery, male and female, shall be left quiet in their nature and dress, also in the ceremonies, as they are and stand up to now in every place.

For this purpose 2) as much as possible, the understanding is to be applied, so that no violence, in whatever way this may be, is exercised nor carried out against reported persons.

But concerning the single monasteries, that such monasteries, which are now single without monks and nuns, shall henceforth remain unchanged and undiminished in the secular patrons' and advocates' order.

1) Förstemann: "Vom Klosterwesen".

2) "should" is missing in Förstemann.

The monasteries shall remain in existence, and the persons who have come and gone from them shall receive from the income, and it shall be given to them for their necessities, also for the maintenance of preachers, pastors, schools, first of all in their places where the churches may have been occupied by the monasteries, and then the surplus is to be settled until a concilio, and further Christian consideration and consultation, how and in what form such monasteries and estates are to be ordered for God's honor and benevolent things in lands and places in which, or where they are situated; Then, too, the favors, benefits, and annuities shall be duly and unambiguously determined.

Of [the] bishops' violence.

One is also inclined in all this part to help to maintain episcopal rule and authority; but with it unapproved of the public abuses, that the bishops do not have diligence, that one preaches rightly, that the sacraments are administered and acted seriously and Christianly, that capable people are ordained, that the priests lead a chaste life, that one abuses the ban (Pann) in many things 2c. These and such abuses are not to be approved herewith.

And it shall be procured that the bishops shall receive their due obedience, namely, that our pastors and preachers shall be presented to the ordinaries of every place.

Item, if a priest commits a criminal offence, the Ordinary, by virtue of episcopal authority, shall have to punish him without hindrance.

The bishops shall not be prevented from exercising their ecclesiastical jurisdiction in matters pertaining to ecclesiastical courts. For if some matters are brought into ecclesiastical courts that do not belong there, as common debt cases 2c., it is understood that the other estates will also have considered this in abuses.

One should also keep to the promotion of common peace, up to much touched common, Christian, free Concilio, in which like the other states.

Item, the bishops are not to be prevented from exercising the excommunication and banishment, as punishment for the cases, belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as is due according to the Holy Scriptures.

Of the ceremonies.

Also, for the sake of love, the following common ceremonies are to be held and administered safely, so that equality in them may be maintained in churches, conducive to peace and unity.

However, we do not want to burden anyone's conscience with this, as if such ceremonies had to be held for necessary church services, but that [they] are good ordinances to be held for the sake of peace and love.

Namely, no meat should be eaten publicly for a certain period of time:

In the four soft fasts, 1)

All Friday and Saturday,

Christmas Eve,

Pentecost,

On the evening of St. John the Baptist, On All Hallows' Eve.

From the fast.

For the sake of fasting in our lands and territories, it is considered what a great burden it has been for the poor common and working people to keep such fasts for 40 days in a row, for the sake of food and otherwise, so that it is known how often it has been spoken of, and also considered by many, that the fasts should be divided into other times of the year. Therefore let poverty be considered in this. Nevertheless, as much as possible, this part should be kept in conformity with other churches, and ceremonies and singing, gospels and epistles should be sung, read, and preached in all ways, just as in other churches, and no meat should be allowed to be sold publicly.

Of the holidays.

Ordinary celebrations are also to be held, as has been done until now, so that the people may remain in the habit of hearing God's word and the sermon and receiving the holy sacraments, each according to his conscience's need, and especially these feast days are to be kept:

All Sunday,

Christmas Day,

St. Stephen's,

St. John Apostle and Evangelist,

The Lord's circumcision,

UpiMania,

Char Week, to be kept for the sake of the Passion, Easter Day together with Monday and Tuesday, Ascension of Christ,

Pentecost together with Monday and Tuesday, The noblest feasts of the pure virgins, and

Mother of God, Mary,
All Apostles,
St. Michel,
All saints.

Quatember.

One should also on such holidays ordinary chant, Officia and Lectiones, taken from the Scriptures, halls. Likewise, the litany in the week of the cross, to exhort the people to prayer, should be kept.

From confession.

Nor should confession be abandoned, considering the great consolation that absolution brings. So, too, if confession were to fall away so completely that no one would know what the great and salutary power of the keys was. And although instruction is to be given, for the consolation of consciences, that it may be known how necessary it is that even those sins which have not been told may be forgiven, it is also to be commanded, as has been done hitherto, that people be accustomed, as much as possible, to present the cases in which they are in special need of counsel and consolation.

In addition to all this, it is nevertheless considered of great necessity that the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, should think of a conducive universal council in the German nation. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, to hold a conducive Universal Council in the German nation, it is graciously intended to reform the Church at the head and in the members. And the princes and others, who have been appointed to this committee, want to promote this announcement of ours to the imperial majesty, also to the churl and princes, in a submissive and friendly manner, so they are requested to do and act with the estates and their relatives of this part as well.

1048 The Papists demand of the Protestants to explain themselves more clearly on some points about their proposed means.

Numbers 1048 to 1053 incl. are found in Müller's Historie, lld. III, eap. 29, x. 767 f. from the unnamed author's uxot. mstu., p. 111.

It is not really clear from this how it is meant for the sake of confession, whether this part is to be kept the same as the confession of other churches or not, so that no one should be communicated, unless he had first confessed, as has been the custom from time immemorial, with a recital of all his sins, and had himself absolved; item, whether it should also be permitted in this part that each one should receive the sacrament in one or both forms, and from those who were in church offices, or who had to do so before (by which one meant the mendicants in the cities).

Furthermore, how they would like to see that in this part it be granted and decreed that preachers and teachers teach and preach in such a way that those who receive the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ only in one form do not do wrong, for in their opinion this would serve to promote Christian unity, and subsequently their actions could be all the more elevated in the eyes of the other princes, rulers, and estates. Item, so they could also not really understand from the counter-proposals whether private masses, as well as canons, large and small, were to be permitted on this part or not. Item, whether one wanted to agree on this part, as they indicated in their proposals, that after the departure of the present ordained clergy, no more ordained priests should be accepted, until a General Council.

1049th Declaration of the Evangelicals.

See the previous number.

As far as confession was concerned, there would be a special point at the end of their handed-over compositions, which would indicate their opinion clearly enough, in accordance with divine Scripture, and they would also leave it alone, together with what concerned private masses, both canons, and the marriage of the clergy, because their princely graces and their subordinates would have considered the handed-over proposals of the other part to the effect that they wanted to declare at once "what they thought" that this part could be left alone with a conscience. Grace and their assigns would have considered the submitted proposals of the other part to the effect that they wanted to declare at once "what they thought", that this part could be left with conscience. If they had now decided that they could, with God and their consciences, further indulge, they would not have failed to indicate this at once in their compositions, all of which they did not want to do in the end, so that the opposing party might consider it an unprofitable delay to act on further funds or indulgences.

1050. the papal part's further complaint.

See No. 1048.

They understand that the decrees of the Lutheran part did not want to slacken anything, since the Bohemians in the Concilio at Basel had conceded that the use of the sacrament in a single church was not permitted.

The author of this book says that the form is not unjust, but that this part's opinion is to be interpreted by His Imperial Majesty and all Christian potentates of the whole world. Majesty and all Christian potentates of the whole world, especially princes, princes, and estates of the empire and their own deceased ancestors, as well as all of Christendom, that they were doing and had done wrong in receiving the sacrament in one form; but whether this would be conducive to peace and unity, let the representatives of this part consider for themselves.

051 Answer of the Lutheran part to the persistent complaints of the papists.

See No. 1048.

As they would not have refrained from moving things again with the highest and utmost diligence. Now they would not have been less inclined than someone from the opposite party to help promote that, as much as God and conscience would always want to happen, which would be conducive to Christian peace and unity; but as they considered the matters for and for themselves, they could not have imagined that they could offer themselves further, or propose anything closer, than what they had already done in their handed-over means of composition. They therefore asked the counterpart not to blame them in this case, but to take up the matter with the Electors, Princes, and Estates of their part, and then further with the Imperial Majesty. Majesty in the way they have been presented in their compositions, and also to help to promote that a general, common, Christian council may be announced.

1052 The Protestants' Written Opinion on the Use of the Lord's Supper under One Form. August 21, 1530.

This document is found apart from the locations given under No. 1048 in Brück's History, p. 99 and in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 273 after a copy in the Margravian Brandenburg Acts p. 770. The date is given there.

Yesterday we informed your beloved and you others that the opinion of this part was not to condemn the Christian believing ancestors and deceased, or people of all other countries and nations, for the sake of their having received and received the reverend sacrament of the body and blood of Christ in one form alone; we still insist on this. For we have written to your loved ones and to you this notice.

The Church of Christ, in the first place, has said that the institution of Christ concerns both priests and laymen, but that it is eertznonialtz xrtzesxtnM, äisxnsudils in Hnidnsäuin eusintzessitutis. Therefore it is held, and not doubted, that many dead and living persons in Christendom, who have thus received the Sacrament in one form only, or receive it again, are therefore not to be condemned, as we also do not condemn them for this reason. This we declare unto your beloved and to you, lest we should interpret it as your beloved and to you should understand it.

1053. other attempt of the papists of the Holy Communion. 21 August 1530.

This document is also found in Brück's Geschichte, p. 100 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 274, apart from the locations indicated in No. 1048. According to the latter the time determination is.

The opposite proposal.

Furthermore, after due consideration, this remedy is proposed by the other part:

That those on our side here between the decision of the next Council should preach and teach that the use of both or one form is not from divine commandment. Therefore no one should judge those who receive under one form to be doing wrong, moreover, that under either form the whole Christ, true God and man, is his body and blood; The same again, if and when the Communion is thus left to us under both forms, that it is also preached on the other side, not to judge us that those do wrong who receive the Sacrament with us under both forms, because the use of one or both forms is not of divine commandment, and thus is left to us to use until future Concilio. Item, that we also do not deny the sacrament to anyone who wants to receive it in one form, but let it be administered by our parish priests.

1054 Philipp Melancthon's first essay on the means of composition, in which it is explained why the Protestants cannot enter into anything.

In Cölestin, tom. III, p. 47 and in the Oorp. L "k., vol. II, 304.

Translated from the Latin.

1) easibus is missing in Förstemann.

If the Imperial Majesty will say that she accepts the proposed means, then one must first of all ask for a copy of the submitted report in order to know how the opponents have brought the matter about.

If the Emperor wanted to take out some suggestions or words from the means of unification, this should not be allowed.

If they should ask whether the emperor sins when he is given only the one form, the answer is that we do not condemn the church. The whole Church was, as it were, bound and imprisoned under this statute of the forbidden use of the chalice. Is the church, then, in itself innocent, since in this it has been wronged? But the prohibition was most unjust.

From the fair.

Why will you not agree with us that private masses may be said?

Answer: Private masses, as they say, are done in the opinion that they are applied to others ex opere operato in order to earn grace with them. For this reason this opinion is ungodly.

1) Because, if the opus operatum is to earn something for someone, righteousness comes from the merit of works and not from faith, which is fundamentally false.

2) The passion of Christ is a sufficient sacrifice, as the Scripture testifies, that by one sacrifice he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified. So there is no need of any other sacrifice for daily sin.

(3) There is no need of a sacrifice of dedication, because no dedication takes place without faith; therefore, no dedication takes place by a mere outward work.

But that no application is made without the Holy Spirit is proved by the following:

"The letter kills, the spirit makes alive."

"How shall they believe, of whom they have heard nothing?"

"From the preaching ye have received the spirit of faith."

"He hath raised up among us the word of reconciliation."

Therefore, although the Mass would be a sacrifice of dedication, it would have no power ex opere operato, because the letter kills.

Likewise Christ saith, Do these things in remembrance of me: but to remember is as much as to believe. Item, they that remember it not, to them it is of no profit. So the mass is of no use to the dead.

He also commands that one should preach. What is the use of preaching to the dead?

The Canon holds the Application in itself, therefore it is not to be suffered. If they do not want to understand it about the sacrifice, they must be asked whether there is a difference between the communion of the laity and that of the clergy.

1055. Melancthon's other essay on the fourteen articles left uncompered in the committee. About the 20th of Sept. 1530.

From the author's own copy in the archives at Weimar printed in Müllers Historie, lib. III, eux. 29, p. 798; in Oorp. kek., vol. II, 298 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 463. The latter moves this document to September (shortly before the 21st) 1530. Compare No. 1091. Bretschneider assumes August 21.

The articles which have been compared in the committee and which concern the doctrine shall be collected together, but the other articles which have not been compared shall also be collected together, and are these:

1) That faith justifies us in the sight of God, and not works, neither for our previous or next works or merits, but for Christ's sake, if we believe that for Christ's sake God is gracious to us.

2) That we owe it to ourselves to do good works, though we do not thereby merit grace and righteousness before God, but faith obtains grace, not because of our works.

3) That in confession it is not necessary to tell the sins by name.

4) That, although repentance must and ought to be in repentance, yet sins are not forgiven for newness of life, but by faith, if we believe the absolution, or the gospel, that our sins are forgiven for Christ's sake; therefore faith must come to repentance, which comforts the conscience, and believes that sins are forgiven for Christ's sake.

5) That it is not necessary to impose special satisfaction in penance for the remission of penance.

6) That the holy sacraments do not justify without faith, ex opere operato.

7) That for true unity of the Church and of the faith there is no need of equality of human statutes, but of equality in the articles of faith and the use of the sacraments.

8) That worship services, instituted by men, without God's commandment and God's word, so that merit, are contrary to the gospel, and obscure the merit of Christ.

9) That monastic vows and monastic life are instituted, that they are services of God to merit grace, contrary to the Gospel.

10) That human statutes, which may be kept without sin, and are conducive to good order in the church, should be kept for love's sake, to avoid vexation. But let it be known that such works are not necessary services, nor do bishops have the right to burden consciences with such traditions; therefore it is not sinful to refrain from such traditions apart from offence.

11) To call upon the saints is an uncertain and dangerous thing, and obscures the ministry of Christ, whom the Scriptures hold up to us as the Mediator and Reconciler.

12) That those who forbid both forms act contrary to Christ's institution and the Scriptures.

13) That they which forbid marriage do contrary to the commandment of God, which commandeth that, to prevent fornication, every man shall have his wife.

14) That the Mass is not a work which merits grace ex opere operato, or applied to others, but that the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ is instituted to offer us grace, which we receive by faith, not ex opere operato.

And such articles the Elector of Saxony with his relatives again considers to be right and Christian, and herein also all articles are to be common and unconditional, which follow in right consequence from these; such as more articles are disputed, but are not specified in the submitted Confession expresso, 1) all of which are to be applied to the Concilium, so that in the meantime, on account of them, no part may burden the other by force.

Luther's letter to Lazarus Spengler, in which he mentions the close committee and the departure of the Landgrave. August 24, 1530.

This letter is printed from the original at Wolfenbüttel in the Leipzig Supplement, p. 63; in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 140; and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 54, p. 188.

1) Here our text offers Brück's correction. He crossed out the words: "Item ob etlich mehr Artikel streitig wären, so doch der überreichten Confessio nicht entgegen sein", and put instead the words of the text.

The more honorable!, careful! Mr. Lazaro Spengler, the city of Nuremberg Syndico, my favorable dear gentleman and friend.

Grace and peace in Christ. Honourable, prudent, dear lord and friend! Here I send you the sermon of the schools, together with the other sextons on the previous ones. I have no more copies, otherwise I would have sent you one or three; even so I have run out of them. I know no more to write to you, for we sit here in the desert, and must learn of you new newspapers. Nevertheless, we have heard of the new committee at Augsburg after the Landgrave's departure, and it is wonderful to see. May God continue to have mercy, amen. I hereby leave you in the grace of God. And greetings to all dear lords and friends. Christ will lead his own cause. Lx eremo, the Lartkiolomaei [24 Augusts 1530.

Martinus Luther.

1057 Melanchthon's letter to Luther, in which he reports to him what has happened in the actions of the committee so far. August 22, 1530.

This letter is found in Latin in Melanchthon's epist., üb. I, x>. 9; in Chyträus according to the German edition, p. 400, and according to the Latin, p. 269; in Cölestin, torn. III, x>. 49, and in the Corp. RiT, vol. ii, 299.

I. Yesterday we ended the discussion, or rather the bickering, before the negotiators. At first the negotiators were Duke Henry of Brunswick, the bishop of Augsburg, Eck, and Cochleus; then Duke George came in Henry's place. For the Duke of Brunswick had to ride to the Landgrave of Hesse, of whom they were afraid that he would accept troops.

(2) As to doctrine, it is thus, that Eck cavilleth the word sola, when we say that man is justified by faith alone. But he did not condemn the doctrine itself; -but said that the unlearned were vexed. For I compelled him to confess that righteousness is rightly appropriated by us to faith. Nevertheless he desired that we should so write, that a man might be justified by grace and faith. This I have but the fool understandeth not the word grace.

003 The other controversy was concerning the remission of punishment, and concerning the pardons. The third was about the merit of good works. In these two things nothing is compared. Though it is a small thing that he attributed to merit, yet we have not accepted the same.

(4) After this we came to the disputation of both forms. Here he undertook with great labor to prove that it was not a commandment to take both forms; he considered it a middle thing, that one should take one or both forms, and if we taught this, he would gladly give us both forms. I could not accept this, and yet I excused those who had hitherto, through error, received only one form. For they cried out that we condemned the whole church. What think ye? Christ's order applies to the laity as well as to the priests. Therefore, because we must use the Sacrament, let consciences keep the whole Sacrament. If this be your opinion, let me know it plainly.

(5) Nothing has been said about the mass, vows, and priestly marriage. Only a number of means have been proposed, which we have not accepted.

(6) I cannot know where it will go. For although peace is necessary to our enemies, it seems to me that some do not consider what great danger there will be if the matter turns into war. We have proposed some very poor means. We restore obedience and jurisdiction to the bishops, and promise to restore the common ceremonies. What we shall do with this I know not. Pray Christ to preserve us. August 22.

Luther's answer to the foregoing letter. Aug. 26, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in the Oock. cksv. d., toi. 114; from it in Buddeus, p. 195; in the Latin collection of letters of Flacius; in Cölestin, vol. III, bl. 50 b; and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 145. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, bl. 432d; in the Jenaer (1566), vol. V, bl. 121; in the Altenburger, vol. V, p. 248, and in the Leipziger, vol. XX, p. 191. We have translated after De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ! I should be surprised if this were to happen in this way.

my dear Philip, that those men might suffer these negotiators, and yet intend to deal kindly of the matter. I pray thee, is not all deceit and guile there? Thou hast now the Campegius, thou hast the Salzburger, thou hast plainly the hooded monks that went over the Rhine to Speier. 1) For what have I ever hoped less, and what do I desire even less, than that a union in doctrine should be negotiated? as if we could indeed overthrow the pope, or as if, as long as the papacy remains unharmed, our doctrine could be unharmed. He, of course, gives covenant and agreement so that he may remain pope; he will allow and permit if we do 2c. But thanks be to God that you have accepted nothing of yours.

You write that Eck was forced by you to confess that we are justified by faith; yet God would have you also force him not to lie. Namely, Eck confesses that righteousness comes from faith, but in doing so he defends all the abominations of the papacy, kills, persecutes, condemns those who confess this doctrine of faith, and does not even repent of it, but continues. The whole party of the adversaries do the same. And with these men (if it please Christ) ye seek terms of union, and labour in vain, until they by some occasion find some apparent cause (plausum) wherewith to press us down.

In what thou writest of both forms thou hast done right. For so I hold with thee, that it is not a mean thing, but a commandment, that we should take both forms, if we would take the sacrament. For it is not in our discretion to set up or tolerate anything in the church of God or in the divine service that cannot be defended by the word of God, and I am not a little vexed by this word, which is contrary to God: a middle thing, that is, with the very word of God.

1) The 8p66trum IVlonueüorum Fpirsusium, sung in elegiac verse by Georg Sabinus, is to be read in Ooswslin., tom. III, lol. 30. the meaning of the apparition should be:

I'tlsru Ovrinurios disoordia llsMS,

euouüutis

impirr

dsllu

(De

In this word I could easily make all the laws and ordinances of God mean things. For if one allows a middle thing in the word of God, in what way will one be able to prevent that everything does not become a middle thing? They may cry out and cry that the whole Church is condemned by us; we say that the Church is imprisoned against its will, oppressed by the tyranny of One Form, and for that reason to be excused, as the whole synagogue in Babylon was excused, because in its ecclesiastical customs and sacraments it did not keep the Law of Moses as in Jerusalem. For because of this it did not cease to be God's people, because they did not keep the customs commanded them, being captives and prevented by violence. But Eck wants him and his to be praised as the Church. On the other hand, we say that not the whole church is condemned by us, but that the whole word of God (which is more than the church) is rejected by them, because violence is done to the sacrament.

That the bishops have been restored to obedience and jurisdiction, and the common ceremonies, as you write, "yet beware, and give no more than ye have," lest we be compelled anew to a more difficult and dangerous war to defend the gospel. I know that you always exclude the gospel in these treaties, but I fear that they will accuse us of being faithless and fickle people if we do not keep what they want. For they will accept our concessions far, farther, and farther, but will make theirs scarce, scarcer, and scarcest.

In sum, I dislike the discussion of doctrinal union altogether, since it is utterly impossible, unless the pope wants his papacy to be abolished. It was enough that we gave an account of our faith and asked for peace; why do we hope to convert them to the truth? We have come to hear whether they approve of ours or not, and leave them free to remain as they are. And we ask whether they reject it, or know it to be right. If they reject it, what is the use of making an agreement with their enemies?

To strive for harmony? If they know it to be right, what need is there to retain the old abuses? But since it is certain that what is ours will be condemned by them, because they do not repent, and endeavor to retain what is theirs, why do we not see that whatever they undertake is a vain pretence and a lie? For it cannot be said that these things of theirs flow from the Holy Spirit, since with them there is nothing of repentance, nothing of faith, nothing of godliness. But the Lord, who began in you, will accomplish his work; to him I commend you with all my heart. August 26, 1530.

Grace and peace! I have seen and read the testimonies of yours concerning our cause. But what I write to Philip, the same I write also to you, that for Christ's sake, and for my sake, if I belong in anything to Christ, you will condescend to believe with all ours that Campegius is the one great and noblest devil. It cannot be said in words how I am aroused by the proposals that have been made by the other party, namely, since the devils ridicule and mock our cross in such a manner. This is the envelope of Campegius and the pope, that our cause should first be attacked by force and threats; if this way should not succeed, then it should be contested by intrigues and wiles. The violence and threats you have experienced, and the frightful future of the emperor you have endured; now you suffer the wiles and in truth these hooded monks who have crossed the Rhine at Speier; namely, the arrival of these brings these unions in doctrine

For what can the father of deceit and lies, the author of death and violence, do but use violence and deceit? But he that hath given you power to overcome violence, the same will give you grace and strength to overcome iniquity. But of this I have written to Philip and the prince; I had to send the messenger back in haste. But act manfully, and yield nothing to the adversaries, unless they prove it with clear Scripture. The Lord JESUS be with you, Amen. From the desert, August 26, 1530.

1060 Luther's Letter to Spalatin. August 26, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in Ooü. . len. d., lol. 225 d. and in Aurifaber, vol. ill, p. 86. Printed in Buddeus, p. 197; in Coslestin., iow. III, lol. 59 and in De Wette, vol. I V, p. 144. According to the latter we have translated.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his dearest brother in the Lord, M. Georg Spalatin, the disciple of Christ 2c.

Grace and peace in the Lord! I have a matter, my dear Spalatin, in which I call upon your service and your conscientiousness, namely, that you take care that this letter of our Prince addressed to me be credibly^ stamped with the Prince's seal and returned to me. For though it was enough that it was signed with the handwriting of the dear Prince, yet it gave me pleasure to accuse the Chancellor of negligence in sending the Prince's letter without the seal. For I remember that I too once wrote to the Prince without my name's signature, and since I had been so negligent, I was also reprimanded. But now I take my revenge with this unsealed letter; a sweet revenge! After my trust in your conscientiousness, I expect that this will be taken care of.

1) dona ückk is translated by "in secret" in the old edition.

I hear that you have begun a strange work, admittedly not gladly, namely, to unite the pope and Luther. But the pope will not want it, and Luther forbids it; see that you do not spend your effort in vain. If, then, both being unwilling, you will have accomplished the matter, I will immediately follow your example and reconcile Christ and Belial. But yet I know that you are not driven to this vain work by your own free will, but by chance, or rather by the hooded spectres of Speier. Christ, who has hitherto been your strength, will now also be your wisdom, that these Italian intrigues can do nothing against you. For evil counsel will be worst for him who gave it. Greetings M. Eisleben, D. Brenz, Schnepf, and all those who are ours. The grace of GOD be with you, Amen. From the desert, August 26, 1530.

Your Martin Luther.

1061. D. Martin Luther's Concerns about Several Articles in Dispute. End of August 1530.

This concern is found in German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 3936.; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 1116; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 238; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 165; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 65, p. 46; in Spalatin's Annals, p. 270, and in Chyträus, p. 135. Latin in Cölestin, vol. III, p. 376, and in Chyträus, p. 273. The timing is according to De Wette.

First of all, when our adversaries intend neither to indulge nor to yield, but to continue straightway, and to condemn us, as they have hitherto done in all things, nor have they ever shown themselves willing to accept the great offering, as we have often done to them, we do not see how any action can be taken. For we cannot act upon it, that all their things should remain whole, and ours be condemned; which hitherto hath been done too much, without all action.

For another.

But because Imperial Majesty wants to know what we want to let up, it is necessary to indicate from piece to piece what we can do or not do.

Of the articles concerning doctrine re.

We cannot deviate from these articles, for even our opponents have not shown any error therein, as can be clearly seen from their confutation and in the dealings that followed; they will also undoubtedly be considered Christian and right by all other nations. For they are not only well founded in the Scriptures, but are also powerfully proved by the Scriptures of the Holy Fathers. They are also so well established and so mild that no Christian can be offended by them. But if Imperial Majesty requests some pieces of explanation, as, äs sola lläs, äs satisfactiouibus, äs msritis sts. Then our part is at all times obliged to do the same.

Of the articles concerning the abuses.

First, to receive of both the form of the sacrament. From this article we cannot depart, because it is a divine ordinance, which Christ himself ordained, and it is not fitting for any man to change or alter God's ordinance, Gal. 3:15. It has been used from the beginning in the whole of Christendom for many hundreds of years, and is still a sign in the Greek churches to this day, and will and must remain in the world at least in some places, ns xsxiäat vsrbum Dsi, Rom. 9, 6. Also, our own condemnation confesses that [it] is so right, according to their handed over rotel 2c.

002 But that they desire that we should teach that it is not unlawful to give and to take the same form, we cannot do, for the reasons above stated. Neither has the law proved, either by holy scripture or by the sayings of the fathers, that such a thing may or ought to be done.

003 Further, that they desire that we should also give the same form among us unto them that desire it, neither can we do as they require without distinction, as if both were right. In our visitation we have also sufficiently reported how the weak may be given the same form, but we do not approve of it as right.

004 But that they say, Whether we will condemn all Christendom, which hath used one form as right, say we: First of all, God's word, command, and order must be considered more than the work, deeds, or omissions of Christianity. For God cannot lie or err in His word, but Christianity can err and err in its doings and omissions. Thus, Christianity is not a rule and measure over God's word, but God's word is a rule and measure over Christianity. And Christianity is not made by God's word, but God's word makes Christianity; for it is born of God's word, and is multiplied and preserved, as St. Peter says in 1 Peter 1:23: "Ye are born, not of corruptible seed, but of the word of God, which endureth for ever." And in case one should leave or deny one thing, one would have to deny Christianity before God's Word, since Christianity as a creature, created by God's Word, is inferior and inferior to God's Word, through which, as a Creator, it was created.

005 Secondly, Christianity is not condemned thereby. For just as the holy people of God were excused before God in time past for not keeping some of God's commandments and ceremonies, namely, because they were imprisoned in Babylon or elsewhere and were prevented from doing so, because unavoidable necessity and compulsion did not permit this, even Moses himself says Deut. 12:8. Moses himself says in Deut. 12:8 that they should not do in the land of Canaan as they did in the wilderness, nor had they been circumcised for forty years in the wilderness (Jos. 5:7): so God will also excuse the Christians who have used the same form until now, because they had to do it out of compulsion and necessity, since such abuse was forced upon them without their will by the spiritual tyrants, so that they did not know or could not do better. And therefore it is not the fault of Christendom, but of the tyrants and false teachers, who, by such sacrilege and abuse, have imprisoned and oppressed Christendom, and without the consent or connivance of Christendom have established such things, and introduced them by force.

6th Thirdly, Christianity is not condemned for this reason, whether it still has some faults or abuses in it, or (as St. Paul says Eph. 5:27.) "wrinkles and spots. It

It is far another thing to have sin or error, and another thing to be damned. Christianity cannot be without sin and error, but it is not condemned for that. St. Paul, who is one of the highest and holiest members, confesses in Romans 7:23 that he is a captive servant of sins, and yet he does not want to be condemned, Romans 8:1, where he says: "There is nothing condemnable in those who are in Christ Jesus.

007 Christ himself also taught his disciples to pray in the Lord's Prayer, saying, Forgive us our trespasses. And saith Matth. 6:12-14. unto them, "Therefore your heavenly Father will not forgive you your trespasses, except ye forgive your brethren their trespasses."

008 From which words it clearly follows, that the apostles have such faults as would condemn them, if they were not forgiven. And what need would there be of the apostles and all Christendom praying for the forgiveness of sins, if they had not such sins as needed forgiveness, and were damned without forgiveness? There need not be a saint on earth who can live so holy for a moment that he would not be able to pray the Lord's Prayer; otherwise the Lord's Prayer would be wrong in a saint, or at least for such a moment.

009 True, Christianity is holy, and cannot err, (as the article saith, I believe a holy Christian church;) but this is true, that so far as the spirit is concerned, it is wholly holy in Christ, and not in itself; but so far as it is yet in the flesh, it hath sin, and may err and be deceived. But for the Spirit's sake she is forgiven, and her sins are forgiven, because she believes in Christ, and confesses her sins (even the unconscious ones), Ps. 19:13, "Who knoweth all her faults?" So St. Paul himself teaches Rom. 7:8, 10, that our (that is, Christians') body is dead because of sin, but the spirit lives because of righteousness; freely confessing that all Christians are sinners and dead according to the body, and yet live according to the spirit in Christ.

010 So all Christendom erred in the beginning at Jerusalem, when they were eager to establish that the Gentiles must be circumcised, and commanded to keep the law of Moses, or they could not be saved.

which is contrary to the main article on which Christianity stands, namely, that we must be saved by Christ and his grace alone, without law and circumcision, as St. Paul there barely obtained with difficulty. What wonder then, since Christianity was not so high and rich in spirit, that it sometimes erred and failed, and yet remained holy through the forgiveness of sins, as well as those.

011 But such errors and falsities of Christianity, after they are revealed, are not to be approved, nor defended for articles of faith; for that would be contrary to the Holy Ghost, who reveals such things, and henceforth would not be a Christian or vain sin, but a hardened and devilish delusion.

From the Spiritual Marriage

We cannot agree to any way that marriage should be forbidden to anyone, which God Himself created and commanded, and the doctrine that forbids this is called the doctrine of the devil, 1 Tim. 4:1-3.

From the private fair.

We cannot allow them to be restored, or to suffer them to be restored, because it is a matter of public record that such masses, which have hitherto been held, are a public abuse and idolatry. For they hold it thus, that it makes pious both him who holds it, and him for whom it is held, as an opus operatum et applicatum, which yet strives clearly against the chief article of faith in Christ. Neither can they themselves deny that for this reason such masses are instituted and sold all over the world, and to this day they seek nothing else with them but the belly and mammon, which would all have remained if the mass had not become a work.

From Canon.

001 Then we cannot suffer either small or great canon, for both canons make the measure of such works, in express words, to make us godly, and also to be sacrificed for others, as is now said above; which then is openly contrary to the doctrine of faith, and blasphemes the passion of Christ, just as if Christ had not sufficiently redeemed us by his blood, and we must first seek and purchase it by works and masses.

(2) But that they want to palliate the Canon with glosses, and interpret the word snorilleium, sacrifice, as a sacrifice to memory, may not help them. For where the Mass is to be an opus operatum st upplieutuui, as they pretend, the Glossa is in vain, even wrong for it. But if the Glossa is to be right, the Mass must not be an Opus operaturu, and so either the Canon overthrows the Glossa, or the Glossa the Canonem. For the Glossa and the Canon may not both exist at the same time, because the Canon clearly asks that God should reconcile such 1) sacrifice (as they say) of the memory, and all of us for whom it is done.

(3) About this, it is public and certain that the Canon is not the holy Scripture, but everyone must confess that it is a new thing, which arose long afterward, and it is uncertain who the master is, nor are they the same everywhere. For St. Ambrose's Canon, which the Archbishopric of Milan holds, is very different from the Roman Canon. So the Greeks also have other canons than we do, and they are not the same among themselves.

004 Because there is no holy scripture here, and the canons are nowhere all alike, from which it must be known that it is human and not divine order; why then should it be held so strictly as if it were the one eternal word of God, because men who act apart from and without holy scripture may well err and miss. And whosoever will read the Canon, he shall find told of some saints who lived long after the time of the apostles; and as many as are named therein are told, that by their merit and intercession God may be gracious to us. What honor the canon does not give Christ, that he should be our mediator and intercessor, to whom it is primarily due, but must allow himself to be sacrificed, and besides this the saints suffer our intercessors and mediators in his stead. And the priest may wonderfully pray for Christ, that God would be gracious to His Son Christ through such sacrifices, which is an unpleasant abomination.

1) So Spalatin; in the other editions: such.

From the unfinished monasteries

We will gladly consent that the people who are in them shall remain and be provided with food and protection, as has been done from time immemorial; but that their masses and other ungodly things should be administered and protected is contrary to the aforementioned articles. For if it were granted that they should keep their rules and visit their parishes, it would follow that the masses and canons should be confirmed, and they would have to help to prevent those who wished to leave, and to permit them to proceed against those who do so. And if someone appealed to the authorities for advice and help to get out, the ways would be closed to him.

From the disposed monasteries.

Wherever Imperial Majesty would command Majesty would command that the persons be reinstated and administered according to their rules, we will certainly permit that they be reinstated and maintained in monasteries. But we cannot agree to administer their rules and masses (as mentioned above), because the same would follow that which has been said about the monasteries that have not been discharged.

Wherever Imperial Majesty If His Majesty should immediately command that persons be appointed, or if he himself should appoint and protect them, we must let His Majesty do and accomplish this, but we cannot consent to it; His Majesty is sovereign, and may accomplish it on his own conscience; in such matters, however, our conscience shall not be equally burdened with his.

From Jurisdiction.

It is a vain thing to deal with jurisdiction. For if they will not suffer us, and forbear nothing, but will straightway condemn us, we cannot expect any jurisdiction from them, except from the Master Hansen. It is true that if they would suffer our doctrine, and no longer follow it, we would not do them any harm in their jurisdiction, dignity, or whatever they call it. For we certainly do not desire to be bishops or cardinals, but only good Christians, who should be poor, Matt. 5:3 and Luke 4:18.

2)            Thus            Spalatin.            Wittenberg,            Jena            and            Erlangen:            "prediciren".

Of matrimonial matters.

Always away with these things to bishops, officials, executioners, and whoever wants them. But it is to be expected that they will not want to accept one piece without the other.

Of meat dishes and celebrations.

(1) We cannot suffer consciences to be burdened with this, as St. Paul also declares, and yet it is to be presumed that they will not accept it otherwise than by burdening their consciences. If, however, it is considered good that the imperial majesty should be notified that the latter should establish an order in this matter, but without entangling the conscience, we may well suffer this, especially since they themselves no longer keep the fasts, according to 2) the Canonum.

1062 Luther's letter to the Elector John that one cannot accept the means proposed by the adversary.

August 26, 1530.

The original of this letter is in the common archive at Weimar. Printed from it in Cyprian's Supplements to his Hist. of the A. C., p. 105; in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. 1. grace and peace in Christ, most noble prince, most gracious lord! I have received E. C. F. G.'s writing, together with the two copies of both parts of the committee. And since E. C. F. G. has requested my objection to it, I hereby inform you of the same. And first of all (as our part also did) that part's proposed condition or means is not to be suffered at all, and I am almost surprised that such a thing has been proposed.

1) Thus Spalatin. In the other editions: that.

2) Thus Spalatin. Wittenberg and Jena: "aussatzung".

turn. But on the Our Part article that is my good opinion:

That the adversaries desire us to teach that one form of the sacrament is also right, and should not be commanded but indifferent, and free to use both forms 2c., E. C. F. G. well know that one of our chief things is that one should neither teach nor do anything, unless certainly grasped by God's word, lest we (as Paul says) run uncertainly and do wrong. For there is trouble enough, if we walk in the word, that we may abide. So it is certain that one form of the sacrament is a mere finding of man, and not at all confirmed by the word of God, but the opposite, that is, both forms are confirmed by the bright and clear word of God. Therefore we cannot agree nor teach that one form is right. For it is written in Christ, Matt. 15:9, "They serve me in vain with the doctrine of men. Without what else is there to make void the word of Christ, which he so earnestly commanded, Do this in remembrance of me 2c.

002 Neither do they themselves believe that it is indifferent: for they have burned, driven out, persecuted, and condemned many things for great heresies. Therefore, not only for God's sake and ours, but also for theirs, we must not allow it to be indifferent. For in so doing we should reproach them as murderers and evildoers, who would have condemned and persecuted an indifferent thing for heresy. Since they themselves do not believe that it is true, we can much less teach it, unless they recant and bring back all those whom they have persecuted for it.

003 And it is a good thing that they complain, saying, They cannot keep the people, except we teach them that they are right. Such a wise cause I like to hear. Just as if God had to have his word taught, that they should keep their people, and remain tyrants.

(4) The same is to be said of the angle measures. For they also are the feet of men, arising without the word of God, without which there is abuse. But that they pretend, they will not compel that we should raise them up, but that we will not hinder them. We forbid them nothing, but that

1416 Erl. 5t, 190-192. sect. 8. of the select committee. No. 1062. w. xvi. 1711-1713. 1417

But if we should approve it, we cannot do it. For where some works of men are admitted, the others must also be admitted. Therefore this is the next way; if we admit the angular mass, we may straightway leave off the whole gospel, and accept the vain works of men. For there is no cause why one man's work should be accepted, and not all; and he that hath forbidden and condemned them all hath also forbidden and condemned one.

005 That they say that the princely office does not seek to oppose it, we know very well, that the princely office and the preaching office are not the same, and that a prince ought not to do it. But the question now is, whether a prince, as a Christian, will grant this; and the question is not, whether he acts here as a prince. It is a different question whether a prince should preach, or whether he should consent to preach. It is not the prince, but the Scripture, that is to prevent the preaching of the divine office. Whether a prince will submit to the Scriptures or not, that is up to him; no one on earth can force him to do so.

(6) Of the canon, whether it is to be suffered, with quite a gloss? Yes, if it were up to a good interpreter in this matter, I would have glossed over the Turks' faith long ago, and brought all unbelievers to the Christian faith. It is well known how they have sold the masses as a zaoriüeium and 0PU8; now they want to gloss it. But summa, it is also a little human feeling that one cannot stand in God's things, and is dangerous and annoying to that end. And because they abstain from these things, and hold with us from the mass, that it be not a saoi-iüoium: what need is there that they should retain the vexatious word, if it be without necessity, and dangerous to it? Now one ought not without necessity to set out on a journey, for that is forbidden, and is called tempting God. St. Augustine speaks: ^6N6Lt 86nt6ntiam, oorriZat lioAunm; and speaks of the word l'atum; says, he who understands l'atum pro äoeroto vei, understands it right. But he will not suffer the word, and saith, OorriZat linAus-m. Shall we yet raise up dark and uncertain words, and may hardly abide in the bright clear words?

007 Neither doth it avail to leave the word zaoriüoium in the eanono; for the canon without which the mass is so clearly declared to be a true sacrifice that no one can interpret or understand it otherwise than that the mass is a sacrifice. For in other words, it says that God would have such a sacrifice of the sacrament brought up by his angel's hand before his divine altar; which cannot be interpreted to mean that it is a memorial of Christ's suffering, for this must be done through the sermon. And in short, the canon of the Mass <sup>1)</sup> asks that God would permit such a sacrifice to please him, and yet it is the body and blood of his dear Son, as if a man had to forbid Christ against God. This is blasphemous and shameful, and the Canon is not to be suffered.

008 Finally, we will suffer all things, and yield all things that are in our power. But that which is not in our power we pray, that they desire it not from us. But that which is the word of God is not in our power. And that which is instituted for worship without the word of God is not in our power to accept. For this reason we cannot accept the fasts and celebrations that are obtained, except in so far as they are set up by worldly authorities as a worldly order. For that is called all worldly which is adorned with ceremonies, as garments, offerings, fasts, and feasts, since God has subjected such things to reason and commanded that it may act freely with them, Genesis 2. For it is an earthly thing, and a being on earth, which is all under reason by the word: Vominamini toiiaö. Now because worldly authority is the highest work of such reason, it can create and command in it.

(9) I will now answer E. C. F. G. in haste to these questions. Orders hereby the same in God's grace, Amen. On Friday after Bartholomew s26. Augusts Anno 1530.

B. Of the report made to the Emperor on this action by the Roman magistrates therefrom, August 22nd, and what was said in opposition thereto by the

The opposite has been remembered.

1063. report of the papists of the amicable action between their and the protestiren the Estates Committee, held in religious matters at Augsburg, Anno 1530.

This account is found in Chyträus according to the German edition, p. 357, and according to the Latin, p. 239; in Oo6l68tiuu8, tow. III, toi. 42; in Müller's Hft., 11b. III, 6Lp. 29, p. 775; and in Cochläus, äo aati8 6t scriptis l'utb. aä anii. 1530., x. 198.

The action began on August 16 at two o'clock after noon, since first the Imperial Estates Committee reminded the protesters of five things.

For now, that the action be taken without bickering and disputation, with friendly conversation on both sides.

On the other hand, that everything be done in an unrestricted and unrestrained manner, and that everything be brought to the imperial estates, and then through them to the Roman imperial majesty.

Third, that nothing contrary to the Christian Catholic faith or common peace be done therein.

Fourth, that the opposite will behave obediently according to the Roman imperial majesty's answer, 1) as in accordance with the holy Scriptures and the church.

Fifth, that the acts of such deliberation be communicated to no one but those concerned.

Into these five articles the other part's decrees have granted (?) although they complained somewhat about Imperial Maj. Maj.'s answer that they were not handed over to them, which nevertheless, as often as it is necessary, is not denied to them. After this receipt, the articles of the handed over Confession were acted upon differently and properly the same evening.

The first article, of the Trinity of Persons, and Unity of the Divine Being.

In this article there is agreement, and on both sides of the Manichaeans, Valentinians, Arians, Simonians, Mahometans, Samosatians, old and new errors and heresies are cheaply condemned.

1) By this "answer" is to be understood the confutation.

2) This is untrue; see the following number.

The other, of original sin.

In the other article, of original sin, they agree with us, and cheaply condemn the Pelagians and others, as Zwinglians and Anabaptists, who deny original sin. But in the description of what original sin was, they did not agree with us. In the end the Lutherans compared themselves with our opinion, and said that original sin is a defect of original righteousness, which sins are taken away in baptism, but the tinder and evil desire remain in man even after baptism.

The third article, of two natures in Christo.

In this article one is equal, by virtue of the Symboli Apostolorum.

The fourth, of faith.

Since it was said that faith is the means of salvation, we did not want to admit that faith alone makes one righteous and saved, since even the apostle St. James did not admit this. Therefore we have agreed that we should be taught that we are justified by faith. But not by faith alone; for this is nowhere found in divine holy Scripture, but rather the contrary. We have therefore compared that the word sola is not needed, but that justification or forgiveness of sins is by grace (per Kratiām Kratum kaoisntsm) and by faith in us, and by the word and sacraments as instruments.

The 5th article, of the holy office of preaching; [gospel] and sacraments.

The Anabaptists, who despise the outward preaching of the word, are condemned.

6. of good works.

Here it is agreed that one must do good works, as God has commanded. But this explanation is made so that it is not said that faith alone makes one righteous, as stated in the fourth article above.

7. from the Christian church.

They are also at one with us in this matter, and unanimously confess that in the church here on earth there are not only saints but also sinners among them.

8. of the ministry of the wicked in the church.

In this also agree with us that even the ungodly, unbelievers, can administer the sacraments, and condemn cheaply the Donatists and the like, who pretend that the service of unbelievers is not to be used in the church.

9. of baptism.

Here, too, they are the same, and they reject the Anabaptists, who forbid infant baptism, and pretend that even without baptism the little children will be saved.

10. of the reverend sacrament of the altar

They agree with us that the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are truly present in the reverend sacrament of the altar. And for a clearer explanation it is added that the body of Christ is truly and essentially present.

11. from confession.

This article is moved to the 4th article, below from Abuses.

12. of the pieces of repentance.

After a long disputation, they finally agreed with us on this form: We do not refuse to set three parts of repentance, namely, repentance and the horror of our conscience over the sin we have committed; and secondly, confession, but in this part we must first of all look to absolution and believe in it. For no sin is forgiven unless we believe that sin is forgiven us only because of the merit of Christ's passion. The third part of repentance is satisfaction, that is, the worthy fruits of repentance. We also agree that sin is not forgiven for the sake of satisfaction, as far as guilt is concerned. But we do not yet agree that satisfaction is necessary for the forgiveness of sins, so far as punishment is concerned. But here they justly condemn the Anabaptists and Novatians.

13. the use of the sacraments

It is agreed that the sacraments are instituted, not only to be marks of Christians among other people, but rather to be emblems and testimonies of the divine will toward us.

14. of the church regiment.

This article has been moved to the seventh of the following articles of abuses.

15. of the ceremonies of the church.

This article is moved to the 5th, 6th and 7th subsequent articles of abuses.

16. of secular authority.

Here one is equal, and condemns cheaply the Anabaptists who forbid Christians worldly offices and violence.

Seventeenth of the last judgment.

Here they are equal, and condemn with equity the Anabaptists, who hold that the punishment and chastisement of the damned shall cease and come to an end.

18. of the free will of man.

Here it is agreed that man has free will, but without God's help he cannot thereby attain justification.

19. of causes of sin.

Here it is agreed that the cause of sin is the free will of the wicked, as devils and ungodly men.

20. Of faith and good works.

Here we agree that good works must be done, and that they are necessary, and that since they are done by faith, they are pleasing to God, and that God will reward them according to His promise. But whether our good works are meritorious, and how far we can trust in them, we have not been able to compare.

21. from the Holy Services.

In the 21st article, two points are compared, namely, that all the saints and angels in heaven pray to God for us. Secondly, that we keep holy and solemn the commemoration and feast of the saints, on which we pray to God that the saints' intercession may be of service to us.

But as to the invocation of the saints, they do not yet agree with us. They say that they do not forbid it, but since the Scriptures do not expressly mention the invocation of the saints, they do not want to invoke them, first, because the Scriptures do not command it, and secondly, because they think that great and dangerous abuses will result from it.

pt of the first part of the Fürsten Bekenntniß.

The first part of the Protestant Confession contains one and twenty articles, in fifteen of which they are in complete agreement with us, but in part in the others. For three of the articles are moved below to the abuses, namely, the 11th, 14th, and 15th articles. In three articles, too, they are in part divided, namely, in the 12th, 20th, and 21st articles.

The other part of the confession, from Miß- The Convention contains 7 articles.

On the 18th day of August, there was a great deal of discussion in various ways about how to deal with the seven remaining articles in dispute. It was finally unanimously agreed that all the points should be dealt with properly, but not each one in particular, as was done in the previous articles, but all of them at the same time. The Catholics would have preferred to act on the last articles first, because they feared that the action of both would soon be spread among the people. Since the Lutherans opposed this, however, the Catholics proposed in writings a moderation, but without restriction and without intervention, when all this was to be brought to the attention of the common estates of the Empire and then to the Roman Emperor's Majesty. For this reason, one began to deal with both forms of the sacrament as follows:

The middle way, which the Catholics proposed on the 19th day of Augusti.

That by permission of Papal Holiness or their Legate, with the knowledge and approval of the Roman Emperor's Majesty, as supreme Advocate of the Church, the administration and reception of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of JEsu Christ under both forms was granted and permitted to the Lutherans, but with the following measure:

First, that their pastors alone distribute the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ in both forms to their parishioners and to all those who desire it in the places where it has been in use for several years.

On the other hand, that this be done with preceding confession, as was the custom of old.

Third, that at Easter, and when the Sacrament is otherwise held, it is also taught among them that the reception of the Sacrament in both forms is not expressly commanded by God.

Fourthly, that they teach that the whole Christ is present and is received both under one form and under both.

Fifth, that they teach in their sermons that those who receive the sacrament of all things under one form of bread do not sin.

Sixthly, that they will always give, or cause to be given, to their subjects who desire it under one form alone.

The seventh is that the wine for the sick should not be kept in vessels, nor should it be carried to anyone in the streets, but that if anyone wishes to communicate in either form, it should be consecrated and distributed in the church or in the homes of the sick, under the office of the mass.

Lutheran's response the 20th of August.

They are content that the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord be received with prior confession. They also want pastors and preachers to speak peacefully about this until the next Concilii make a further decision.

They also confess that the whole Christ is present under the form of bread. They deny that any of them are forbidden to receive the sacrament under one form. Deny, likewise, that the form of wine is kept with them in vessels, or carried to the sick. Finally, they want to keep the reverend sacrament honestly with them, as before.

Since the Catholics further desired an explanation of certain obscure words, the Lutherans, after this act, Aug. 21, in their answer thus declared that, before receiving the sacrament, confession should be made by every communicant of the most noble sins, which are to weigh down his conscience to the highest degree, <sup>1)</sup> that he may ask help and consolation for it.

For the other, they declare themselves to believe that the whole Christ, true God and man, is certainly present under both forms, or under either.

Thirdly, they have also declared in their discourse that they do not condemn those who have taken the sacrament in a crazy time under one form, or who have received it to this day.

Item, they believe that those who communicate under one form do not do wrong. But they will not permit their own to do so. And so much has been said about both forms between the seven members of the council on both sides.

From this it is evident that there has been no great dispute or disagreement between the parties. For in this alone they disagree with us, that, though they believe with us that those who need one form do not sin, yet they will not permit their own to speak of it publicly in sermons.

And although they confess that the whole Christ is truly present under one form, yet they dispute that the Lord Christ commanded not only the priests, but also the laity, that they should receive both forms. Christ saith, "Drink ye all of it." But we have answered from the Gospel of St. Marci, "And they all drank of it." Which clearly shows that this was spoken to the twelve disciples who were at table with Christ, so that, if they were not stiff-necked, Christian unity could easily be achieved.

The other article. Of Spiritual Marriage.

For the sake of peace, the Catholics have handed over these means in writing: Although such priests, because of their vows and priestly ordination, which they accepted of their own free will, cannot enter into a lawful marriage, that nevertheless, in order to spare the seduced images of women, the nourishment of innocent children, the avoidance of all kinds of trouble and other movable causes, the priests who are at present in essential marriage, thus without confirmation and approval of their undertaking, would be tolerated until the future Concilio, but in such a manner and measure as follows: First, that they alone be tolerated in the places of worship, as has been customary for some time.

1) This is untrue; compare No. 1049, also the following number, in which also other forgeries are corrected.

Secondly, that no one may marry before the decision of the Council, and whoever does so may be deprived of his priestly office and benefices and expelled from the country or otherwise punished.

Thirdly, if anyone wishes to abstain from a married state, and to abstain from celibacy, he shall be permitted to do so, and shall not be denied it, and after his absolution shall remain in his benefice and office.

Fourthly, that also in the places where the reverend priests are, and especially where they are in the churches, diligence be taken to get others, as beneficial as this may always be, who are and remain reverend, and to promote them to the ministry.

Fifthly, that the spouses be deprived of their office and benefices, unless they obtain from papal sanctity or their legate tolerance to remain with their office and benefice.

It is also intended that the priestly concubinage should be completely abolished, and that it should no longer be tolerated by the ordinaries.

Lastly, it is also considered that it should be proposed in Concilio whether it would not be useful to allow husbands to be ordained to the priesthood, as was the custom in the first church some hundred years ago.

The opposite answer, handed over in writing.

First, they have referred us to their written confession, in which they have given sufficient reasons, as they suppose, why the marriage of priests is to be considered Christian and right.

On the other hand, they have reproached the manifold great vexations of the celibate priests, who live in public fornication, in order to avoid which they have permitted their priests to marry.

Thirdly, they say that the gift of chastity is given to a few, for which reason, after the death of the married priests, they will again accept others who are married.

Fourthly, they have confirmed their opinion from what we have just said about the Concubinate and the future Conciliar. No further action was taken on this matter between the deputies of both sides, for there was more dispute and disagreement here than there was about both forms of the sacrament. For this reason, these matters were left undecided and referred to the Imperial Estates and the Roman Emperor. Maj. Of the arguments, however, which they use in their confession, the following is written in Imperial Majesty John Paul II. Maj. Imperial Majesty's answer.
To be sure, the manifold aversions, so arising from the priestly con-

They reproach us unreasonably for the fact that we have previously granted the abolition of the same without it. But as to the gift of chastity, they are of too little faith, because they do not believe that God also will give it to those who ask him aright, since Christ says, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, it shall be done unto you." Item: "Believe, and ye shall receive."

The third article.

From the fair.

The Catholics have requested that the common and private masses on the customary feasts be held in ordinary dress, on the altars, with the inclusion of both the major and minor canons, as before, in the common Christian church of the German nation and its territories, as has been in use and practice from time immemorial. And lest a quarrel arise about the words Uostia, odlatio, sasritisiuin, or sacrifice, they have indicated a clear distinction between three things, namely, that Christ was figuratively sacrificed in the paschal lamb in the Old Testament, and that later the same Christ suffered on the trunk of the cross, offering Himself to God the Father a true sacrifice for the sin of men; but now and in the sacrifice of the Mass he is offered W^8tsrialitr st representatively, that is, sacramentally and commemoratively, in the Church daily, in remembrance and commemoration of Christ's suffering and death, once accomplished on the Cross.

Accordingly, the Mass is not a sacrifice, but a sacramental and memorial sacrifice.

The opposite answer, handed over in writing.

They want the masses on the usual feasts to be held in customary church clothes, and because in their principalities and lands (as they report) the mass has hitherto been held honestly with all the essentials and customary ceremonies, after the institution of Christ, they want henceforth finely that they also be held with due reverence.

But since the Catholics asked for further explanation of the major and minor canons, and of private masses, they did not answer in writing. But in the conversation, when they were asked why they did not want to accept the holy Canon, they put forward three main reasons:

First, that we make it a mortal sin to omit the Canonem at Mass.

Secondly, because he confirms the sacrifice of the Mass.

Thirdly, that the saints be called therein.

To this again is recently and catholically answered:

First of all, whether it be truly a mortal sin fei to sleep the Canonem, yet it is not written in the Canons.

For another, that in the Mass a sacramental and memorial sacrifice fei, they themselves also cannot deny.

Thirdly, the saints are not invoked in the Canon, but only their remembrance is kept; but they have above agreed with us that the remembrance of the saints should be kept in the church. For this reason there is no great dispute about this article; yet they both stubbornly reject the Canon and the Private Mefse, even though they have no just cause to do so.

The fourth article.

From confession.

The Catholics have presented nothing about confession in their writings. For they have twice before spoken of it, namely, in the 12th article, in the parts of penance.

Item, afterwards at the Communion under both forms.

But the opposite party remembers them especially in the writings which they present to the Catholics, with more explanation than is written in the confession. For this reason, we have added three points:

First of all, confession should not be abandoned, considering the great comfort that absolution brings.

Secondly, that from this it may be considered how high and wholesome is the power of the keys.

Thirdly, that the people might be accustomed to confess their sins, besides being instructed that even sins which are not confessed may be forgiven.

Therefore it is unnecessary to deal further with these pieces between the parties.

The fifth article.

Of human statutes.

The Catholics in general have requested that with fasting, holidays, confession, prayer, procession, church ceremonies, differences in food and times, and other such customs that have been customary up to now, and the distribution of the sacraments, everything be kept by the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen as it has been customary in the Catholic Church from time immemorial. On this the counterpart answered in writing in particular to two articles: first of ceremonies, then of holidays.

For this reason, they say at the beginning that the common ceremonies are to be held for the sake of love, so that equality in churches, conducive to peace and unity, may be preserved. However, that no one's conscience be burdened with them, and that such ceremonies not be held for necessary religious services, but that everything be done properly for the sake of love and peace.

On the other hand they want that the following certain time no meat is to be eaten publicly: namely in the soft fast, all Friday and Saturday, on the holy Christ evening, on Pentecost evening, on St. Johannis the Baptist evening, on all holy evening.

Third, they complain that the forty-day fast is too long, which they would rather have distributed to other times of the year. Nevertheless, during this time, as much as possible, one should conform to other churches with ceremonies, hymns, gospels, and epistles, as sung, read, and preached in other churches; they also do not want to allow any meat to be sold publicly to their own.

As for the feast days, first of all they want the ordinary feasts to be kept solemn, so that the people may remain in the habit of hearing God's word and receiving the sacraments, each according to his own conscience.

Secondly, that especially these following feast days be kept holy and solemn.

All Sunday.

Christmas Day.

St. Stephen's.

St. John, Apostle and Evangelist.

The Lord's circumcision.

Epiphaniä, the holy three kings.

Charwoche, by reason of the passion of the Lord.

Easter Day, together with Monday and Tuesday.

The noblest feasts of the pure virgins

Mary's.

Ascension of Christ.

Feast of All Apostles.

The Holy Pentecosts, together with Monday and Tuesday.

Thirdly, on such feast days one should keep and use ordinary chants, officia and lectiones, taken from divine holy Scripture.

Fourthly, one should sing and keep the litany during the week of the cross, so that the people may be provoked to prayer.

The sixth article.

Of monastic vows.

Here the Catholics have first of all requested that all monasteries, which have not yet been devastated, be left in their lands and territories, with their old worship and order.

Secondly, that they be allowed visitation, due obedience, and free election of prelates, peaceably, without hindrance.

Thirdly, that no one be forbidden or discouraged either to enter the monasteries anew, or, after he has left them, to return to them.

Fourthly, that the monastics may travel in the country with their bodies and goods, safe and unoffended, for the sake of their business, until the decision of the future Concilii.

Fifth, that those who have escaped without lawful permission shall return to the monastery, and shall not be tolerated anywhere in their territories, unless they have obtained permission from the clergy and their overlords.

Sixth, that their prelates shall not be hindered in ordinary legal proceedings against them, but in respect of the multitude no other punishments shall be inflicted upon them than only an imposed penance. Those who leave the monastery without proper permission shall be punished according to their statutes and canons, and their prelates shall be unhindered in the execution of these punishments.

Seventhly, that the vacant monasteries be again filled with monks and nuns, but where these could not be had, the goods and annual income shall be enjoined by decree of the next prelate of the places unchanged and undiminished, and shall be retained until the future council. And the monastery estates shall not be used for the own benefit of the secular authorities, but as soon as they are again occupied by monks and nuns, all use and pensions shall again be given to them as before.

The opposite is the answer of the monks.

First of all, they refer to their handed over Confession.

On the other hand, they want to leave the monks and nuns who are still in monasteries in their principalities and territories free to go there or to remain there.

Thirdly, they want the monastic people to remain quiet in their ordinary manner, dress and ceremonies.

Fourth, they also want, as much as possible-

The king shall prevent all use of force by such persons, and shall see that they are not overcharged or subjected to violence.

Fifthly, they want that the rents and goods of the monasteries which have been disposed of shall remain in the order and power of the secular authorities, so that the persons, preachers, parishes and schools which have been evacuated may be maintained from them until the future Concilio.

The seventh article. Of church violence.

The Catholics here have generally requested that episcopal power and jurisdiction in their lands and territories remain inviolable to the bishops. However, as far as public abuses and complaints are concerned, the princes want to keep in line with the other "imperial estates" and consult with them about this, and accept what is decided in the common council. If, however, they have any objection to the archbishops, bishops, or prelates on account of jurisdiction or other causes, they shall not be prejudiced by this act.

The opposite answer.

First of all, they permit that episcopal rule and authority be retained by the bishops; but they do not approve of the public abuses, that the bishops are negligent in the preaching of the divine word, in the administration of the holy sacraments, in the ordination of priests and the supervision of their lives, and in the abuse of the ban.

Secondly, they want to ensure that the bishops receive and maintain their due obedience; namely, that the parish priests and preachers are presented to the ordinaries in every place, and that the bishop is permitted to punish the priests who have committed criminal excess.

Thirdly, that the bishops may retain their ecclesiastical jurisdiction in matters belonging to the ecclesiastical court. However, they shall refrain from common debts which do not belong to the ecclesiastical court, and the other estates shall remember this in abuses, which they are determined to maintain evenly until the future Council.

Fourthly, that the episcopal excommunication, in matters belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall not be prevented, so far as it is exercised according to the holy Scriptures.

All this, as it happened, was handed over to the princes and sovereigns and the Holy Roman Empire on the 22nd day of the month of August by the decreed Catholics, and publicly read out.

1064. recollection and report of the relation set before, of the papist committee, as this is corrected by the protesting committee.

At Chyträus, Cölestin and Müller at the locations indicated in the previous number.

In some places of the objected relation the whole disputations have not been told, which complains us highly and manifold, and darkens the whole trade somewhat.

In the entrance they state that among other things we also grant that we (as is desired) Roman Kais. Majesty. Answer, as conformable to the Holy Scriptures. For the sake of this article, we have publicly complained that we are not in conformity with Imperial. Majesty. We have publicly complained that we cannot conform to the answer of the Roman Emperor, since we have not seen the same answer.

In the fourth article, of justification by faith, they declare that it is thus compared, that we are justified by faith, but not by faith alone, because this is nowhere found in holy scripture, but rather the contradiction. For we have openly contradicted, and have drawn on the sayings of Rom. 3, "without works. And to Eph. 2: "It is the gift of God, and not of works." Further, after a long disputation, our opponents have conceded that the forgiveness of sins does not come through works or merit, either preceding or following. They have also said that it is obtained by faith; and more, that it is by grace, through which we have a gracious God, per ſrutium Zrutum kaeisntörn; they have also added the sacraments.

Since they yielded to this, we said that by the word sola we exclude not grace and sacraments, but works alone. And if they would allow that forgiveness of sins should come through faith, not for our own sake or for the sake of works and merit, we do not want to quarrel about the word so/a. This addition has also been made to our article, that we confess that the forgiveness of sins takes place by grace, which makes us pleasing in the sight of God, and through faith in us, and through Word and Sacrament, as instruments.

The princes of both parts easily remember that things are going wrong.

Concerning the invocation of the saints, the handwriting of the Chancellor of Baden shows that both parts agree that there is no explicit command and commandment of invocation of the saints in divine holy Scripture.

In the other part, concerning abuses, they say that we have allowed that everyone who wants to receive the Sacrament of the Lord must confess the most noble sins he has committed. But we have never made it necessary to tell the sins. But what we have conceded for the sake of confession is to be seen from the writings handed down.

After this, of both forms of the Sacrament, it is not mentioned how and in what form we have excused those who used one form. And in such brevity it is spitefully stated that we do not want to teach that those who receive the sacrament under one form do not sin.

Whoever, then, merely reads this, may think that we approve of the One Form, and yet, either from hatred or from other unjust causes, do not want to confess it in public sermons.

But we have both by words and writings manifoldly declared ourselves, how we have excused them that have received affliction of one kind or another, which may be many and various.

But with this we have not approved the prohibition of the other form. Nor do we complain about teaching in this way that we excuse the church, and yet do not approve the prohibition of one form. Thus ours have always written and taught that they have excused the church so that they would not weigh down the consciences of the blessed.

Of the celibate state of priests.

Here the words are used spitefully: "As for the gift of chastity, they are of too little faith that they do not believe that chastity can be given by God to anyone who asks for it. We, however, do not deny that God can give this gift of chastity, but have thus answered that God has presented these means and medicines which those who cannot abstain should use. For Christ himself testifies that this gift does not happen to everyone. For this reason, the one who does not have the gift of chastity, and yet does not need God's order, is tempted by God. God is able to sustain life without food, but in the meantime He wants us to enjoy food. For this reason, it appears publicly here that this matter has not been reported honestly and impartially.

From the private fair.

Concerning the private masses, they have never mentioned any reasons why they do not approve of them. For this reason, it is also unfair of them that we reject the private mass and canon without substantial reasons. We, however, have many and very important reasons why we cannot and will not approve the private mass and a part of the Canon. However, in the confession handed down and before the committee, we have sufficiently explained that we keep the Mass with great reverence, and will retain the essential parts that belong to the Consecration. The other usual ceremonies and church dress are also used. But there is a common mass, in which the sacrament is administered in a Christian manner to some of the people who have been heard beforehand. But we reject private masses, which are held in such a way as to merit the forgiveness of sins ex opere operato, for it is evident that such an application is contrary to the righteousness of faith. For if the Mass, applied to this opinion, merits forgiveness of sins ex opere operato, it follows that righteousness comes not from faith but from works. Item, if now only in the mass the sacrifice for sin takes place, to what purpose then did the death of Christ serve, or is not the suffering and death of Christ sufficient for the payment of our sin? But we read in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "With One Sacrifice He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Therefore no sacrifice that atones for sins is to be sought outside of this. Item, Christ saith, "This do in remembrance of me." For this cause is the sacrament instituted, that we may remember the benefits which are given us in the new testament, namely, the remission of sins. But how can such a sacrament be useful to the dead, since the memory of Christ cannot be awakened in them by the priests? These and other grave causes move us not to approve the application of the Mass.

Moreover, we see how great abuses are involved. A large number of people say mass for the sake of their stomachs alone, even though St. Paul is terribly against all those who abuse this sacrament. For this reason, the bishops should provide proper counsel for such great abuses.

And because a part of the canon contains this application of the sacrament, which openly disputes the righteousness of faith, it is dangerous to read that part of the canon.

6. of the conversation which is morden in the geengerten committee of the six from August to the end of this month by both parties.

1065. presentation of the papal part at the learned assembly.

From Brück's History, p. 106, with Müller, litr. III, eup. 130, p. 801, at Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 292 from the Margravian Brandenburg Acts, pp. 236-240, somewhat more detailed. We have subsequently improved this document. The same is a lecture by the Chancellor of Baden.

Knowingly it would be that on their 1) part we would have been considered as separated from the church; they would like to act with the others of this part on the ways, so that such would be averted, but this could not happen otherwise, because if we were united on both sides of the doctrine, although up to a Concilio difference would be kept in ritidns ooolosiastoiis and church customs. For where one did not confess [one part from the other], 2) that both parts were taught rightly, voritg. 8 6äoi; if one would agree on the doctrine that nnitus tiäol exists, then it should be talked about and concluded immediately with the legate, who would have authority from the pope, from a certain time and place of a concilii.

Now, however.

I. For the sake of Communion

...yet three pieces wherein unequal faith would remain.

1) One thing, that it should be known in this part that the one form was not unjust; but this was still lacking, that one would permit or consent that it should also be taught and preached in this part that the one form was not unjust. This would cause great concern to many, because this part would know what had been done with the Bohemians in the Concilio at Basel.

2) The other point is that one would not allow the Sacrament to be administered in one form in this part. Therefore, since the administration of one form would not be unjust according to doctrine and teaching, 3) it should also be safe in our parishes.

1) "their" put by us according to Förstemann instead of: "unsern" in the old edition.

2) Inserted by us after Förstemann, for easier understanding.

3) "wrong" put by us instead of: "right" in the old edition.

The church is to be a place of worship for pastors and ministers, to be given in one or both of these forms to those who desire it.

3) The third point would also depend on the doctrine, for the sake of the honorableness of the Sacrament, that both sides agree [to administer the Sacrament to healthy people] 4) in no place but in the church. But for the sake of the sick, it should be held that they should be carried into the church, and there communicated; but if, for the sake of their weakness, they should be reported in the house, that the Sacrament should be brought to them, or that Mass should be said before them in the house on a portal, 5) and that those should communicate and say Mass who had not eaten nor drunk, so that no dishonor should come to the Sacrament.

II. Because of the mass.

As for the masses, they noted that we were the same in that they should be held with honest ceremonies, but for the sake of the unity of the church it would be good and necessary that the masses, both public and private masses, be held as in other places. They thought that there would be no difficulty in this part of the small canon, but that we would have difficulty in the large canon, in that which concerns odlutlonom pro Doolosia, saoriüoimn oto. But they had made a good declaration in the previous committee 6) that in it, in their opinion, we would also have no complaint, but as far as the application of the mass is concerned, that this would be referred to a concilium on both sides.

III. because of the clerical marriage

In this part it might be considered that, although the reverend priests in our countries, territories, and cities were in the form of a conjugal state, yet they would give us to consider whether they should be held for marriage; for although it would be contrary to Scripture to forbid marriage, yet it would not be contrary to Scripture for a clergyman voluntarily to admit himself to the priesthood, to renounce the conjugal state, and to vow chastity. For it is true that chastity could not be commanded, but it might well be granted without a commandment; so that no one would have prevailed against him in the acceptance of his priesthood, if he could not keep chastity, that he would have reserved to him the right to take a wife, but every one would have kept silent, and let himself be called and accepted into the ministry according to the order of the church.

4) Supplemented by us according to Förstemann.

5) "Portatel" Tragaltar.

6) In the Committee

It would also be a bad thing for our priests to say that they do not have the grace of chastity; it was said that they strive little for it, for they want to feast, to drink, to live well, and to go to dances, to be in good spirits, as can be seen; they do not castigate themselves, and do not throw themselves into thorns, 1) nor do they have trouble with study, and yet do not need to have the opinion.

If it were true that they were also men, and not angels, it would not be so pure that one, even if he were a priest, would not have an infirmity; but it would be that the church would have to punish public sins, as in other infirmities; but what was secret would not be judged. And this they would have indicated to this part, that it was said that one was not guilty of having such priests, who led a sinful, lewd life.

If it had been said that there were as many priests in this part of the world as were needed to obtain the grace of chastity, it would also have been objected to which priest would have said that he had the gift of abstinence, if he knew that the married state would be free to him. We must consider how abominable it would be to the greater part of Christendom and of the estates, which would not have accepted or admitted such priests. If we were to follow the Scriptures, St. Paul would say, "Let a bishop be the husband of one wife," and it would be more advisable to accept an heir than to admit those who had entered the priesthood without marriage and then taken wives. They therefore wanted to have this indicated that it be done in the proper manner, so that this discrepancy might be remedied by a council, for [it is not to be expected] 2) that the Imperial Majesty and the other estates should grant, confirm, approve, or ratify [married priests]. They consider such priestly marriages to be impossible to raise. For Her Majesty and the Estates held without any doubt that the same could not have contracted our priests vulgarly, and that they would have to be deprived of their services, income, and office for a time. 3) Therefore, because Imperial Majesty would not approve the revered priests, or consider ratification of the right for nothing, whether this would be a way and could be obtained from Imperial Majesty. Majesty, that the above-mentioned ordained priests

1) Förstemann misleading: "thurn" f- Thurms.

2) For the sake of comprehension inserted after Förstemann.

3) In Förstemann more precisely: "suspQki are ab oKcũo et niinistrisio".

The first is that, for the sake of peace, priests who are married in the places where they are now may be tolerated until a council; but in such a way that those who wish to return from the supposed marriage and regrade may do so unhindered by the authorities under whom they are, and remain with their ministries and fiefs. And secondly, that the priests who are still single, without marriage, should remain unpardoned until a council. And thirdly, that the authorities should make every effort to obtain for the vacated parishes priests who are unchaste, and who will keep themselves chaste without trouble.

IV. Because of the monasteries.

For the sake of the destroyed and undestroyed monasteries and monastic persons, they have indicated that the undestroyed ones should remain undisturbed in the essence in which they still are, until a council, but that they should be left unhindered in their worship, and not be prevented from it, as happens in some places 5). And if they do not wear their monastic habit, they should continue to wear it.

Because there are also religious who have been expelled, or have gone out, and have desired to come in again, that such things may be granted them, without further punishment than a penitence; for the burdens of conscience are to be considered therein.

But with the abated monasteries they considered this a convenient means, that these monasteries, because they consider it reasonable that they are not to be used for any other service than the lands in which they are situated, nor [to be alienated,] 6) are to be placed in the hands of the Emperor. Majesty's hands and concerns, as it should be for the sake of these things until a concilium 2c. 7)

1066 The Protestants' oral declaration at the Papists' request.

This explanation is found in Brück's History, p. 109 and from it in Müller, p. 806. That it happened orally, we see from Heller's message in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 298.

4) "Lehen" is set by us instead of "Beneficio" in Förstemann and "Lehren" in the old edition.

5) In Förstemann: "wie Sannt Clären vnnnd Katharinen closter zu Nurmberg gesche".

6) Supplemented after Förstemann.

7) At the end there is the note by Förstemann that the chancellor had handed over a note about the bishops' power and the churches' ceremonies. In addition the remark that this note is no longer found in the Acts.

They had diligently considered the other proposals and concerns, but find that all the means and indications they had made extended in principle and effect to proposals that had initially been made by their part in the previous committee of the Fourteen. Now they would have heard sufficiently at that time why such proposals from this part could not be approved or permitted in such a way and in such a different way as would bring about their inconceivable counter-proposals. And since they have heard the committee of the fourteen touched on in the end, that in this part, for the sake of love and peace, up to a general, free, Christian concilium, one has offered oneself in the utmost, and salva fide et doctrina would not know how to offer anything else, they would therefore have provided themselves with more advisable proposals, after this committee and such further discussion had not been initiated by this, but by their part, as Electors, Princes and Estates, and had been applied to the Elector of Saxony. For since they had intended to persist in the same opinion, they could well have spared themselves and the lower classes this part of the effort, for if the words in their proposals had been changed, the substance of the opinion would have been the same as before.

I. About the Communion.

And that one should have confessed on this part, as if one had confessed, that the communion in one form was also not wrong, and lacked only in that, that we did not want to have the same preached, one did not confess, also would not want to be spoken of by them, and wanted to have this said in the notes and answer, which were handed over in the committee of the fourteen, which written handing over had also happened for this reason, so that the opinion of this part would not be reversed; Therefore one could not teach nor preach, as if the reception of one form were also right.

For this reason it is not permitted in our churches, except in cases of necessity, to administer the Sacrament in either or both forms, as each one may desire. Nor would any priest in office, with a burden on his conscience, teach and hold that Christ instituted the Sacrament in both forms for laymen and priests, and that each one, according to such divine order and commandment, is thus bound to receive it, and yet, outside of cases of necessity, contrary to doctrine, he should not be allowed to receive the Sacrament in one or both forms without difference, the Sacrament may be administered in one or both forms.

It would be easy for everyone to understand how a frightening and annoying separation this would give, if such a disgusting use were to be made in the churches of this part, but it would have been heard in touching counterproposals, since one out of freedom desired the Sacrament only in one form, that one would not prevent him from receiving it where he could get it.

II. from the mass.

Concerning the keeping of the public common and anglicized masses, the reported committee of fourteen heard why these, especially the anglicized masses, could not be held in this part, because it would be considered an opus operatum by them, nor could they have any other understanding with it. For if it were not considered by the sacristan to be a meritorious work, which would be of merit to him, he would not be allowed to celebrate such private masses with us, for the sacrament would be administered to him in both forms, as he enjoyed it in the private mass, if he desired it, which would also be safer for him according to the constitution 1); Therefore, if a priest wanted to say Mass for himself, he would have to consider something more in it, namely, that he did not say such Mass solely for the sake of remembrance, as instituted by God, but that he wanted to perform a meritorious work to wash away his sins with it, but that would be contrary to the institution of Christ, also blasphemous and annoying, and therefore not to be permitted in the lands and territories of this part, as a public blasphemy. If, then, he were to allow such his special private and angular measure to be a sacrifice for others, living and dead, it would be even more burdensome and unmistakable, since the sacrament is instituted so that the living recipients do it in remembrance of the Lord, and not so that the living or dead who do not receive it should have merit or remission of sins. And such an admission of the same private fairs would work evil and sin, if they were to be established in this part of the land and territory, so that the people might be deprived of the highest treasure of divine gifts and Christian liberty, namely, that men through faith should believe in Christ, and his suffering, death, and resurrection, and that they might be saved.

1) "Institution" put by us instead of "Instruction" in the old edition.

(1) his merit, even without works of the law; and secondly, that he would again be deprived of the reception of the sacrament in both forms after the institution of Christ. And not only would those sin before God and his Holy Spirit who kept private masses contrary to the known truth, but also those who, as a public blasphemy, suffered it unpunished and unpunished. And do nothing that the dispute should be postponed for the sake of application until further decision of a concilii, for that such private masses are not consecrated in God's word, but contrary to it, could not be put in doubt by this part. Therefore, if they were admitted, and if the disputation were suspended for the sake of the application, it would still have the weight on it, as indicated above. For it would be the same thing as the jurists say, "A protestation, or condition, which is contrary to the work and the fact, is of no use to the Protestant, and has no effect. Therefore, if the same angular masses were permitted on this part, and it were protested that the application was not granted, but that it should be suspended until a council, the act would be utterly contrary to the protestation, and would not secure this part's conscience, since the same masses would have no effect or meaning with the popes themselves outside the application in question. And for this reason it is further added that, since private masses have fallen by the doctrine of the true divine institution of the sacrament in this part's lands, territories, and cities, that they should be left there until a council, and that, for this part's part, such unnecessary, seductive, and careful private masses should be suspended until the said council; In addition, it would be known, and would not fail to be known, that the priests who were in this part of the lands and territories would hold such private masses more, for which reason it would also be a quite unnecessary disputation and delaying of affairs to argue about the admission of such private masses. And in the same way as the canon, great and small; for as much as the canon contains in it as the substance of the public and common masses, would be used in the public and common masses, which would be held with some Christian and good ceremonies in this part, namely the words of institution, the other would not be sudstavia, as the gloss itself testifies in decrees. Therefore let us

1) In the old edition, "to" - without. - The "to be" immediately following is of the people's merit. The other part also does not make necessary that which is not instituted by God's command, and therefore would not be necessary. And the more one presses for the acceptance of the canon, the less one could do it on this part, as St. Paul did not want to have Timothy circumcised, because it wanted to be put on and insisted on as a necessary thing, when he had Titum circumcised out of love and for the sake of weakness. And whether it be said then that it should be done for peace and more unity of us, yet that which concerns the Application and the Eunonsm iri^stierrii would be quite vexatious to the Christian doctrine and institution of the Sacrament, and, for the sake of conscience, Therefore it would be considered that the other part would be more obliged to bear with this part until a concilium, than to accept the canon with difficulty and uncertain conscience as proposed. In addition, the Christian congregations in this part's principalities, lands, and territories would have no lack of private masses, because they would fall and the public masses would be held in contrast; therefore, the three deputies of this part would not be able to consider what it would take for these masses, together with the omission of the canon, to be thoroughly performed until a concilium.

III From the priest marriage.

As for the marriage of priests, it is not to be denied that some priests, before they were ordained priests, might have accepted the laws of the popes and bishops concerning chastity, which happened to them before the time, when they did not yet know the truth and freedom against such and such statutes of men, Whether or not the popes, bishops, and prelates have done right and well in entangling the priests with laws and vows of the celibacy, and in keeping them without marriage, since they themselves keep chastity least of all, would have been sufficiently indicated in this part of the Confession, under the titles of Priestly Marriage, item, Bishops' Authority; and not only would we know that the popes and bishops did not have the power nor the right, according to divine Scripture, to deprive the priests of marriage, but also that a man, by vows, since he does not receive from God the grace of chastity, cannot commit himself to chastity.

2)            "before"            put            by            us            instead            of:            "of"            in            the            old            edition.

would like to bind. If in the case of the pagans, and in their rights, the vows and obligations were of such a magnitude that there was no such danger to consciences and souls as in this case, that the pacts and vows, which were disgraceful, and therefore much more sinful or impossible, were not observed, why should not such disgrace, sin, and impossibility be regarded in this case, and, regardless of such vows, the priests be permitted to marry? So also it would be a bad thing for priests to take the priesthood on such vows as their prelates required of them, for, as before indicated, whether the priests also acted imprudently, that, contrary to their consciences, they took such vows at the time they were ordained priests, the time they were ordained priests, yet the popes and bishops have done much more wrong and evil, that they have charged the poor priests with the same impossible and shameful vows, contrary to the words of Christ, that chastity was not given to all, item St. Paul, that it were better to marry. And especially because they found it well known among themselves, in the great parts of the priesthood, how evil such vows and entangled chastity were in the whole world, even now in broad daylight: and yet the popes, bishops and prelates would not want to escape their constitutions, to praise God, and the poor burdened consciences of the priests, but God's order would have to give way to their human impossible law. And because of this, little responsibility would be required for the report that the priests of this part should strive little for chastity, for there would be little to say about their dancing or good living in this part, nor would it have been heard; and if their preachers and priests were dancing in some assemblies, and were happy in goodness and respectability with other people without trouble, they would not be accused of anything, nor would it be contrary to God. But how the priests of the other part, since they should have remained without marriage, practiced all this to fornication and noticeable vexation, as unfortunately still happens, and were advised by the studio, that they knew nothing, nor could in the Scriptures, or taught, that would be in broad daylight. Nor is it desired of them in this part that they should be angels, for they and they were men; but that they should excuse their fornication, which was not only committed, but was for the most part open to the public, would be dreadful. For who would deny it?

that the greater part would not lie in public fornication, adultery, and such like fornication; and if there might still be some who could keep the saying, si non oasts, camouflage eaute, it would nevertheless be burdensome that cause for such secret fornication would be given them by the pope, bishops, and prelates, by forbidding marriage and entangling the vows of chastity, without necessity and without all Christian motive. And although the church may not publicly judge such secret sins, yet one would know what trouble and fear even secret fornication would bring to the priests if they had to say their masses. And if the same sins had been confessed and absolved, yet not only in the case of the openly fornicating priests, but also in the case of many who practiced such sin secretly, no right and true penitence and real remission of the same sins would have been found, but as often as they confessed, such vice would have been found again in confession, and public and secret fornicators would have remained one way after another, and would have condemned not only themselves, but also the confessors thereby. For, since confession is a Christian council with the priest and confessor, for the sins that are incumbent on men, what Christian counsel might such confessors have given the confessing priests? for it was enough that the sin was told to them with the mouth, without the heart, and that absolution was in like manner also spoken with the mouth. The blind man led the blind man, and both would have fallen into the pit and into damnation. The popes, bishops, and prelates, because of secret and public fornication, would have felt, known, and seen this in themselves and also in other poor common priests; nevertheless, the priests would have been put into such danger of eternal damnation with much-touched vows, and they would still want to keep them in it, since, according to God's order, it could be circumvented without all danger and sin. And whether such would be the office of a kind mother and of the church, of which they wanted to be the heads, everyone could very well hear. Yes, if it were said that the priests of this part, though they were married, would not all keep their marriages, but by their wives and adulteries would fall into more grievous sin than the priests who were not married, this would be contrary to St. Paul's command, without distinction, according to God's order, that every man should have his wife to avoid fornication. If, therefore, a married person should be afraid to commit adultery with another, that the same should commit sin.

If it were worse, God's order should have been laid down that it had not been wisely considered, but that it had been better that fornication had been permitted, so that no one might fall into adultery, as into a more grievous sin. Thus, by the grace of God, such. If the priests who were adulterated in this part had not yet experienced much fornication, then the attention in it would have been averted, if there had been any suspicion or talk that it would not have been suffered, and it would nevertheless be safer and more certain today that, according to God's order, the priests would have wives for the sake of avoiding fornication, whether one and perhaps another should fall into adultery, because that they should fall and lie and remain in fornication and adultery with great multitudes, as would be the case in the other part. For if the adulterer should fall once, twice, or more, he would have the remedy of his wife, and could rise again from the snare; but the rest would remain and persevere therein for ever, which would ever be pitiful, that for the sake of a useless human law so many men and fine people should be put to perdition. For if God had wanted to establish the priesthood without marriage, as the Scriptures indicate, it is certain that he would have bestowed the grace of chastity on those whom he called to it. But now that such a state has not been so instituted by God, the prelates should ever consider that the priests did not want to have the power to bind themselves to chastity with vows, just as if God gave them the grace of chastity through such free vows, so that they were entangled in what God had reserved for them by His special gracious gift against the innate carnal desires. If, however, the abominable vices of fornication and other immorality were not seen in the priesthood on this side, and that God had appointed the priests to be without marriage, then one would not want to have unmarried priests gifted with true chastity by God any less than on the other side. But because it would be otherwise, the prince, princes, and cities of this part would not want to entangle the consciences of the priests.

IV. From monasteries.

As far as the undischarged and discharged monasteries were concerned, it could be concealed that in the above-mentioned counter-proposals of the Committee of Fourteen so much had been indicated and offered that it was not possible to offer anything further; the three members of the Committee who had been appointed also wanted to provide themselves with this part of the committee in desperation if the same proposals were to be made. and hereditary offer, according to the taken parting, would be presented to Imperial Majesty. Her Majesty would not be displeased with this article, except for a concilium to be based on it. And if the abolished monasteries were to remain in the hands of Imperial Majesty. Majesty's [hands] 1) the necessity requires to hear how it should be held with the administration of the same dissolved monasteries, and whether the ceremonies, as they fall in the same monasteries, should also remain unestablished until a concilium or not.

V. Of the Bishops' Authority and Church Ceremonies.

And it was noted that, with respect to the other articles, and also with respect to the obedience to the bishops and ceremonies, basically nothing new or better had been proposed by them, as deputies of the other part, than what had previously been done in the Committee of Fourteen. For although the stated ways had been spoken in other words, it would still have been one thing in substance with the previous proposal, and not other, better, or new proposals.

And if they could not be heard by other and more convenient means, they considered it a futile delay of their own and other affairs, and thought it best that the six, who had been appointed by princes, theologians, and canonists to the previous committee, for the sake of the churl, princes, and estates, should report their churl and prince to the estates of all actions, and give an answer to the committee of this part by virtue of the farewell they had taken with each other. Theologians and canonists were ordered to the previous committee by reason of the Electoral and Princely Princes and Estates to report all actions, and to give the committee of this part, in view of the parting which they took with each other, an answer to the effect that the matters are also to be submitted to Imperial Majesty for a common free vote. Majesty to a common free Christian conciliation, by virtue of previous imperial treaties, in the German nation; and if the Elector, Princes and Estates were inclined to talk about how a peaceful arrangement could be made between them and the reported conciliation, the Elector, Princes and the cities of this part would also be found quite inclined to do so.

1067. the papal otherwise cunning Lecture.

In Brück's History, p. 118 and in Müller, p. 819. Compare Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 301; there it is reported that "Doctor Eck went out" with this lecture.

1) Added by us after the previous number.

Because they could not compare with each other, they had orders from the Electors, Princes, and Estates to tell them, the Lutherans, that they understood that the Emperor's Majesty was quite inclined to make a concilium. Majesty would be quite inclined to make a concilium, but in such a way that all innovations, such as those in doctrine, church customs, and also others, outside of the approval of the common church, would be permitted and made in the lands and territories of the princes, princes, and cities of this part, would above all have to be brought back to the previous state, and thus the common church would have to be restituted. For it would be considered proper, because in world affairs, to restore and restore the appalled to their former state, much more would such restitution be due to the common church 2c.

1068. the Protestant's preliminary oral answer to this.

In Müller I, o. p. 806.

That the Elector, 1) Princes and cities of this part knew well, by the grace of the Almighty, that for the sake of unity and peace it was not their duty to break the Christian and good ordinances of the church without the common consent of the same, but since false and seductive doctrines, customs and ceremonies had been introduced into the church by the evil watch and guard of the prelates, as has been clearly indicated and proven in this part of the Articles of Confession, they would know that it is not only due to them, but that they would also be guilty before God and their conscience, at God's word, to permit Christian change therein, without any further unwarranted conclusion, 2) as the holy divine Scriptures, even the Pope's own rights, would have it for this part. Thus, as far as supplementation and restitution in secular and temporal matters of defense are concerned, there would be a separate difference with the matters of religion, as the aforementioned papal rights also show; it would also be unheard of that such a thing should ever have been sought in former times, that a trade or possessory in matters of religion should have been permitted.

1) "Der Churfürst" put by us instead of: "die Churfürsten". Edens0 again afterwards. - "Churfürst, Fürsten und Städte" are the Protestants. "Churfürst, Fürsten und Stände" are the Papists. Both are mixed up in the old edition.

2) The opinion will be: without waiting for a decision on this first.

3) "Deprivation cases"-cases that have been deprived.

of faith should be made. Thus, the Elector and Princes, together with the related cities, would not provide for this report of theirs, as having been made by order of the Electors, Princes and Estates, 4) about the parting which the Seven of Princes and others of this part had taken with the Seven of their part, and how they had offered at their request to promote the actions of the same committee with the Electors, Princes and Estates for the best. But they wanted to report the answer to their Electors and their relatives, who would order them to report what their graces and their needs wanted.

1069. the Lutheran part final explanation in the committee of the six, Sunday after Bartholomäi, the 28th August 1530, delivered.

This document is found in Brück's Geschichte, p. 120; in Chyträus, p. 273 k; in Müller, p. 821 and from the Margraval Brandenburg Acts in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 306. We have improved our copy after the latter. Latin at Oo6t68tinu8, tom. III, toi. 50 k and at Ok^tra.6U8, p. 281. Also in the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 452; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 109 b; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 237 and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 225.

(1) As you lords have allowed, we have presented this action to our most gracious and gracious lords of Saxony, Brandenburg, and the rest of their kinsmen in this matter; thereupon we have been commanded to report the opinion of their kinsmen and their kinsmen in this form.

(2) That their graces and they would remember how often, for the sake of peace and unity, they had offered to meet at this Imperial Diet in all that might be done with God and conscience. And because a committee of princes and other scholars of the Holy Scriptures and spiritual rights, fourteen persons, was assembled with the consent of both sides, the princes and other representatives of their part to the reported committee reported to them what means were proposed on both sides of the seven articles and their pending points, and what the representatives of this part gave in response, and for the sake of peace and unity, until further notice.

4) "happened" put by us instead of: "not provided"; for otherwise the "not provided at all" at the end of this sentence would be too much.

The two men have offered to promote the unity of the church in a council with the others of their kinsmen, with such an often told opinion that their graces and their associates have moved the matter to the utmost, and so their graces might have judged with them that on this part with God and conscience they should further yield to the indicated means, and raise the matter with their graces. They would have wanted to have reported this to them as soon as possible.

(3) For this reason they finally admonish and request the princes and the associates of the other estates to carry their reported communication and answer to the reported electors, princes and estates, and to promote the same in accordance with their given answer, together with a common Christian concilio.

4th Whereupon, after many disputations and speeches and rebuttals, reported princes and their associates of the other estates kindly and good-willedly offered to submit the matters in this manner, and to use and re-submit all possible and faithful diligence with notice of their intention.

(5) Nevertheless, and before the princes and their associates of the committee met again on both sides, the estates, which this part also did not understand otherwise than that it was meant kindly and graciously, sent some of their councillors to our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., with the request that the estates receive a report of the said committee's action. Now their Electoral and Princely Grace together with the other estates would be inclined to engage in further amicable action, and, as it is noted, by a narrower committee than the previous one would have been 2c., with friendly and official request that the Elector of Saxony would move and not depart; as one knows to be remembered on both sides.

6. And although the Elector of Saxony had to get such an opinion to 1) his fellow relatives, to decide with them on it, and to let the Elector of Mainz know the answer, he offered, on the evening of the said Vigil of St. Bartholomew, some of his own with the said cause, some of theirs with aforesaid cause, in which way the former protection separated from each other, and that one, according to the same parting, wanted to be sure of a reply, the aforesaid narrowed committee has been dismissed: so it is nevertheless, on all kinds of introduced doubts and for the sake of gloating, thus passed on to the Elector of Saxony, and the other related princes and cities should ever be felt no lack, yet the previous farewell inconceivably, has been conceded subsequently.

(7) But since no other means have been prescribed by you than those which have been ordained for such an extended committee, especially for the sake of the most important articles, than those which have been proposed in the former committee, there would have been no need for this extended committee of their Church and Free Society. and their co-relatives, especially because it was sufficiently understood that these means had previously been considered to the utmost, 2) and it could not be found that they should be heard 3) further than happened in the previous committee.

(8) And we are therefore commanded by their sovereigns and sovereigns and their kinsmen to inform you that they are not to be added to, as if the lack of their sovereigns and sovereigns and their kinsmen were. If, however, you know of other means which would be more advantageous for this transaction, we have to hear them from you again, and again let us hear them from their sovereign and princely lords and their co-relatives. We will also, as you have heard from us, talk to you about a decency that would be useful for the peace and unity of a common free Christian council.

(9) If, however, you do not have an order for this, or if you do not receive a further report from princes, rulers and estates in response to this report, as our most gracious and gracious lords do not wish to do so, we have immediately reported to their sovereign and imperial authorities what you have reported to us by order of the estates of the Council in the event that further proceedings arise, namely that their sovereign and imperial authorities do not know any other way to promote the same with Imperial Majesty than that all changes and things should first be restored to their previous status. Maj. do not know any other way to promote it, than that first all innovations and things should be set and restituted to the previous state.

(10) Thereupon we show you, by the order of our lords, that the estates bear knowledge, from which the doctrine embodied in the confession delivered, together with the change of some abuses of the church, is caused. If the beginning and the reason of the same are to be discussed, this can be shown with many of the written books, as well as with indications and living documents, on which, however, no proper appointment is made by those whose office this was; in addition, this is shown by Pabst's Hadrian's Book.

2) Förstemann meaningless: "so before ... move".

3) Förstemann: "dorff", probably a misspelling or misprint instead of: doruff.

nus advertisement sufficiently, so at the Diet of Nuremberg by a legate has been presented. 1)

(11) At previous imperial congresses held by princes, princes, and estates, especially because of the conflicting doctrines and customs, a common, free, Christian council, to the extent now indicated, was considered necessary, granted, and the imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, requested it several times and finally granted it a year ago at Speier. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has been asked for it several times, and finally, a year ago at Speier, it was graciously granted, and also a disposition was made as to the time in which it should be announced and begun.

(12) Therefore, our most gracious and gracious Lords and their relatives will kindly and diligently see to it that the Estates, as those who have taken action in this matter, will promote the same general, free, Christian concilium to Imperial Majesty, submissively and diligently, as it was previously considered good without any such measure or difference, and as it has been approved by Imperial Majesty. Maj. humbly and diligently, as it was previously considered good without any such measure or difference, granted and requested from Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and that a resolution on this matter was passed at the first Imperial Diet at Speier, as every authority is to observe in these matters until a General Council is announced.

(13) For this reason, their Lord and Lady and their kinsmen appealed a year ago at Speier to the Roman Catholic Majesty and to the General Council in a legal manner, because of some changes in this part of the Confession, and because of what was pending in the matter of the eireots or oonssoutivs. Majesty and the General Council in a legal manner; therefore, this was intended to be an official attestation against their appeal to the Church and the Federation and their kinsmen, which was also unjustified.

(14) It would also be a novelty, which has not been heard of before in such cases, where matters have required a concilium because of necessity, that a concilium has been refused until the cause for which a concilium is necessary has been removed.

015 Where the same might have been done here in time past, such and such great matters would seldom have come to a concilio.

(16) Therefore, it is the gracious and obliging intention of their sovereigns, their fiefs, and their kinsmen to you lords, who will be diligent with the estates, where their sovereigns, their fiefs, and their kinsmen will have the inheritance, as their kinsmen, and their kinsmen, and their kinsmen will have the inheritance.

1) The remark by Förstemann: "in the margin is the year: 1524." - This year is wrong; it was in the year 1522. See Document No. 718 in the 15th volume. Hadrian died on Sept. 24, 1523.

If the members of the previous committee did not want to be accepted by the means indicated, that they nevertheless wanted to leave it at the previous half of the concilii, and contrary to the interposed appeal do not introduce any change by their chur- and F. G. action, the electors, princes, and their kinsmen of this part want to provide this kindly and humbly, and deserve this kindly, also completely humbly.

(17) If the estates which have often been touched are inclined to order you or others to let them speak of the above-mentioned peaceful parting in the middle of a council, so that peace and unity may be maintained and other necessary matters of the realm may be settled, of which there shall be no lack for the sake of their sovereigns and their relatives:

(18) Thus our most gracious and gracious Lords have also offered themselves to do so, and with the help of the Almighty will, in accordance with their confession, keep themselves without further ado in such a manner as their Lordships, their F. G. and their kinsmen hope to answer for in all subservience to God the Almighty and to Imperial Majesty the Holy Roman Emperor. Maj. in all submissiveness.

By Cyriacus, that tomorrow shall depart, we will write more. Some questions are sent to you, of which we quarrel with the adversaries. Such arguments put them on the track, which are not useful for doctrine and true godliness, but only to provoke others against us. And our leniency in such matters only makes the hopeful dullards more defiant. There is no telling how they triumph. If I were present at these things for my own person, not in the prince's name, I would by no means suffer this defiance. Now I must tolerate all on account of the princes' and subjects' common danger. Our people's minds are either quite weak, or at the wrong time brave. But still I hope we will not do anything against the Gospel, D. Brück truly shows himself to be a constant and pious hero. Bucer writes to you about the Lord's Supper, and wants to accept our opinion. He holds that the body of Christ is present in the bread. This is the summa. I had put propositions to him; but he, out of misgivings, has sent you his own propositions. I have not been able to write more. I pray you answer me presently. Farewell. Date August 25. 1)

1071 Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. August 26, 1530.

From the original in Scheurl's library this letter is found in Jlgén's Zeitschrift 1842, II, 186. The variants of the same are given in Burkhardt, p. 184. For the locations see at the previous number.

Translated from the Latin.

To D. Martin Luther, his most dear father.

I can't report the slightest thing about either public or private matters, because we've been working on a union for many days in a row, and yet we're getting nowhere. They insist on the private mass, and make proposals about other matters which it is not at all advisable to accept. I think you have already seen these from my previous letter; however, they are also throwing around terrible threats. Although I do not care about the danger I am in, I am sometimes concerned about the great weakness of our princes. But perchance all will be ended ere this letter reach you. For the messenger is slow. Why I cannot discuss anything now <sup>^is this^</sup>: today a discussion was held, since neither I nor Pontanus knew what would be acted upon and presented and what the summa of the opinion of the princes would be. Truly, this hemming and hawing and doubtfulness seems to be of no less importance than the signs which the mob perceives. The Lord Christ deliver us from these dangers so great. Farewell, the 26th of August.

Philip (---4^77^).

I'm sending you the picture of Emperor Charles.

1072 Melanchthon's letter to Luther, before his answer to the previous letters had arrived. August 29, 1530.

See No. 1070, in 6orp. Rec. vol. II, 327.

(1) We have not yet received your concern about the counterpart's requirements, since we are most concerned about them.

(2) The whole matter still stands on these points. They ask us to confess that neither those who administer the Sacrament nor those who receive it do wrong. We have excused those who receive it, but of those who administer it we do not agree. The Concilium at Basle admitted the whole Sacrament to the Bohemians on this condition, if they confessed that one form could also be rightly given and taken. They also want to wrest this confession from us. Eck says that he insists on this because otherwise one cannot keep the common man in obedience/if we do not also free the consciences as far as one form of the Sacrament is concerned. To this we desire to hear your concern.

003 As to the application of the masses to others, postpone them to the Concilium, that they may show that they do not trouble us with the ungodly application of the mass.

004 And yet they would have us accept the Canon, but with a convenient and Christian interpretation. I see that they deal deceitfully with us, and could easily consider what I should do, if I should confess for my private person alone. But since this is a common thing that affects everyone, I respect that the voices and opinions of others are not to be rejected.

005 We are very severely contested by some of our own for restoring the jurisdiction to the bishops. For the people, who are now accustomed to freedom, and have once thrown off the yoke of the bishops, do not like to have the old yoke put on them again. And especially the imperial cities are very angry with the episcopal government. They do not ask much about doctrine and religion, but they are concerned about government and freedom. I am sending you a copy of the last demands of the countermand, so that you can then answer more easily. Date

2) Burkhardt, p. 184 and the 6orp. Rec. dates this letter August 29. Walch offers: ckis

1073 Luther's Letter to Melanchthon. July 27, 1530.

This letter is here with Walch without time determination and exceedingly deficient. Walch has brought a piece belonging to it 8ud No. 999 of this volume, which we have omitted there, because we give the letter here completely. Only the piece found here with Walch is found in German (without date) in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 434d; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 147; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 277; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 192; the Brie divided into two pieces, as with Walch, with Chyträus p. 95 and 171 b. The end is in Latin without Lucia. Latin without the conclusion at Lu668U8, p. 159, and at Co6l68tiQU8, tom. II, toi. 230. complete at De Wette, vol. IV, p. 102, with the date: "July 20, 1530." Burkhardt, p. 181, reports that the copy in the 606th of the Hamburg library >Voit. O. 14 (114) has as its date loria IV. po8t 4uoobi, that is, July 27, which is no doubt the correct date. Köstlin, Martin Luther (3), vol. II, p. 658 ud p. 233, has also adopted this date. We translate after De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

I am very sorry that I cannot be with you in body for this exceedingly beautiful confession of Christ. Our Staupitz said: "Whom God wants to blind, he first closes his eyes; too sharp is gladly chipped. " Indeed, I give no heed to this pretext, that for the sake of thanksgiving, or gratitude, the mass may be erected. 1) Hezekiah broke the bronze serpent, and cared not that it was kept for the memorial and praise of the work of the Lord. The godly king looked more to the certain abuse and evil occasion than to the doubtful and uncertain fruit of the praise. And now, since our adversaries have hitherto abused their masses for exceedingly wicked examples, and have not yet repented, they vainly ask that they may be permitted to keep them. For their pretence is evident, and without all repentance, therefore also a plain lie, though, as I have written before, they seek nothing right, but seek a complete tyranny of their abominations. First may they restore the doctrine of faith and works, afterward we may watch in regard to the ceremonies. First, let them restore the church and the ecclesiastics with their right offices, and the statutes

1) Compare Document No. 1005-, which also confirms the time determination assumed by us. will arise of their own accord; mau kaun the thanksgiving in other ways and without danger and trouble in the church.

That the adversaries gather contradictions out of my books? This they also do to show the glory of their wisdom. How can these asses judge the contradictions of our doctrine, who do not understand any part of the contradictory things? For what can our doctrine be but full of contradictions in the eyes of the ungodly, since it requires and rejects works at the same time, abolishes and restores customs at the same time, honors and punishes the authorities at the same time, affirms and denies sin at the same time? But for what purpose do I carry water into the sea?

Beyond measure, yes, beyond measure, your godliness and innocence is made glorious and certain by this manifest insolence of Satan, that he demands that all things be restored of you, that is, that you deny God, but worship the pope, and confirm all the abominations which he has created through them by so great murder, lies, and blasphemies. Here by every one of us a thousand bodies should be given for Christ.

Your Martin Luther.

See Appendix, No. 12 - Here Walch brings (with the wrong date: August 26, 1530) an excerpt from the letter communicated there completely. 2) In a separate supplement to the Confutation, Joh. Faber compiled the passages from Luther's writings in which he should have contradicted himself (De Wette). See Document No. 997.

Grace and peace in Christ! My dear Philip, I answered these questions the day before yesterday. And what is this that they presume to demand such manifestly ungodly things, since they themselves did not teach such things before? And this they now invent for their own sake, that we may not see their past ungodly things, but that by this pretence they may again establish and fortify the same. In my opinion you could do nothing more right than to free yourselves from these coarse tendrils, saying that you would give to God what is God's, and to Caesar what is Caesar's. If, therefore, they can show that it is God's and Caesar's, let them do so; but if they cannot show it, say: besides God and Caesar there is no one whom you can obey, unless it be the devil, whom even they will not command to obey. What need is there that the matter should be thus divided and divided into questions? Let them themselves make it clear what they are submitting, that is, let them show that it is God's or the emperor's. Why do you suffer them to play their game with you, whether you want this or that? They themselves may say whether it is the word of God, and immediately they will have obtained that you will obey the word of God. But ye will consider this better, for I am perhaps too sure in such gross intrigues, knowing that ye can commit nothing there but some offence against our persons, that we are accused of being faithless and fickle men, 1) but which the constancy and truth of the matter would easily make right? But I would not that this should happen. Nevertheless I speak thus, that if it should happen, we should not despair. For if we have escaped violence, after peace is obtained, we shall escape intrigues [and lies]; 3) and we

1) namely, in the case of excessive compliance. Compare Document No. 1058 towards the end.

2) Here we have adopted the reading of Sagittarius and Aurifaber.

3) A comma is to be placed after <Zoto8. This is a much disputed passage. Already the old translator has rendered the sense correctly, likewise Förstemann, Urknndenbnch, vol. II, p. 77. What Seidemann says in De will easily make up for our faults, for his mercy is upon us. Act manfully, and let your heart be confident, all you who hope in the Lord. But ye hope, because ye lead his cause: how could that be without hope? Give greeting to all our people, and be at ease with them. From the desert on the day of St. Augustine [Aug. 28] 1530. Yours, Martin Luther.

1076 Luther's Letter to Spalatin. August 28, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in the 60a. Isn. d., toi. 69, and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 79. Printed in 6li^tra6U8, p. 295; in Lrulüsrn, p. 204, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 154. According to the latter we have translated.

Grace and peace in the Lord! I have written before of these articles, 4) my dear Spalatin, which you have already sent for the second time; and, as I said, if the devil cannot be a lion, will he be a dragon? ) Now you see for yourselves that our cause has to do with deceit, therefore it is not necessary that I write much about these things. For who could not easily beware of known intrigues? They seek that they may rule over faith and conscience, and by this artifice seek to draw you away from the word, which I see sufficiently; but I fear nothing, for if they continue with deceit, they will fall into our ambush. For if ye hold fast this owl, that ye will not, or have not, conceded anything against the gospel, what are their plots? For verily then will I deal with them very nicely, by using mei-

Wette, Vol. VI, p. 555 f., Note 5, is not correct. Read Document No. 1059 and No. 1076 and you will not doubt the correctness of our translation. Luther goes on and on about the Papists attacking first by force, then by intrigues and treachery. Whoever now wants to refer the clolo8 to the evangelical side, as the papists do, betrays a considerable lack of discernment. Whether inencZacüa is original or an interpolation has no influence on the meaning.

4) He may mean Concern No. 1061. (De Wette.) 5) That is, if he cannot carry out his undertaking by force, he tries it by intrigue and deceit.

I will make it clear to you by the art of speech that these great defenders of the faith and the gospel have dared to demand something from you against the gospel. And yet, if you also (which by Christ's grace you will not do) have evidently admitted something contrary to the gospel, and if in such a manner they have shut up this eagle in a sack: 1) then, doubt not, Luther will come, and gloriously deliver this eagle. As Christ liveth, this shall come to pass. Therefore, since you are already victors over violence, do not be afraid of these bubbles of intrigue, however the matter may turn out. Luther is free, Macedonia may also be free, 2) which I would not like to see, so that in such a way I can make a stand against intrigue, and Ishmael 2) against violence. Be strong and act manly. "It is not needful for them to deal with the blind handles."

Furthermore, especially in the article in which it is requested that we demand from the legate and the pope what they would allow us, I ask you to answer in some way, according to the manner of Amsdorf: "That the pope and the legate would lick us in the ars. Fare thee well, my dear Spalatin, and pardon this levity, which wrings from me the extraordinary indignation against these exceedingly wicked men. From the desert, on the day of St. Augustine s28. ### 1077. duke Henry of Brunswick's lecture to the Lutherans.

This and the following document is found in Müller, Ub. III, cmx. 31, p. 835 from the unnamed uutor. npoloZ. ILta.6.

1) This refers to a dream of Melanchthon's: an eagle had been transformed by sorcery into a cat and enclosed in a sack. About this Luther came in and commanded that it be let out; and so the cat is freed. (See Seidemann on De Wette, vol. VI, p. 449 f., note 8.)

2) Philip of Hesse.

Dear sirs, it is true, and so far I am well acquainted with the matter, that I would not willingly help with my own person, by action and war, that your lords, on account of the use of the sacrament in both forms, or of the one, and private masses, or priests' wives, and such like things, which drag on in the consciences, should be overdrawn, and blood shed; I would not willingly saddle a horse for this purpose; but you know the manner in which your lords have taken possession of the monasteries and monastic estates, which they have not restored to the monks until now, for which reason the Imperial Majesty, through the monks, has ordered the monasteries and monastic estates to be restored to the monks. Majesty is daily approached for justice by the monks and clergy, whose property has been taken from them, with cries and shouts that Her Majesty has no peace from it. And since this is a just worldly matter, concerning the deprivation of ecclesiastical goods, monasteries, and benefices, no one would ever contradict it, since the Imperial Office of His Majesty would extend to helping those who have been deprived of theirs and held against them to regain it, and in this every one would be obligated out of obedience, and could not in conscience avoid helping His Imperial Majesty, since it would be impossible for him to do so. Majesty in this, he would also have to help, and would be due to him, if he were required. If, however, your lords could be guided a little in the proposed means, so that some settlement might be reached, they would undoubtedly find better ways and means with the Imperial Majesty in the matter concerned, concerning the monasteries and ecclesiastical estates, through their diligence and that of others who would like to see peace in the empire, so that, except for a concilium of monks, nuns and such like people, no strife nor war might be awakened in the empire. Why, nevertheless, one should call Majesty, as a praiseworthy emperor, whose Majesty so faithfully meant the things of peace and unity, did not want to be compliant in such proposals. With such a further appendix, it is not dangerous: one would perhaps leave this part to the common crowd or people, as if one hoped to gain relief from them by rising up in the empire; however, if one wanted to consider it well, one could not take much comfort in the common people, because if it should lead to a revolt among the common people, it would not remain so, but this part of the danger must also be taken into account.

Deprivation

Deprivation.

1078. the Lutheran answer to it.

See the previous number.

For this he should have it, if all things were compared Christianly, and the truth established, but the untruth together with the abuses were stopped and reformed, and it were then to be done about the monasteries or monastery estates, then the things should be helped with the help of God then soon; they would like to say that for the sake of their lords and superiors. But that the princes, rulers and cities of this part, in which the monasticism and nunnery together with the angle-measuring attitude partly through the next peasant revolt, and then further through many self-willed turning out, also through Christian establishment, because the same is against the divine holy word, after which their ungodly state and seductive doctrines and customs have been attacked and severely trodden upon, to speak, to blaspheme, and also to make all kinds of harmful and dangerous division in the said states, lands, territories, cities, towns, and villages, they should fall, reestablish, and grant: They could not do this for the sake of conscience, because the comforting doctrine that had been led among them would be against it, as little as their sovereign and princely sovereigns with God and God's will. and conscience, to be turned into another blasphemy. Thus they also hoped that the Imperial Majesty would, before the end of the day, declare such a thing. Majesty would not request this of the estates of this part before the final decision of a general free council. For since it had often been indicated in the committees beforehand that Her Majesty and the pope were completely determined to call for a council, which was to take place in six months, and after that in a year at the longest, these matters could be left to rest for a little while, based on the requests and proposals that had been made especially in the committee of the fourteen by the seven of this part of such monasteries and monastics and clergy. Thus it should also be considered whether it is consistent with Christian love, since the same matters have now been pending for several years at a general, free, Christian council decision, that the Christian estates of this part should now, against their consciences, re-establish the essence, since in what concerns the monastic life, the monastery life and the clergy, the monastery life and the clergy have been left to their own devices, and ceremonies, the doctrine would be disputed and not settled, or in the case of refusal, they and theirs would be complained of, since it would still have to be done for a year or a year and a half, and in a concilio, by means of divine word, the division would be settled without such complication, blood, and so on.

shed, or otherwise could be reached to Christian peace. It was also hoped, for the reasons now indicated, that His Imperial Majesty, as a most gracious Emperor, would not be moved to do so. Majesty, as a most gracious Emperor, would not allow himself to be moved to do so, nor would he graciously consider it, even if the authorities wanted to pursue the matter against their conscience. It would be easy for everyone to hear what danger, further development, and burden this would cause between their subjects and the monks, nuns, and other clergy who wanted to show themselves against the recognized Christian doctrine with words, improper conduct, and ceremonies. So also in this part, one would not confess to monks and nuns that the monasteries and estates were theirs, and thus had been or would be deprived of theirs against God. For since their supposed divine service, according to which they directed and wanted to direct all their being, teachings, ceremonies, and deeds to meritorious works, was against God and his holy word, even without which this monastic system would not be a divine indication or planting, no one would doubt that the same goods, which were meant by founders and donors for the right Christian divine service, would no longer be divine enjoyment or custom. Let it be said that the property, according to their own rights, is not theirs, but Christ's, and that they should more reasonably refrain from such a search, for the sake of their consciences, than make it, especially for the reasons which St. Augustine has given in the same case, and especially until such time as it is determined in a general, free concilio with Scripture, whether their doctrine and monastic system, together with their seductive ceremonies, corner masses, and the like, are divine or not.

And it would nevertheless be an unchristian act and intention on the part of monks and nuns, as well as other clergy, that they should subject themselves, according to the form and occasion of things, and beforehand, because a concilium is to be held so conducive, to induce Imperial Majesty to take arduous measures. Majesty to take onerous measures, since it would not be possible for them to maintain their ungodly ceremonies and worship among the peoples who know the truth before the final act of the said council, without daily worry, risk, expense, and other danger. For this, the aforementioned negotiators should have it, if these matters did not concern God's word, honor, and conscience, but were to do with a part of their property, one does not doubt that one would have to rely on this part of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's displeasure on that account; but in these

To grant anything against conscience would concern souls, which should be set before all other things of this world. Nor would it be proper for them that, for the sake of the other things of which it has been said, this part should renounce the truth they had known; for, as Christ himself said, there would not remain any trouble, but woe to that part which would give unjust cause for it, for this part firmly believes that their doctrine is the pure and truthful gospel and the word of God. Therefore they also knew that they were commanded by God not to depart from it for the sake of any offense; and if they then did so, that they were guilty before God, and it was not otherwise due them in their consciences, and the reproach wanted to hold on to that which was not due them, nor was it founded in Scripture, then they would have given cause to that which he had spoken of; For the right hand of the pope himself said, that it were more profitable to cause offence, than that the truth should be omitted for offence's sake. So also this part of the consolation would not be based on men, but on God, who through his word had commanded his Christians to remain with the truth, regardless of all men's danger, in the face of eternal condemnation. For what they were no less concerned about in the next arduous upheaval than someone from another class would have been easy to find out, so their electors and princes, together with their relatives, would have had to take care of them. Therefore, their electors and princes, together with their relatives, should not deviate from the truth, and should entrust the remaining care to God Almighty.

E. Of the Council's dissatisfaction at Nuremberg with the previous netigion handlings, whereby he has not been well to speak of Philipp Melanchthon in particular.

1079. the one of Nuremberg misgivings about the so called unrestrained and unassailable answer of the Protestants, in which they complain that more than fair has been conceded to the opposite by the Protestants.

In the German edition of Chyträus, p. 442, and in the Latin, p. 297. In Oeklöstinus, tom. III, x. 81, differing in some pieces from Chyträus.

now most recently handed over to the papal decreed committee at Augsburg, moved for themselves with diligence, as much as may be done in haste, which also let consult with their theologians, and find the same writing placed in three ways or articles.

2nd First, on the articles which have been agreed upon in committee, and have hitherto been in dispute with the least part; which now rest upon himself.

003 Secondly, concerning the articles which have hitherto been in dispute, and which have not yet been united; where it is good, Christian, and just, that, for the sake of the same articles, in our part, we should still hold to that which has been publicly preached and held to be right and godly, and which is known in the confession delivered in the same form.

(4) Third, the articles, some of which are doubtful and some of which are incompatible. Now, as far as these incomparable articles are concerned, or, as the most recent list that has been handed over wants to call them, articles that are still doubtful, the same Scripture has this reputation with them, and also with their knowledgeable theologians, and, without a doubt, with other Christian persons as well, that a great deal has been left out in it, approved, and given into the hands of the papists, which is either injurious to conscience, not to be preserved in Scripture, or is in many ways burdensome and annoying to those who have hitherto confessed Christ and his Gospel. And to show these articles, and the vexation thereof, in one part, in one summary:

5. So it is not a little inconvenient for the Christian authorities to finally commit themselves and hand over that they should let all monks and nuns and the same monasteries remain quiet with their old nature and their old ceremonies, as they would have used them up to now; For it will follow in many places that the same monasteries will freely re-establish their old patrocina, sermons, ungodly masses, brotherhood, funeralia, and what is much of the like, draw the simple people to themselves, seduce them, and cause such inequality with all church customs that nothing but a whole uproar will be to be expected from the common man, even before that from good communes, not to mention other mischiefs arising therefrom.

006 Secondly, it is not good, nor does it serve for a small error, that the papists should have their hitherto used doctrine admitted and confirmed in the article, as if there were three parts of repentance. For this needeth no doubt, the Papists hold eonkssionknn for their auricular confession, and satisfactiontzn for satisfaction with works. Now consider every one, if to them

these two pieces should be admitted as necessary two parts of the atonement, what they have gained with it, and whether the word of God and the Scriptures could always suffer this. And even if one were to gloss over the matter, to interpret it differently than the papists understand it, the common man will never be able to accept it, for the matter has become too plain and intelligible.

(7) Thirdly, that the sacrament should not be administered to anyone without prior oral confession would not only give rise to great scruple and misunderstanding, but would also be dangerous, thus binding communion directly to confession and obliging people to make the same. And what would it be otherwise than to force consciences again to oral confession, to which no man should be compelled by force or necessity, and thus again to erect a papal prison, and to press men to the point that they must be confined to the day of communion, and thus, at the pleasure of the pastors, for a definite time.

(8) Fourthly, with the fasting, eating meat, and forbidding meat, the article is quite disgraceful, and also somewhat detrimental. For in this way men would again be ensnared in keeping the gold fasts 1) and other days out of compulsion, and not out of their own good will, and Christian liberty, under the pretense of preserving peaceful unity and equality, would thus be hung on a nail, over which liberty one should not hold less than over another article of faith, according to the word of Paul, before one should hold such liberty's forbearance as a necessary statute, as the papists judge and desire the same in no other form.

(9) Fifthly, of course, there is no scripture from earth that can be found, or from which it can be concluded, that the dead saints or the angels in heaven pray to God for us. Nor is there any mediator, intercessor, or high priest before God, as all Scripture indicates, except the one and only Christ; of what use then is it, and what fruit does it bear, for the Popes to yield to and confirm this article, which they have hitherto tried to maintain as founded in Scripture, but of which Scripture bears no witness? What abuses also with the time from

1) Gold fasting or glad fasting or soft fasting are the fasts on the four days of Quatember.
of this article would be made, every person of understanding has easily to consider.

(10) In the sixth place, by this writing the bishops have their spiritual jurisdiction granted and yielded much more than they could ever have supposed, or even had before. And if this few article should stand, it would be the most subtle, the most right way, to even diminish and extinguish the gospel in a short time, that could ever be devised. For if the ordinaries should be permitted to rule over the priests, as before; item, if a priest commits a criminal offense, that the ordinaries have the power to punish him without hindrance, by virtue of episcopal authority; that also all priests, parish priests, and preachers should be presented to the ordinaries, as this article indicates in longer content and quite generally, even indefinitely, such episcopal authority: What else will follow from this, which could be assumed otherwise, but that the bishops would never allow a Christian, righteous presented pastor; or if they did allow him, they would lie to him every day with this or that self-invented excrement, cite him, kill him in ways, or otherwise act with them in such a way that none could remain? Or what preacher would allow himself to be placed there, so as to preach at a certain danger, and if the authorities would not have to protect him against the bishop, and to await all disaster and death and destruction? How could the authorities answer for it against God, in conscience, and otherwise against their congregations? If the preachers were thus tributed, picked out, not suffered, or driven away, where would the gospel remain in a short time, and how long also the Christian religion?

(11) And how could the Papists offer a more subtle check to the Christian estates, than by setting aside all the other articles, which are incomparable, until a future concilio, and accepting this one article of episcopal jurisdiction? For by so doing they would have obtained this way, and such a register, that they would soon master the gospel, and the same preacher and pastor. That they would not then be able to defend themselves against the imperial majesty, the empire, or the bishops. Majesty, the empire, or the confederate states by right, by grace, or by reason.

12th And in sum, these complaints and detrimental defects would like to be drawn in more articles, and in more places, from the above-mentioned handed over list: and where one can find the an-should take, it would actually make much more evil, fearful consciences; it would thereby confirm a great part of the papal abuses, blaspheme the gospel, accuse the Christian estates of revocators, act too near to Scripture in many ways, and cause one mischief to another.

013 And though for the sake of Christian peace, which is temporal, one ought to yield, suffer, and tolerate much, yet by so doing one ought not to cause strife of heart and conscience; for it is a harmful peace, and not a good peace, which is sought and maintained with detriment to souls, consciences, and injury to the honors of God. So, as Paul saith, one ought not to do evil with knowledge, that good may come of it. And even though the matter may seem to be one of total discord, yet one should not act contrary to God, his word, or conscience, but should proceed in a just and Christian manner, and command the care of peace or discord to God; otherwise it would be called putting the gospel behind the door for the sake of temporal peace or escape from the cross. And if these articles should be so accepted, and Luther, as well as other preachers, as is evident, preach, teach, and write against them, as every Christian preacher, for the sake of his conscience, would not want to avoid such a thing, and will not remain without doubt, then everyone should consider what unity and peace, which one would have thought to seek and maintain by yielding, would always result from it.

(14) And it actually gives many people great cause for thought that the foremost of the Christian estates have shown themselves to be so brave and courageous in the face of Imperial Majesty's and the imperial estates' serious opposition. 14. And actually makes many people think that the foremost of the Christian estates have shown themselves to be so Christian, brave, and prudent, and also quite steadfast, in the face of Imperial Majesty's and the imperial estates' earnest persuasion, and that they should now go so far in the amicable negotiation, which alone is the friendliest, and without any seriousness or fear of future danger, without any need.

015 And though this list is so given, that it may be applied in many articles, then here, then there, even to our part, yet it would certainly not be understood by the majority, nor by the majority of all men, because even the Christian classes themselves may not draw such a clear understanding from it of the gospel part.

016 Moreover, that it is not good in such important high matters, concerning the honour, order, establishment, and salvation of all men, to be so fainthearted and unfaithful, but it is

It is necessary to act in such a way that public, disputatious, doubtful reason may not be drawn from it.

17. Now, one or more of these means are used, they are also rejected by the opposite party or not, but, as a reasonable person will never judge otherwise, they have been so completely ignored that not a little displeasure, suspicion, and annoyance arise for the Christian states among friends and enemies, and would actually be a great cause for the Popes to take a noticeable strengthening of all their abuses from it, and first of all to boast of great conquests; As Cochleus has already publicly written about himself in this city, and has made himself highly famous for many excellent concessions on our part.

(18) But how to act in this matter now, since the list is most out and handed over, that is doubtful; but according to the state of things this way is thought to be the best: that E. E. Rath's envoy to our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., and Margrave George that they had sent the list by mail to their lords and friends, who wrote to them that not only they, but also their theologians, with whom they had secretly consulted, had all kinds of complaints about some of the means and articles contained therein. Where they had been sent to them before they were handed over to the committee, they wanted to express to their Electoral and Princely Grace their deficiencies. and princely lords their deficiencies and complaints for this reason out of necessity.

(19) The council also considers the committee's negotiations, disputes, surrenders, and the like, to be completely inalienable and unallied, in such a way that without the prior express consent of both parties it cannot be considered valid, permanent, or acceptable, otherwise it would be detrimental, burdensome, and dishonest to the Christian estates in many ways, according to the council's concerns, and would also be annoying to the opposing party.

020 But because this would be a superior, important, and such a case, in which not only the welfare and salvation of the Christian classes, but also of many people, would be concerned, it would therefore be necessary to consider these matters with great diligence, so that nothing would be accepted, granted, or permitted which would be contrary to human conscience and souls, and would also serve to confirm the old abuses, and would be more conducive to further deepening and strife than to Christian harmony:

(21) Thus an honorable council would ask their Electoral and Princely Gn. who will graciously submit this transaction, and what has occurred between the members of the committee, to Doctor Martin Luther, as the one through whom God Almighty has most recently preached and established His Gospel in the most pious manner, and submit the matter to him, as an understanding theologian, whom this transaction also concerns in the highest and above all others, as a theologian of understanding, whom this business also concerns to the highest and above others, so that on the part of the Christian estates the more securely it would be walked and nothing would be approved and accepted that would be detrimental and injurious to the word of God, as, without doubt, their sovereign and princely graces, as Christian princes, have done. as Christian princes, would be inclined to do without it.

(22) For if, behind Doctor Luther, and unconsciously of him, something final and conclusive should be done and granted in this treaty, which is not strictly founded in Scripture, or at least doubtful, it is to be feared that the said Luther would not be silent afterward, but would write and preach against it; and other preachers would probably do the same. To what extent this would lead to proliferation, disparity, and inconstancy, they, the envoys, give their chur- and F. G. to consider. And so then an honorable council, their friends, and other Christian estates, on their chur- and F. G., as the foremost and highest estates, have hitherto had their regard in this transaction, they entirely provide that their chur- and F. G. will not take note of this request of a council out of disfavor, but out of mere necessity of conscience, and in the end of this trade, not less than in the beginning and so far, show themselves so Christian and gracious, that the widow would not like to take note of it in any other way than a constant mind of all Christian estates and co-relatives of this trade; that is what a council wanted to deserve.

23. And although it may be burdensome to go back again in the most recent means listed, because they have been handed over in writing to the Widertheil, and may be considered approved by the same, the greatness of the trade, also the burden of conscience, is to be considered here, and by no means to reproach with God's word, and therefore not to advise a council, or other fellow relatives of this part, that they still approve such means at this time; but, if the opposing party from the submitted list ever wants to insist on finally granting it, and to consider that for the sake of the Christian states it is accepted and permitted, that then

The Papists, on the other hand, would have their intention purified by the fact that this amicable negotiation of the committee by the deputies would be completely unallied and inaccessible to all parts, and would not be within the power of the same deputies; as the counterpart himself would have known for and for accepting anything in this without the special prior approval of the Imperial Majesty and all other imperial estates on both sides as principal approval; that also the proposed means would not be presented to any other opinion and would be presented for means, because as far as in other articles the principal approval of the Imperial Majesty and all other imperial estates on both sides is concerned. The Council of the Holy Roman Empire would not be able to accept anything in this matter without the special prior approval of the Imperial Majesty and all other Imperial Estates on both sides, as the principal approval; nor would the proposed means be presented to any other opinion and be considered as a means, as long as in the other articles, which are still disputed and not agreed upon, a fair and just equality would be found beforehand, and these would be approved and accepted by the other part according to the confession of the Christian Estates. For without this, this most recent list, as reported, would be inapplicable, and not to be considered approved in any part.

1080. Osiander's defense against the articles presented by the Roman Catholics.

This writing is found in Oo6l68tinu8, tom. III, toi. Osiander was the first Lutheran preacher in Nuremberg and attended the Diet. He was ordered by the council to write this Apology against the Papal Articles.

Translated into German by L. A. Tittel.

001 In the first place, because the popes also accept the orthodox and Christian articles, and have no objection to them, only so far as they are confirmed and proved by the testimonies of Scripture, or of the fathers and conciliar conclusions, and even often add that the church has accepted and confirmed them: so it is easy to see that they are using them to deceive us, as if all the articles were neither valid nor to be accepted, if they were not confirmed and accepted by the prestige of the church. And they are, of course, compelled to act in this way, since in the disputed articles they have no other recourse than the church's constitution and reputation. This article, therefore, must be refuted and overturned on sound grounds, which may be done in the following manner:—

(2) The Church owes her origin and origin to the word of God, as John I says: "He hath given power to become the children of God to them that believe on his name. 1 Cor. 4: "I have begotten you through the gospel in Christ JEsu." Jac. I: "He hath begotten us according to a fine will by the word of truth, that we should be the firstfruits of fine creatures." So the church is put under the word, and the word must judge the church, and not the church the word. Christ also compares the word to a net, and the church to fish. Now it is not possible for the fish to have power over the net, to know or to do anything with it, since they are caught and kept by it.

003 So also saith Christ Joh. 5, Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness of the truth: but I receive no witness of man. So then our faith must not be based on the testimony of men, but on the word of God. And the church does not bear witness to the word of God, as if its truth and certainty were based on her testimony and thereby revealed, but when she bears witness to God and his word, she confesses and declares that she accepts it, and thus gives others occasion to hold such divine testimonies in honor.

004 Christ saith, "My sheep hear my voice." So the Christian church bindeth not the consciences to keep and observe any thing actually, but heareth Christ alone, and keepeth those things which he commandeth, but avoideth and fleeth those things which he forbid; and those things which he leaveth free, they impose on none, but let them be free, according to the liberty that Christ hath made them free. Gal. 5.

5. we also believe a catholic church; therefore we see and know it not.

006 If, therefore, the church were free to raise and choose articles which must necessarily be obeyed and believed, who then could know what and where the church was?

7 Paul also rejects and condemns such doctrines and commandments of the church Gal. 1: "If an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."

008 He saith therefore how he and other apostles ought to be called, and what they ought to be thought of. Now if the apostles are not to be heard preaching and preaching another gospel, much less is the church itself to be heard; though the church perceives and understands it not, but the people, who are falsely comprehended under the appearance and name of the church.

009 From all this it may be proved that the church bindeth not the consciences of men to any articles or commandments, and that, if it do so, yet no man is bound by such commandments.

Of original sin.

010 On the other hand, one sees from this their willfulness quite clearly, since they also maliciously falsify other articles, and more their evil intentions and

For when we say and teach that original sin arouses and causes evil lusts and inclinations, that we have no true fear and faith, they say and teach that these are real sins. For when we say and teach that original sin awakens and causes evil lusts and inclinations, that we have no true fear and faith, they say that these are real sins, if one does not trust and believe God and His word.

011 Then they teach and maintain that original sin is an infirmity and defect of original righteousness. But original righteousness is nothing else than what is called righteousness in our day, namely, the righteousness of faith, preceded by the fear of the Lord (for "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom"), and followed by the slaying of evil affections or lusts. Wherefore the defect of hereditary righteousness is fairly set forth and described in these three pieces, namely, that one is without fear and trust of God, has no faith, lives in carnal security, and feels evil desire (or lust). Which they should know from Augustino, who in the 2nd book speaks as p>666uto, iri6riti8 ei reini88ioii6 (of sin, merits, and forgiveness): hereditary righteousness is to obey GOD, and to be without lust (or evil desires). But obeying GOD is nothing other than fearing and trusting GOD, because GOD's word either gives or gives away.

012 It must also be remembered that there is no other difference between original sin and real sin, than when original sin breaks out into action. For Paul calls both sin and original sin, and the difference is only the result of the pointed questions and disputes of a few enthusiasts and heretics. And as there is a silent and hidden fire in unslaked lime, which, when water is poured in, is revealed and falls into the senses, and yet is the very fire that was in it, so original sin is dead, and so long hidden, until it is revealed by the law, and is kindled, and breaks out into action; so that original sin becomes real sin, which is the same and the same thing as the former.

013 The error must also be punished, because they falsely teach that original sin is not only forgiven by baptism, but also entirely taken away, when every one feels the root and tinder of it even unto death. (Rom. 6.)

014 Therefore they know not what original sin is. For what is left of sin after baptism they do not want to understand of original sin.

(15) Thirdly, in the fourth article we must counter their false opinion with the saying Rom. 11:6.

If it be of grace, it is not of works: for then is grace no more grace. But if it is of works, it is not of grace," for then works would no longer be works. And Eph. 2: "By grace are ye saved through faith; and the same not of yourselves. It is the gift of God, not of works, lest any man should boast."

(16) The saying 2 Tim. 4 ("Henceforth is unto me" 2c.) does nothing at all to prove the merit of works, as every one can easily see.

(17) Of other sayings, where there is something about merit, this may be said, that the words reward and recompense do not refer to any previous merit. For what God does or bestows by pure grace, we can never earn by works; and if he promises something before the deeds are done, he is bound to keep and perform it, not because of merit, but because of the necessity of the promise. Therefore the Scriptures call it, in a fancy way, an obligation (or duty); and so must all the sayings of reward be understood, which God also promises us in the Old Testament on account of good works, and that on account of the saying, "We are worthless servants," which permits no reward on account of merit, but on account of obligation and imputation.

018 Likewise the old testament promised the reward of works, saying, If ye will keep my commandments, I will be your God, and will give you all good things; that is, I will give you the reward. The New Testament speaks (because the Old Testament no one could keep, nor earn the reward, but all became unfit and lacked the glory): I will forgive sins by grace through Christ, and be your God. Which is just as much as: if you believe, not only shall your sins be forgiven you because of the transgression of the law, but also the reward promised in the Old Testament shall be abundantly bestowed upon you; that is, in the Old Testament it could justly have been called reward, if only we had rendered due obedience to the law. But in the New Testament it is called a reward because of the good things promised. For the very goods which have been promised to us as wages, but which are gifts (or offerings) to us, are given. For we deserve nothing, as the similitude of the vineyard shows, where he who has labored all day in it is punished, or reprov'd. This saying has nothing at all to do with the New Testament, but goes to the Old Testament, and belongs to it, like all others that deal with hired labor and wages.

019 It must also be remembered that there is a difference between some sayings. For this, He shall give to every man according to his works, is distinguished from this, which saith, He shall give to every man for or because of works: for a cloth also is done according to the cubit, or according to the same, but not because of or for the cubit. And though the reward be very much a reward, yet there is no merit in it.

(20) Fourthly, enough has already been said in answer to the 5th and 6th articles. It is only necessary to note this, in my opinion, that in explaining the saying, "We are useless servants," we should not look at the word "useless," but at the debt, or what we have owed, since no reward is due for what is done out of debt and necessity (or compulsion).

021 But if a reward is still offered, it is a sign of freedom, namely, that if the work 1) is not equal to and in accordance with the reward, one is still free to reject and do away with both the reward and the work (that is, not to reward the work as reprehensible).

022 For this is what Christ means when he says, "If you have kept all the commandments of God, you have not paid the debt, because he created you and sustains you and feeds you and protects you. He has already done you more good than you are worth. Your wickedness is so great, and your merits so bad and nothing, that all the good you have already enjoyed has been lost, not to mention that he still owes you more.

23 Fifthly, in answer to the seventh article, that the "church" is a common word, signifying every assembly and congregation which needs some special doctrine and commandments, and which is taken in three ways in Scripture. First, for the congregation of the wicked, as Ps. 26:5 says, "I hate the congregation of evildoers." Secondly, for the holy, catholic, and orthodox church, of which there is a report in the articles of our Christian faith, which is united, which comprehends in itself the elect and pious, both living and dead; for otherwise there would be more churches. It must also be holy, therefore all the ungodly, or who will not repent, are excluded from it. It must also be believed, therefore it cannot be seen or pointed at with fingers. Thirdly, it signifieth an outward and visible company or assembly of a few Christians and godly men.

1) xi'LkWium meroedi rsspontZsrs is wrong, it must be instead of xraerninrn: oxns. (Walch.)

The first is that there are many blessed people, among whom are often mixed many wicked ones, and which are as many visible assemblies as there are parish churches and public buildings. Which speech is very different from the preceding, and cannot or must not be mixed or confused with it, which the popes endeavor to do in every way. For of the former it is said, "I believe a holy" 2c., that is, it must be only one. But of the latter it is said, Many churches, 1 Cor. 14: "As it is fitting in all churches (or congregations)." 2 Cor. 11: "That I may take care of all the churches" (churches). The former must be believed according to the words of the Creed; the latter must be known and seen, as it is there said, "If thy brother sin against thee, tell it to the church" (congregation). In the former all are holy, but in the latter not in the same way.

024 The popes would willingly confound and confound the second and third meanings, seeing that the propositions and evidences, that the church having the Holy Ghost cannot err, 2c. and likewise, that apart from her no man can be saved, 2c. are to be understood and interpreted by the other kind of church. But when they say, This is what the church teacheth, this is what she hath received and found to be right: they know also that such things are to be understood of the third kind of the church, which can err and be wanting. These same sayings are sometimes understood of the first kind, of which Paul saith, that they shall cleave unto the doctrine of devils.

025 These parables clearly show how the angels gather and build up the other kind of church out of the third, and that some wise virgins who are in the third belong to the other.

026 Sixthly, that they have said in the tenth article, if it be otherwise, that the body of Christ cannot be without the blood, and the blood without the body, must be utterly rejected and destroyed, because their drivels and poems are wholly and manifestly at variance with the first article of our Christian faith, which teaches and confesses an Almighty God.

027 For God being omnipotent is able to give us the body without the blood, and the blood without the body, that Christ may yet live, and that the essence of his body and blood may be unharmed.

028 As to the other, they confirm the error of Zwingli and Carlstadt. For if the body and blood of Christ cannot be specially given to us in the Lord's Supper, much less can they be in different places at the same time and at once, since it is more contrary to nature to be in different places at the same time and at once than that his body and blood should be given to us, each specially.

029 And though there be no body without blood, yet it doth not follow that they are at liberty and permitted to institute any new thing in the church apart from and contrary to the commandment of Christ, as was said in the first article. For though Christ, when he instituted Holy Communion, knew well how it should be with his body and blood, yet he established and confirmed that sacrament which he instituted. Therefore, it can also be said here that the disruption or destruction of this order instituted by God cannot come from faith, and therefore must be sin, Rom. 4, for no one can believe that this is not against God's command.

(30) Seventhly, also in the 11th article, as all other statutes of men, so also the Canon of both sexes 2c. may be easily rejected and refuted, because they have not hitherto proved, nor will they hereafter be able to prove and show, that it is founded in Scripture.

031 Eighthly, enough has been said and done about the twelfth article, and so they must be asked: which part is making vain efforts and wasting time?

032 Similarly, in the thirteenth article, we hold of the same points, that we believe what we ought to believe, and that all is but a dispute of words. For they call a sacrament a visible sign of invisible grace. If by sacraments they understand only such signs as communicate and present to him who uses them the signified things written in the Word of God, then there are only two sacraments, namely, baptism and the Lord's Supper.

033 But if they also understand other signs by them, which are only signs, and yet give or present nothing, then the sacraments will be more than a thousand, let alone seven; and even the ancient popes did not count them more than six, therefore in this case it is easy to answer.

034 In the 14th article we may thus answer the adversaries: that the faithful ministers of the Word and of the Church are not called and chosen by spiritual or ecclesiastical authority, but by GOD Himself, Christ saying, "Ask the LORD to send laborers into His harvest."

035 If therefore they be called of God, as Paul saith, it is well; but if he will have it done by men, as mediators, the power of election is in the church, as it is written, Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. And do not the ecclesiastical authorities

They are to appoint or confirm pastors and ecclesiastics, as far as they have to do with them because of one part, namely income.

(36) To the twenty-first article it may be replied, that the Scriptures speak not of dead saints, but of living saints; and that the opinions of calling upon the dead cannot be proved and expounded by any sayings of the Scriptures.

(37) What is objected on account of Cyprian may be refuted in the same way as Augustine refutes the teacher of the art of speech, Orseoniuin 1<sup>A</sup>. 2. 6. 72. refuted; and though it were certain that the saints supplicate GOD for us, yet it would not follow that it was necessary to call upon them. For Paul says, there is but One Mediator; but they, according to their known impudence and boldness, teach the contrary, and thus bring many mediators into the way.

Of both shapes.

038 Of both forms of the sacrament it is not necessary to suppose that the breaking of bread signifies the holy supper. For the history of Eli's sons, who lost the priesthood because of fornication and other shameful lives, means nothing more than this: It will happen that our priests, too, will be expelled from the church and deposed from office because of their shameful lives in the celibate state, but that others who live piously and chastely will be promoted in their place, who, according to Christ's word and institution, will distribute both forms of the sacrament to all pious and Christian souls; and that, on the other hand, the impure priests will be condemned to only one form, to the perpetual remembrance of the unholy state apart from marriage. Apart from this, nothing else follows from this erroneous opinion and belief of theirs, if anything is to follow or be concluded from it.

39. for this reason it is not necessary to take up and keep the host (or wafer), since the priest has daily power to consecrate (or bless), as is evident from æseret. æe eonseerations, ckist. 25. rsluturn.

Of the priestly marriage.

(40) That they condemn and forbid priestly marriages as unclean is evident, because they have no grounds on which to excuse and defend their action; so they must be opposed by the chapter, "The Spirit saith plainly," 2c. and, "Be fruitful and multiply," 2c. It is a creation, not a commandment, and for this reason it penetrates more sharply.

From the fair.

41 The popes have nothing to defend the mass, but in this they are quite ridiculous and insipid, that they interpret the words "to do" and "to sacrifice" in the same sense, and that in all three languages. The sacrifices that are slaughtered are hewn from one another, and prepared in other ways before the sacrifice, so that the word "to do" may well apply; but therefore to do and to sacrifice is not one as much as the other. But if this be so, it follows that the apostles did not keep the Lord's Supper rightly, for it is evident that they did not sacrifice, since Christ says, "This do," and not, "I will do."

042 Likewise, if Christ gave out one figure at Emmaus, and it be a sacrifice, how may they be so bold as to forbid in decrees the acting of one figure only?

Of monastic vows.

(43) Nor have they been able to produce anything worthwhile concerning the vows of the monasteries. The king of Arragon serves as an example, that it is not divine right to keep the monastic vows, for otherwise no one could remit or absolve anything from them.

44 Likewise (the word): "Not all grasp this" 2c. (must be held against them); and even if one were to let all their grimaces and poems rest in their place, it is nevertheless more than too well known to all how the monks and nuns have lived hitherto and still live, and what vices of unchastity are going on among them.

045 The spiritual power and jurisdiction consist in preaching, the right administration of the sacraments, binding and loosing, and the punishment of manifest and reprehensible iniquities by excommunication; for otherwise they can obtain no other judicial power from the scriptures; but such no man will take from them, nor want to take from them.

46 Finally, since her imperial majesty not only considers this unfounded answer to be something certain and founded in sacred Scripture, but also refuses to hear others, the most advisable thing seems to be to bring to her imperial majesty's mind most earnestly and diligently that it is not for them to order or command anything in this matter. For it is written, "Pray unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." From this it is clearly evident that the church has its own affairs and business, in which the imperial majesty does not rule or speak and command at his own discretion.

can. And no one will deny that this matter is of such a nature, as the emperor himself has confessed in various letters. And even if he had some power in this matter, which he is entitled to by law, he would not have to compel us by force, but would have to convict us with the word of God; which Philip Melancthon will be able to explain and explain more from the 14th chapter to the Romans, just as we have also, since we have been together, often and extensively spoken of this, and also at the recent Imperial Diet at Speier have acted long and broadly on this matter.

Grace and peace! Honorable, prudent sir and friend, I have heard from your writing how sincerely you are moved that ours at Augsburg have gone a little too far. But I have already written about it once, and now I am writing again, hoping that it will not be necessary. For even though Christ may be a little weak, he is not therefore cast from his throne.

I have commanded the matter to God, and I have kept it in my hand so finely that no man may forgive me anything in it, nor may I neglect it, as long as Christ and I remain one. For if any thing should be left undone (as I am not), well, the cause is not lost, but a new war is begun, that our adversaries may be fully persuaded how honestly they have acted. For there will be nothing left but and above the gospel, which part insiäius keep the field. For in the reservation of the gospel there are other insiäius, for the adversaries now and then can reproach us; Hum guiä 68t supientia bomiiis coatru Osiim?

1082 Luther's letter to Justus Jonas of Sept. 20, 1530, in which he writes that he is not at all satisfied with the means of composition.

This letter is found handwritten in the 6od. den. b., toi. 126 and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 98. According to the Jena manuscript in Buddeus, p, 206; in des Flacius lateinischer Briefsammlung; in Coelestius, toin. III, col. 88, and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 169. German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 433b; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 146; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 276, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 195. German in Chyträus, p. 453, and Latin, x. 311.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace! From your last letters I have understood, my dear Jonas, that you did not consent to what was demanded by the adversaries, and I have heard this with joy, and I expect daily that you will return, whether cursed [by the papists] or blessed. But, behold, in the meantime thunders and lightnings have come to me from some of our own, great and many, that ye have betrayed things, and for the sake of peace would concede more. Against this I say, I know that it has been written by ours that the means (eonäitionos) proposed by the adversaries have been rejected, and that the matter has been brought anew before the emperor. On this I stand, I believe. But since those so constantly and obstinately urged and cried out that Luther also was attracted to you, who would allow you all such things, and that more danger threatened the cause from you than from the adversaries, and it was a greater task to restrain you among yourselves than to act against the enemies: they have driven me to these words:

1) Instead of Ollinia in De Wette we have assumed oausain with Flacius and Buddeus.

"If it be so, then the devil hath wrought a pretty division among us." For I cannot suffer the conditions which you have entitled with the very sweet word, "Inexorable, indefeasible means," even if an angel from heaven were to press upon them and command them. For how do the adversaries deal otherwise than that they will not yield to us even a hair's breadth, but that we should not only admit the Canon, the Masses, the One Form, the celibate state, and the jurisdiction hitherto in use, but also confess that they have taught rightly, killed rightly, and done everything rightly, and have hitherto been falsely accused by us. That is, they have justified themselves by our own testimony, but want to condemn us, which is not merely a recantation, but to curse ourselves twice and thrice, and to bless them. But what shall I longer speak to thee of these things? as if ye yourselves did not see these exceeding infamies, and the insolence of those people, which is so abominable that it ought not at any time to be consigned to oblivion. And what would it be needful to provide so many means, if we would? Let us give them alone the Canon, let us give them alone the Anglican Mass: either of these two will be enough to deny our gauze doctrine, and to raise up that of those people. Next, if the bishops be given the former jurisdiction, all things are still more fully conceded; to be sure, while they remain enemies of the Gospel, they will tolerate preachers of the Gospel! But that this should be written by me, I am compelled to do so, as I have said, by the impetuous and vehement letters of ours; it is only to serve me as a testimony that I have written to you. For you know that I indicated beforehand how far, in my opinion, jurisdiction could be granted to the bishops, and reminded you sufficiently that you should not give more than you had 1) and to the prince himself I answered at that time extensively and particularly; but I tell fairy tales to the deaf. Therefore do me to know, my dear Jonas, whether more has happened in the meantime, which I would not like to see.

1) See Docs. No. 1058 and 1062.

For I do not see what harm can come from what has been done so far since the last letters, since the matter has again been referred back to the Emperor. But see to it that you do not do anything that might cause division among ourselves. Peace may be as great in our eyes as it can be, but the author of peace and the arbiter of wars is greater than peace, and more to be revered than peace. And it is not for us to suppose future wars; it is for us simply to believe and confess. I do not write this because I suspect that you will concede something, but the almost frightening vehemence of the letters with which ours have castigated me compels me to fear even where everything is exceedingly certain. Henceforth I too will not yield a hair's breadth to the adversaries, since I see how these exceedingly hopeful and wicked men play their game with us and mock us, puffed up and secure by our weakness. And I truly know the character of Eck, which is not by art, but by nature, so laid out that he is wont to lead away those who deal with him from the point in dispute and the cause at hand, until he tempts them into some snare against the cause. But enough of this.

I am almost bursting with anger and indignation. But I pray that you will cease this action, and desist from dealing with them, and return. They have the confession, they have the gospel. If they will, let them; if they will not, let them go to their own place. "If there be war, let it be; we have asked and done enough." The LORD hath prepared them for a sacrifice, to recompense them according to their works. But he will save us his people, even from the destruction of Babylon. Forgive me, I beseech thee, my dear Jonas, that I have poured into thy bosom this burden of my heart. But what I write unto thee, that write I unto all. May the Lord Jesus bring you back healthy and strong, and may he make you happy, amen. From the desert, September 20, 1530.

1083: Hieronymus Baumgärtner's Letter to Lazarus Spengler. The 13th of Sept. 1530.

From the original printed in Joh. Friedr. Mayers älksertat. äs lenitats kick! L1elnnektkonis, p. 40, from it (without the conclusion) in Salig's Hist. der Augsb. Conf., lib. II, 6Up. 8, p. 321.

To the honorable, wise Lazarus Spengler, town clerk at Nuremberg.

My kind willing service before. Dear Mr. Clerk of the Council! I cannot refrain from telling you, in good faith, what I consider the action of this Diet to be, as much as it affects faith. God grant that I am not found to be a true prophet in this. And first of all, it is not known to you from all the actions that have taken place so far what has happened to our part, now through this devil and then through another devil, who disguise themselves in a good form, even at times in the guise of angels of light, and transform themselves. Although the devil has never obtained his will, nor has the means proposed by our part ever been publicly accepted, we find so much that at present the opinion is still to bring such means into the parting for granted; and although this does not happen, they have never done any act in vain, but have always wrung something from us, which we have granted to yield. They will keep this indulgence for themselves, and one day they will make use of it when it is most inconvenient for us. God, however, has decreed by grace that the confession be given out and handed over once, otherwise our theologians would have long since confessed another, as they would gladly do if they were followed, even though they are unequal to one another. Philip has become more childish than a child. Brentius is not only clumsy, but also coarse and rough. Heller 1) is full of fear; and these three have made the pious margrave quite mad and fainthearted; they persuade him what they want, although I notice that he would gladly do right. The pious reeve 2) must have much spoken of him in his absence, as: if he were still here, so many good and peaceful things would not have been accomplished so far. The Elector has no one who understands this trade, except the one Doctor Bridges; but he has been brought to the point that he now also acts with worries, because he has no support from anyone. For the other Saxon theologians are not allowed to speak publicly against Philip, since he is the one who has the

1) "Heller" is the margraval chancellor of Brandenburg. 2) Georg Vogler, chancellor of Onolzbach.

He stretched out his head in such a way that he recently said to the chancellor of Lüneburg: "Whoever may say that the next means handed over are not Christian is lying as a villain. To which he was answered: He that saith the contradiction 3) 2c. And besides this, one does not cease to disparage in many ways those who show themselves Christian and brave in this, as then the Hessians, who have kept themselves quite well and honestly in this, have been publicly accused before us; see to it that we are also treated in the same way. In sum, if we do not soon receive a harsh, ungracious farewell from Imperial Majesty, then we would be in danger. Majesty, we would not be let go until we were brought into the fish traps, so that we would forfeit God's grace and not gain the emperor's. For the being has hitherto granted steadily: when often the princes with each other, then one comes ridden to the Elector, tells him how he means the matter faithfully and well 2c. He has understood this or that from the Emperor, and if one escaped alone in this or that piece 2c., the matter could still be helped. Philippus is there immediately, puts articles, glosses the 2c., that is then carried about in the meantime by Heller and Brenzen also in the margrave; if one then requires us to it and we do not let ourselves thus the pre-cooked porridge well taste, then it is of an unwillingness, and the theologians run around, say, we would not like to suffer peace, as if peace would be certainly to be received by our yielding. They only want to hit with the landgrave, whom they really disparage in this. What good must come of it in the end among ourselves, you must assume as an experienced man. For this reason I can again think of nothing useful, for I will soon depart. If it now goes out the rough way, as the emperor intends, then it is to be feared that the gospel will be taken from us by force, as we well deserve; and although this is highly burdensome, it is nevertheless easier to answer to God, than that we should freely grant arbitrary ways, by which it would be stolen from us with stratagems. Therefore, it is necessary to call upon God diligently to help the matter Himself, for it is truly beyond human reason. ksriit lsx a propretis st 8upi6ntia a 8api6ntidu8. Some Schnepf still has a beak to sing Christianly and steadily, for which reason he has often been mocked scürriliter by others. Outside of him, for the sake of all theologians, we already wanted to be one with the Widertheil. I have told you all this.

3) To add: namely, that they are Christian, he is a villain.

as one who would like to see things well, no less than I, may not leave it undisclosed. I wish to express my willingness to serve Mr. Hieronymus Ebner, otherwise you will know how to behave towards others for the sake of the persons named herein. God grant us all his peace. ### 1084. Philipp Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. Sept. 1, 1530.

This letter is found in Oŭtr̃ueus, p. 306; in Ooelestinus, torn. III, col. 63, and in the 6orp. Rec. vol. ii, 335.

Translated from the Latin.

To D. Martin Luther, his very dear father..,

Three days ago we concluded our conversation. For the means of comparison of the One Form of the Sacrament, of the Canon, of the private mass, likewise of the celibate state, we do not want to accept. Now the matter has been brought before the emperor once again, so that I cannot know what will happen. Let us only ask Christ to guide the Emperor's heart to preserve peace, of which we are now in great need, not only we, but all of Germany.

You cannot believe how hateful I am to the Nurembergers, and I do not know what others are, for the sake of the jurisdiction restored to the bishops. In this way, our people are only fighting for their rule, not for the Gospel. Baumgärtner wrote to me: "I may have been bribed by the Roman pope with so much money, but no better way could have been devised to restore papal rule than the one we have done. I have not fahxed or dropped any doctrinal articles at this time. Only they were angry about the worldly things, which are not ours to take away from the episcopal power. I hope we will soon know what conclusion the Emperor will come to. Farewell. On the day of Aegidii [Sept. 4, 1530].

Chapter thirteen, section nine.

Of the Emperor's action with the Protestant estates and further attempt at a settlement by various deputies sent to them.

A. How the Emperor personally summoned all princes, princes and estates on Sept. 7, 1530, and what happened there.

1085. lecture, in the emperor's presence by Count Palatine Frederick to the Protestants. 7 Sept. 1530.

The four following documents are from Müller's Historie, lib. III, 6ÄP. 33, p. 842. also in Chyträus, Historie der Augsb. Conf., p. 457. Compare Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 391.

It would have been Her Imperial Majesty's Majesty had entirely hoped that they would respond to Her Imperial Majesty's many kind admonitions. Majesty's manifold friendly admonition, after having delivered

The two princes, who have made this request to her, have agreed with her Majesty to settle this matter in its entirety.

And although her Majesty hoped for this in vain, her Majesty nevertheless graciously granted, at the request of several princes, that a committee be appointed by both parties and that a settlement be reached by the same, about which her Majesty again raised new hopes for a good agreement. Now, however, Her Majesty hears with great displeasure and complaint that they are at odds with the others in the most important articles, of which Her Majesty is not aware. For her Majesty could not have thought that they, who are so small in number, should introduce such an innovation against the ancient and holy usage of the whole Christian Church, and adopt a peculiar doctrine, which was taught by the Pope, her Majesty, King Ferdinand, and all the princes and estates of the Holy Land.

The kingdom, indeed the whole world's kings, and all their forefathers' doctrine and faith would be alien to them, and they would be allowed to remain so. But because they now desire to establish a concilium and a peaceful parting, her Majesty, who is inclined to peace, would be obliged to request the pope and other Christian potentates that a concilium be announced as soon as the place is settled; her Majesty also wanted to take this upon herself and promise them; but with this assurance that in the meantime they will also adhere to the religion to which her Majesty and other princes are attached. For that their Majesties should assemble a council, and no less leave the matters thus undiscussed, nor resist this innovation, nor abolish the same, every one could easily see how difficult such a thing would be for their Majesty and the others.

1086 Answer to the Protesting Estates. Sept. 7, 1530.

See the previous number.

You should have sent Imperial Majesty. Majesty's report with all due respect. And when Her Majesty had first reported how they, Her Grace and the others, had raised new sects and laws, and had undertaken to separate themselves from Her Majesty and other Christian estates, that they should have refrained from doing so, they gave this "most humble" report to His Majesty: that they were in no doubt where His Majesty had raised new sects and laws, and that they should have refrained from doing so. Majesty this "most humble" report: that they are in no doubt where Imperial Majesty is to be found. Majesty of all the actions as they occurred in the Committee, they would not find, if God wills, that they have raised some new sect against the Holy Scriptures and the Gospel, even if their graces should be sorry that they should have committed some new sect; Much less would it have been found in their hope that, according to God's word, they would not have wanted to compare themselves in the committees; for what the princes and others, who were appointed to the committees, would have indicated, that is clear from the Scriptures, which they delivered to the committee, which would undoubtedly have been delivered to the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty would have been handed over. That the Imperial Majesty also offered to set up a council and to take possession of the pope in it 2c., her electoral and princely graces together with their co-convenors expressed their thanks. graces, together with their kinsmen, in all submissiveness, in this way that they would be submissive in the hope that Imperial Majesty would establish and promote such a common, free, Christian council, also with the moderation of the Pope.

and in the Empire of the German Nation, as the decrees of the previous Imperial Diet and Her Majesty's approval of them, without distinction, also expressly and clearly state. For the aforementioned agreements, which speak without distinction and refer articles and disagreements on both sides to a general, free, Christian concilium as the proper way to act and decide such matters, do not impose on their electoral and princely graces, nor on the others, the right to act and decide such matters. Nor do they impose on the others to restore before the Council the abuses that have fallen by God's word and order, since they would not know how to do so with God and conscience, and it would be burdensome and quite impossible for their graces and for them. Thus, the three, who had been granted by their electoral and princely graces and princely graces had been ordered to the committee of the six, further reasons why their electoral and princely graces, together with their relatives, should not have done such a thing. They have indicated further reasons why their electoral and princely graces, together with their relatives, would not be obliged to do so, nor would they be able to do so in conscience. Majesty and a free Christian council of legal form a year ago, and against the decree, so that next there at Speier in some points against the abuses, which fell with their churl and princely lords and their relatives. and their relatives, has made innovations and wants to be attested. Where Her Majesty wished to insist on such a request, as they did not want to provide themselves with it, it would be contrary to the reported appeal and protest as innovation and inappropriate to the rights. For this reason they have most humbly requested that, after notification of the parting, and the Emperor's permission thereupon, they be allowed to proceed. M. to graciously promote and establish a general, free, Christian concilium in the Empire of the German Nation, outside of the desired settlement. And to graciously understand all this to their unavoidable necessity, the more their churlish and princely graces would also be the other kings. Graces also the other Caiferl. Majesty in all submissiveness with body and goods.

1087 Imperial replica to the Protestants by George of Truchsess. Sept. 7, 1530.

This document is found not only at the locations indicated in No. 1085, but also in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. II, p. 395.

The Roman Imperial Majesty should have sent the Elector of Saxony, the other princes, and the absent embassies, and their elector and princely sovereigns a letter to the Elector of Saxony. Gn. The Roman Emperor has graciously heard the answer of the cities, and has noted it on three points.

First of all, that their Electoral and Princely Grace apologized for the sect and new doctrine. They apologized and pleaded with the attracted sects and new teachings that they would not like to do anything or allow others to do anything that would be against God's word and the Christian church, and they should be heartily and faithfully sorry to separate themselves from the Christian church.

On the other hand, that their electoral and princely graces are against the Emperor. Grace towards Imperial Majesty of the most gracious grant and promise of a concilii to be undertaken most conduively in subservience.

And thirdly, as to the difficulty and impossibility of their Electoral and Princely Grace to restore the old customs of the church in the meantime. Their Majesties have objected that in the meantime the old customs of the church should be restored to a council and all things brought back to their former state. Majesty had ordered him, Mr. Georg Truchseisen, to report to her Electoral and Princely Grace. Her Electoral and Princely Grace.

And namely, as far as the first point is concerned, that Her Imperial Majesty has diligently considered all points and articles, as well as all actions, as they were taken by the fourteen persons for the first time, and subsequently by the six in the committee; but that the matters are much differently arranged and explained, than Her Electoral and Princely Grace have allowed themselves to be heard. and that their princely graces are still in many respects in the matter. They could not be sufficiently surprised that the members of the committee had gone so far and so deeply into the matter, and that they had given up so much, and yet the other part had neither considered nor wanted to accept it.

For the other point, as their Electoral and Princely Grace together with their relatives have drawn to a concilium without distinction and therefore to imperial agreements. Together with their relatives on a concilium without distinction and therefore on the imperial agreements, their electoral and princely lords and their relatives could not present or control the agreements made at the next imperial congresses held at Speier. and their kinsmen could not present or control the agreements made at the next imperial congresses held at Speier, as in those their lordships and princes and their co-associates could not present or control the agreements made at the next imperial congresses. They do not want to seal or execute them, but have protested against them and appealed to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty; which protestation and appeal Imperial Majesty considered a nullity. Majesty regarded as a nullity, and for that reason let it rest in its unworthiness, and for that reason her Electoral and Princely Grace did not bother with it. Therefore their electors and princes would not have to avail themselves of it, for at that time the lesser should have pursued the greater part.

And thirdly, because their Electoral and Princely ...together with their kinsmen...

Imperial Majesty and Papal Holiness, Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, and other Christian kings, authorities and potentates in such small numbers, respect and hold their Imperial Majesty responsible for the fact that the lesser number would follow the greater. Maj. that the lesser number would follow the greater. Therefore, once again, it is the wish of Her Imperial Majesty that Her Imperial Majesty be granted. Maj.'s request that his Majesty's electors and princes... His Majesty's electors and princes discover their mind and give a clear understanding of whether their electors and princes will suffer further action. and Princely Grace intend to suffer further action or to rest on their answer; for if further action were to be permitted, Imperial Majesty would endeavor in his own person to have it done. Majesty would strive in his own person to think of ways and means that would be conducive and conducive to peace and unity in the meantime of a Council, and so that they would sit and remain with each other in good peace; but where their Elector and Princely Grace oppose this, they would not be able to do so. If, however, their Elector and Princely Grace should oppose, refuse, and insist upon it, their Imperial Majesty would still have to consider themselves as a "concilii". Maj. would then nevertheless have to show himself to be a priest and patron of the church; and since it is now somewhat late, 1) Imperial Majesty wanted to give her electoral and princely authority to the church. Majesty wished to grant her churlish and princely grace, together with her relatives. Grace, together with their relatives, until tomorrow at one o'clock, and at the same time they would appear again and give an answer.

1088. of the Protestants by the chancellor Brück the emperor put answer. The 9th Sept. 1580.

This document, in addition to the locations given in No. 1085, is also found in Govlsstinus, tom. III., fol. 75, and in Gtivravus, x>. 314. This account is according to Brück's Geschichte, p. 139; another relation according to the Margraval Braudenburg Acts at Nuremberg, No. 39, Bl. 256 is found in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 410. On September 8 this letter was to be delivered to the Emperor, but by the Emperor's order the reply was postponed until September 9, when it was delivered orally by D. Brück.

Her Majesty has recently had it told, among other things, how all articles and actions of both committees have been reported sufficiently; but Her Majesty does not consider things to have been arranged in such a way that this part could have been heard. So this part would have known for certain, would also have been in the committee, where otherwise her Majesty would have been actually reported of all the same action as that which took place in the committees, and should also, to top it off, have been further reported by bestowal of divine power.

1) By D. Heller's hand is written in the margin: "Eodem die umb 7 oder 8 Horn In der nacht."

The Holy Father and the Holy Roman Emperor, by the grace of the Holy Roman Catholic Church, further decree in a common free concilio on the day of light that the doctrine, and especially the articles created in this part, are irrefutably founded in God's word, command and order, and that their sovereign and princely graces do not separate themselves from God's word and order in any way, nor do they allow any new laws to contradict it. They should also be heartily and faithfully sorry, if they had been or would later be convicted of this by God's word, that they should show themselves to be separated from the holy Christian church for a moment. For this reason, Imperial Majesty did not want to be ungracious. Majesty did not want to feel any ungracious surprise if the princes and others who had been appointed to the committees in this part had not been able to follow God's clear word, order and command in some of the proposals mentioned. And when the Imperial Majesty gave her Electoral and Princely for the other point, and among other things, this opinion that Her Imperial Majesty is not a little astonished. Majesty is not a little astonished that the churons and princes, together with their kinsmen, want to draw to the next Speierian parting, if they have protested against it and appealed from it, which protestation and appeal their Imperial Majesty considers a nullity. Majesty considered null and void, and therefore let it rest in its worthlessness, may their churf. and princely lordships and the same be granted the right of appeal. and the same of their kinsmen should not have to help themselves to it, as they should have pursued it at that time, as the lesser to the greater part. Hereupon the princes and princesses, together with their kinsmen, have humbly notified their Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, of their intention to do so. Maj. that they protest against the aforementioned next Speierian decree, and that they further appeal to their Imperial Maj. Maj. and a common, free, Christian council, for the unavoidable and urgent reasons that have been forfeited at length in the protestation and appeal mentioned above; and, as the princes and rulers of this part may not otherwise remember, with this difference, as far and as the reported Speierian act, together with the parting, would be contrary to the doctrine and customs that are used and practiced among them by divine word, further or otherwise. In addition, it would be a great honor to know that the electors and princes have not so far and so completely concealed all the acts that took place at Speier: the electors and princes of this part would have been the greater part of their imperial majesty, as their allies. Majesty, as their most gracious Lord and Emperor, to subservience with the rendering of urgent aid, to resistance of the hereditary enemy, Christianity. of the same name and blood, of the Turk; item, with entertainment of regiment and court of chamber, nothing less than other electors, princes, and estates submissively shown. Thus the Electors and Princes of this part know no other than that of their Imperial Majesty. Majesty's most gracious granting of the Concilii, which they had yesterday 1) been obtained by Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Instruction at the beginning of the aforementioned Imperial Diet at Speier, by Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Governor, Royal Dignities of Hungary and Bohemia, 2c. together with the orator ordered by their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and the orators and commissioners appointed by them, and that some action had been taken before they appealed; and that such action had been submitted to their Imperial Majesty's most gracious permission. Majesty's most gracious grant has been directed primarily to the partings of the preceding ones proclaimed and held by Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Imperial Diet, in which it was unanimously acted and resolved to establish a general, free, Christian Council in the German Nation. That, nevertheless, the Christian Princes and Princes of this part have not been able to accept the foregoing agreements, together with the notification of their Imperial Majesty's most gracious permission. Majesty's most gracious permission (where they nevertheless should not have to comfort themselves at all of the next Speier farewell), namely the farewells at Nuremberg in the fourth and twentieth, then at Augsburg in the 25th, and at Speier in the 26th year. For this reason, the princes and lords, together with their kinsmen, hoped and did not doubt that their imperial majesty would have the opportunity to report to the court. Majesty would graciously consider the occasion of their necessary protest and appeal as a right-loving emperor; in particular, that such an appeal to their Imperial Majesty and a common Christian authority would be granted. Majesty and a common Christian council: for this reason Her Imperial Majesty would allow such an appeal to be made. Majesty would therefore graciously respect such an appeal, until due justification and vindication in the said council, which the Prince and Reigning Prince, together with their kinsmen, have offered to do there in case of necessity, in accordance with their lawful dignities. So also Elector, Princes and Cities without need to be, respect Imperial Majesty. Majesty with a dispute, whether they, as the lesser part, would have been obliged to follow the greater part in these matters at the next Imperial Diet at Speier, since this is one of the most important complaints and causes, for which they should appeal to Imperial Majesty and a Council. Majesty and to a council, of which they offered to do due justification in the said council.

1) on September 7. But because the communication of this answer by the Emperor was postponed to September 9, it no longer fits.

Therefore, it is in the most humble hope, and especially since the above-mentioned imperial treaties are unconditional and outside the scope of what their Imperial Majesty had announced to them yesterday, that a common, free, Christian council will be agreed upon by their Majesty. Majesty yesterday ordered them to conclude on a common, free, Christian concilium, that Her Majesty would graciously promote and establish such a general, free, Christian concilium outside of such measure, therefore they also ask Her Majesty, as their most gracious Lord, in all subservience. But when Her Imperial Majesty finally requested of the Elector, the Princes, and their kinsmen that they discover their minds and give a clear understanding as to whether their sovereigns and fathers and they, the cities, would suffer any further action in the Articles, or whether they intended to rely on the previous decision, then Her Majesty wished to make an effort in her own person, and to consider ways and means that would be conducive to peace and unity in the meantime of a concilii 2c. Thus the Princes, Princes and their kinsmen thanked her Majesty, her most gracious Emperor, most humbly, with further notice: Her Imperial Majesty had undoubtedly heard from the report of the action of both committees that those, as Princes and others, who had been appointed to the said committees, had allowed themselves to be heard in the same committees to the utmost, and as much as they might consider that could be proposed by them for consideration; so they had also heard from Her K. Majesty that they had been appointed to the same committees. Majest. They would also have understood from Her Majesty's remonstrance that Her Majesty They would also have understood from Their Majesty's reproach that Their Majesty was displeased that the others of the committee were so far and deeply opposed to this part. Therefore, the Elector, Princes and related cities may well take care that nothing else happens with the further action to be taken on this matter than that their Imperial Majesty endeavors to have the matter resolved, and that others are to be appointed to do the same. Maj. would be troubled, and other affairs of the Empire would be delayed in vain. But to act on a peaceful arrangement in the middle of the Concilii, so that external peace may be preserved, this is what the Lords and Princes with their kinsmen have hitherto humbly offered to do, as they have then once again completely humbled themselves to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to take action on this matter with the Princes, Princes and Estates of the other part, to arrange and settle it together; and that they also want to keep it in the meantime, as they had hoped and dared to answer to God and K. Majesty in the much-touched Concilio, in the most subservient hope and consent.

Her Majesty would graciously show his support for a general, free, Christian Council in the German nation by means of the above-mentioned agreements. Thus, they would also command their submission to Her Majesty, as their most gracious Emperor and Lord, with the offering of their owing, also willing obedience, and their most submissive services, with the extension of body and goods 2c.

B. Of Melanchthon's correspondence with a certain friend of the Chancellor of the Bishop of Liège.

089. two letters from a certain friend of the Liège Chancellor to Melanchthon.

Sept. 4 and 5, 1530.

By Oo6l68tiuu8, tom. III, lol. 66, and in 6orp. kek. , vol. II, 341 and 343. - The bishop of Liège was Count Eberhard of the Mark; his chancellor A6Aickiu8 aThe chancellor's unknown friend is according to Förstemann's assumption (Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 380) Otto Beckmann, formerly professor in Wittenberg, and at the Diet of Augsburg 1530 envoy of the Bishop of Osnabrück.

Translated into German.

I.

I. My dear Mr. Philip! I have spoken carefully several times, both in jest and in earnest, with the Chancellor of Liège on our behalf, who said that he had passed on to his master your concern about the articles that should be left until a future Concilium, and that he was very anxious to keep the peace. But he does not see how these articles can be accepted without offence by learned, honest, unsuspicious men, or, as you write, dissimulated, especially from the marriage of priests, from the Mass which is customary with us. If these, as you wish, were to be abandoned, then, to use your own words, the perpetual sacrifice and also the whole priesthood would be abolished. So he demands of you that in certain articles you make a true and pure confession of yourselves and yours, and say briefly and sincerely what you believe. He fears, as I suspect, that there is something evil behind it, and that you pretend something else with your mouths than you believe in your hearts. Neither is there any lack of such, which say evil things to the sincere.

He would not like to be accused of a careless disposition by the Emperor, much less do anything that would not contribute to the general peace and unity of the Church. Maj., much less undertake anything that would not contribute to the general peace and unity of the church.

(2) I understand that he loves both princes dearly, and therefore does not want them and their principalities to come into danger, but rather that they should compare themselves with the Emperor at this Imperial Diet, if only yours would also consider a means so that this may be done without annoyance before the world and without contempt for the Emperor, of whom you yourselves are convinced how highly he holds religion and church customs. This much is certain, according to my insight, he will not be able to be dissuaded from the old use of the mass in any way or manner, nor will he change his mind by persuasion, least of all by abolishing the private mass altogether, not even among your people.

(3) Therefore, my dear Philip, since you are considered the most distinguished of your part here, the bishop of Liège demands of you that you indicate only in a few words what you have recently done widely, how your public masses should and could be accepted with the approval of the imperial majesty and the papal legate (with whom the bishop of Liège has also spoken about your cause these days), and that private masses remain unabolished. Majesty and the papal legate (with whom the bishop of Liège has also spoken on your behalf these days), and that private masses should remain unabolished, but in such a way that the mob does not take advantage of the clergy who want to say mass. Consider, my dear Philip, that the general welfare, unity in the church, and calming of the minds is not only of service to you and yours, but also to the princes. I do not know whether I may say that the Emperor already has the sword in his hand, because every day he is more and more embittered by these and those, who otherwise cannot easily be harnessed; but then, once he is enraged, it is difficult to appease him.

4. I have also tried everything with the highest and most noble to make peace and preserve your honor. In some things you might see through your fingers, if there were not one circumstance or another in the way. Some say that some of you promise great things, but we believe that when it comes to war they will not dare to do a thing, but will soon turn aside this and that, abandon you in the midst of danger, and even become your enemies, whereas before they had made an effort to fight under your banner. And notwithstanding the assurance given, they will here and there plunder all, and to an all the greater and inhuman defeat of yours, since the oath sworn to the emperor must serve them as an excuse and their procedure is considered by many to be right and praiseworthy out of a semblance of the greatest need. However, if they left you like this, you would have a lot to do, and many innocent people would be killed, as we have experienced more than once in our time. But I hope your cause may be settled without bloodshed, if you will act wisely. For I think that your public mass, at least the Latin mass, could be tolerated until a concilium, if only in the meantime the private masses were also read, and the priests, especially those who attend mass, were restored to their priesthood.

005 Beware, my dear Philip, lest any man have cause to say: This has been done by Philip's pretence. Be well, and greet your friends, especially Spalatin, who has sent me greetings in writing these days, in my name again in a friendly manner. September 4.

II.

To his dearest friend Philippus Melanchthon . to his own hands.

My dearest Philip! Yesterday, as I promised, I waited for you in St. George's Church, together with the Chancellor of Liège. I also recommended you to him in the best possible way as I was leaving, and explained to him how you were the one through whom peace could be established in the seemingly great danger, and the unity or at least the tranquillity of the Church could be restored, if some articles were accepted or left undecided until a future Concilium. To-day this man came to me and said that he had related our conversation to his Cardinal, and that he had answered very graciously and made known his desire for peace, if only the demands were not made too great. Be assured, my dear Philip, that I have tried my utmost out of an honest and righteous heart, so that only poor Germany, under the pretence of saving the evangelical truth, may not be afflicted with new disturbances and experience a far greater defeat than formerly in the miserable peasant uprising. And even if I were the very worst of men, you would not have to rely on any fraud or falsehood on my part, if only because at Wittenberg we have such a

(Z) just as I do not hope that you have ever been able to accuse me of any falsehood. It is only that I am too open-hearted in my joy, and that I gossip about many things at parties in jest, not out of malicious intent, but rather out of imprudence, of which it would perhaps be much more advisable to remain silent. No one has yet caught me in a lie or deception. I am not so far from the Wittenbergers, from whom I have enjoyed many a benefit, that I should not wish their cause to proceed happily, since I have at all times liked to see that everything was done by them in a modest way, not under the leadership of godless people in a seditious manner, and have not missed the simple evangelical sense in them, which does not deal with putting the world into turmoil. Therefore no one can or should suspect anything evil of me. If I am not able to do much with good progress, I would rather be regarded as a spectator in the meantime. I am not such a man as Philip should or could be deceived by; nor will your sincerity toward me permit me, as much as there is in me, to bring you to ruin or danger. The outcome will make it evident that I had no evil in mind, as some may suppose. The chancellor, if he can be trusted otherwise, seeks nothing else than the common peace of the church, even if it should be preserved by unjust means, that I use his own words. He adds that his Cardinal desires nothing else than to see the minds of the great united, especially in matters of faith, and peace established in the Church, indeed in the whole world, without bloodshed. I begged him that if the Cardinal, as a gentleman who is said to be unkind, should not be well disposed towards the sings to the Emperor, he would, according to his wisdom, for the sake of general tranquillity, appease him, perceive the present course, and think that things which have happened cannot be changed. And because I see that you alone are so concerned about peace, if it pleases you, draw up a few articles in which, in your opinion, something can be done, and send them to me so that I may send them to the Chancellor and ask him to take care of everything diligently and to inform me immediately what the Cardinal's attitude is at Liège. Fare you well. The 5th of September.

1) This confirms Förstemann's assumption that Otto Beckmann was the writer of these letters.

1090th Article, which Melanchthon sent to the above friend of the Chancellor of the Bishop of Liège on Sept. 5, 1530.

From Spalatin's copy in the common archive at Weimar RoZ- R, toi. 37, l7o. 2, Bl. 147. with several errors in Ooolostinus, torn. III, toi. 67. Latin also in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 381 and in Oorp. Rot. II, 345. German in Spalatin's Annals, p. 224. The chronology is according to Förstemann. We have corrected the text according to the Latin.

All that one admits in these articles appears clear from the writings so one has handed over.

Of both shapes.

Then we have excused those who take the one form alone. For since they have not the administration of the sacraments, they must take the sacrament as it is given them.

Therefore they take the one form alone without sin, and this excuse we are free to teach and preach. For hitherto we have also excused others, that they might have comfort for their consciences. But if we were to teach in general that one form should be required, it might be thought that we would hold the denial of the other form to be right. This we cannot do. We have also declared sufficiently that we do not want to give the one form to everyone without distinction, but only to those in whom we have noted that their consciences would be troubled to take both forms.

Of matrimony.

It is in the day that the prohibition of marriage grew entirely out of human rights, as the rights that have been invoked also testify. It is also the case today that the prohibition of marriage has not always been the same.

For there is a canon which says that the deacons remain in their church service if they have taken wives, and testifies that they are not able to keep chastity. But the priests resigned their office, and those who had taken wives were not therefore put under ban.

In two conciliar churches decrees and agreements were made that priests should not be forbidden to marry wives who had been taken before their priestly office.

But this notwithstanding, after that the pope Siricius forbade the priests to have wives, notwithstanding both previous conciliar separations and deacons.

crete. There have been many strange changes in this matter in Christendom. And such decrees have often been changed, not only in other nations, but also in German lands, as the histories testify. Therefore, if at this time, in view of the present occasion, such a prohibition of priestly marriages were to be alleviated, because it grew entirely out of human rights, the innovation would have a safer and better excuse, since the old decrees in this matter, which were in accordance with divine rights, have passed away.

For in this case ours have not done contrary to divine right.

Thus the necessity had to be taken into account. For many churches would have no pastors if married priests were to be deprived of their priestly office.

One would also have to think that the Christian religion would perish at the same ends if the pastors were deposed. Now it would be quick and unkind to let the whole religion, God's word and faith perish rather than to alleviate a few statutes or to see them at least through the fingers, when the same statutes, which are also burdensome in other respects, have been kept by very few priests in Christendom.

And it is a wonder that this statute is kept so swiftly and bitterly, as other innumerable statutes, for the sake of lesser causes, are eased and abated.

But this matter needs no disputation. For the matter speaks for itself, how hard this law is, and how few there are who keep it. Therefore it would have been right for this law to have given way to the divine law, which allows priests to marry as well as other people.

From the fair.

Messe halben has already been given an answer.

Namely, that ours keep the substantial and most noble parts of the Mass, as far as the Consecration is concerned.

But as for the other words, those who oppose them and those who oppose them indicate that they have some misunderstanding. For they put an interpretation on it that would not be necessary if the words of the Canon of the Mass were clear and loud enough.

But while ours teach that the application of the masses, and that the masses are to be said for good, comfort, and salvation, even to the

and not only to the living, but also to the dead, is contrary to the righteousness of the faith, as we have shown in our confession;

For this reason the words of the Canon are not read, from which the application of the masses is taken.

If we were to accept the words of the Application again, it would be as if we were condemning our own confession and doctrine.

Now we can by no means consent to this, contrary to our confession and the same reason.

Moreover, it is a matter of public record that there is not one canon held in the church everywhere, but in one church one canon and in another another canon. For this reason, the disparity of the canons does no harm to the faith.

Finally, because we do not teach against the faith, and we have offered such means as we believe to be just, we have provided that ours should not be further burdened against their consciences.

But since no agreement and peace can be made by the means to which we have offered ourselves, we ask that these matters be postponed until a future concilium, of which this German nation has been put off so often and so much, and that we now discuss how a peaceful arrangement can be decided and established until a future concilium.

1091. thirteen other articles, about which it is impossible to compare with the antithesis.

Latin at x. 323 and at 6o6l68tinu8, tom. III, col. 68. compare no. 1055. also in Oorp. Lkk, vol. II, 377.

Translated into German by Johann Frick.

The first, of justification, that we are justified before God by faith in Christ, not for our previous or subsequent works or merits, but by grace.

The other, that though good works be necessary, yet they merit not grace and righteousness; but faith taketh grace.

The third, that in confession the recital of all sins is not necessary.

The fourth, that though repentance be a necessary thing, yet for its sake sins are not remitted, but by faith are forgiven.

By this we believe the reckoning of sins, or the gospel. Therefore, in addition to repentance, faith must be added, which gives comfort in repentance and makes us certain that our sins are forgiven.

The fifth, that the canonical exercises of penance are not necessary for the remission of punishment.

1) The sixth, that for the true unity of the church not the equality of the statutes of men, but rather the agreement in the evangelical doctrine and in the use of the sacraments is necessary.

The seventh, that self-chosen worship, ordered without a divine command to merit grace, conflicts with the gospel and obscures the glory of Christ's merit.

The eighth, that the monastic vows and the services of the monks, which are instituted to the end that they should be a useful service to merit grace, are contrary to the Gospel.

The ninth, that though the statutes of the church, which may be kept without sin, and which are made for the sake of good order, are to be kept in the church out of love, to prevent offence, yet it is not to be supposed that they are a service necessary to salvation. And the bishops have no right to burden the consciences with such service. He, therefore, who refrains from such traditions without causing offence, does not sin.

The tenth, that because the invocation of the saints has no testimony in Scripture, it is an unwholesome and dangerous thing, and greatly diminishes the glory of Christ, whom Scripture presents to us as the only Mediator and Reconciler.

The eleventh, that those who will not admit both forms act contrary to the institution of the sacrament, without foundation in Scripture.

The twelfth, that the forbidden marriage of the clergy is contrary to the divine command, according to which, for the sake of fornication, every man shall have his own wife.

The thirteenth, that the Mass is not a work which, when applied to others, merits them grace ex opere operato, but that, according to the confession of the whole Church, the Lord's Supper is that sacrament by which grace is offered to him who receives it; which grace he really obtains, not by the mere outward work, but by faith, when he believes that grace and forgiveness of sins are offered to him there.

1) The sixth article of No. 1055 is omitted here, so only thirteen articles are counted here.

C. Of Duke Henry of Brunswick's conversation held with the Elector Prince of Saxony, Johann Friedrich, and the Chancellor Drück because of the monastery estates.

1092 Duke Henry of Brunswick's request to the Prince-Chancellor of Saxony and Chancellor Brück concerning the monastery estates.

The following three documents are found in Müller's Historie, lib. III, eap. 34, p. 858 ff.

He does not find anything else than that the Lutheran part must be allowed to stay with their articles until a concilium, as he therefore did not want to advise or help in any other way; however, while Imperial Majesty is being approached daily about monasteries, the Lutherans would like to consider whether it would not be expedient to keep the monasteries in the hands of the Emperor until a concilium. Majesty about the monasteries, the Lutherans would like to consider whether it would not be expedient to place the monasteries in the hands of Imperial Majesty until a concilium. Majesty's hands until a concilium.

1093. hereditary offer of Chur Saxony against Duke Heinrich of Brunswick because of the he united monasteries. 11 Sept. 1530.

This offer of inheritance is printed from Brück's Apology in Förstemann's 'Archive', p. 150. A copy is found in the Margraval Brandenburg Acts at Nuremberg, p. 189. The time determination is according to Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 419.

Although for the sake of the monastery estates in the committee of the fourteen persons, His Elector's Grace also of the others, a favorable and sufficient notice and offer of their part has been made. The Elector of Saxony has given in writing to the committee set up for the supplications, and that for the sake of the monasteries it is not held by this part alone, but also by those who do not presume to follow this doctrine: nevertheless, so that God's word might not be denigrated, as if one sought on this part more one's own benefit than God's honor, His Electoral Grace would like to have the monasteries to be protected. Grace, for the prevention of such a condition, suffer a harmless sequestration, so that the same monasteries would be administered by secular honorable people of nobility and other of the princes' dominions, among which the monasteries are situated, and who would be patrons and advocates of such monasteries, so that the same monasteries would not be alienated in goods, interest, pensions, fees, also in competent woods; to whom a due salary would be paid for their effort.

together with the costs, also decreed to Imperial Majesty for the sake of the sale. Majesty of the sale, so that the same would not take place, and the patrons would at the same time be assigned duties, as one would have to unite in a form, for two years, in the hope that the General Council would be preceded in the meantime. They should also (in order to find out how such estates would be managed) give account and information to some of the patrons' deputies and those who have knowledge of their administration, but the advocate's right of attorney and other rights, which he has brought to such monasteries with services, consequences, prohibitions, and the like, are in all respects unrestricted and reserved. And that such sequestration, together with the steward's duty, on account of Imperial Majesty, has no effect. Majesty, for the duration of the two years in question, where between them the general, free, Christian Council has not preceded, without any further relaxation, shall be dead, unbundled, and cease, after the end of the two years, to turn the same into other Christian mild ways. Majesty would know how to procure the same with others who, as indicated above, presumed to be outside this part of the monasteries, so that equality would be maintained.

1094. counter-indication of Duke Henry of Brunswick, which after the Churprince of Saxony Departure 1) happened to the Chancellor Brück.

See No. 1092.

He did not want to hide his confidential opinion, which he also wanted to report to his lord, the Elector of Saxony, but that he would remain unreported: "After he had a speech with his elector's son, Duke Johann Frederick, he noted the imperial decree. After he had a talk with his son, Duke Johann Friederich, he noted Imperial Majesty's opinion on it. Majesty's opinion thereon: if innovations were to be made on this part, and everything were to be restored to the state in which things were before this discord, then Imperial Majesty would make a concilium. Majesty would make a concilium and not impose any punishment against this part of the estates, since it would be found that they had acted unjustly. If, however, they did not wish to make such restitution, Her Majesty would apply the same, and nevertheless also make a concilium, but if it were then found in a concilio that this part had acted unjustly, Her Majesty would then apply serious punishment. The aforementioned council should indicate this to the Elector of Saxony in a confidential opinion, so that he would think about what his Electoral Grace wanted to do. His Grace wanted to do.

1095. lecture of the chancellor of Baden, against D. Brück and Melanchthon.

In Müller's History, li1>. III, eup. 35, p. 866 the four following documents are found from the unnamed uutor. upol. mtu.

Mr. Georg Truchsess, as a man of understanding, who likes peace and to see things well with all parties, who is also allowed to tell the king and some princes from time to time, more than others, sent for him on the previous Friday 2) at nine o'clock in the evening, and reported to him that things were not well with regard to the faith; for Imperial Majesty had offered to take further action in his own person against the Elector of Saxony and other of his electoral relatives. The Imperial Majesty had offered against the Elector of Saxony and other of his electoral relatives to take further action in his own person on the acts that had taken place in the committees, and not to let anything be lacking in all gracious diligence, so that these matters might be brought to Christian unity and peace; but the Elector of Saxony and his electoral relatives would not have done so. His Grace's kinsmen would have refused Imperial Majesty such proffered acts. Majesty had refused such offered actions, which would have greatly burdened Her Majesty, and it might perhaps happen that people would come to them who might have little opinion of peace on account of these matters, and that strife and all kinds of trouble might result for the Empire of the German Nation. For although Imperial Majesty Majesty would be a peaceful, benevolent Emperor, but nevertheless, since it would appear to her Majesty as if something were happening to her Majesty's contempt, as benevolent as her Majesty would otherwise be, she would again move violently in such a case. Now Mr. Georg Truchsess, as a good and born German, would not like it, if it were possible, to bring the matter to another way: for the two, as D. Brück and N. Philipp Melanchthon, could consider for themselves how it would be with Imperial Majesty, who would have given the Germans something to despise. Majesty, who would have little in their counsel of the Germans, so understanding as they were; the great multitude would be Spaniards and people of foreign nations, who would care little how the Germans fared. Because the Germans also do not want the Pope, France, and other foreign nations to have they might not see anything dearer, and they might faithfully advise them to do so, so that the Germans themselves would grow into each other and corrupt themselves. For this reason, Mr. George would have sent for him, the chancellor of Baden, as if he were known to him more than others, whom he also knew, and knew that he meant things no less well, and would have asked him to advise him how things might be brought about in other ways and to peace; for he had talked so much with the king today that he would have put up with him, as he would have put up with a foolishness from time to time in front of another. And whether the chancellor of Baden knew someone from this part of the people who would be more inclined to peace and unity than to discord, with whom one would like to come to further negotiations or discussions. From this the same chancellor would have answered Mr. Georgen that he really knew no one from this part of the people, and who would perhaps like to see these things to the best, because they, the aforementioned, Doctor Bridges and N. Philippen, for this reason Mr. Georgen would have called him. Philippen, for which reason Mr. Georg had asked him, because he had always been a good Saxon to the one before him, and had always had a gracious master in Duke Frederick, Elector, just as he had no less gracious will towards the present Elector, that he wanted to talk and hear about this with the aforementioned two, as they thought that the matters could be settled in a convenient way, but that he would like to remain unannounced by the two; for what he would do, he would do for himself, and out of faithful good opinion. For this reason, the aforementioned chancellor of Baden had both O. Brücken and N. Philipp Melanchthon ask him to inform them of this; now that the latter thought that the Elector of Saxony would be relieved if Mr. Georg were to support a mediation that would serve peace and unity, he would gladly use all possible diligence, and immediately began to specify means, and especially for the sake of both canons.

1096. answer of D. Brück and Philipp Melanchthon.

Although they had no knowledge of what matters he would have wanted to talk to them about, they nevertheless wanted to report to the Elector of Saxony, their most gracious lord; they did not doubt that his churfürstl. Grace would graciously note those of Mr. George and also the chancellor. But after they had noted from the Chancellor's account, among other things, as if Imperial Majesty should have taken it for granted that the Elector of Saxony and the Chancellor of the Holy Roman Empire would be pleased. Majesty's displeasure that the Elector of Saxony and the others should have refused her Majesty's further action, to which they offered themselves in their own person: O. Brück would have been present, would also have given the answer to Imperial Majesty by order of the Elector and the other Princes, also of the envoys of the cities. Majesty, but it would not have been on it, as such would have been necessary to indicate that Imperial Majesty had so repudiated the action, as if this part would not suffer it at all, but rather, the most humble thanks would have been given to Her Majesty's gracious will, and it would have been appended to it, Her Majesty would undoubtedly have heard from the actions that took place in the Committee of Fourteen that the Princes and others who were appointed from this part would have allowed themselves to be heard several times, as they would have allowed themselves to be heard to the utmost, as far as they would have paid attention to them, so that it could have been done with God and conscience; But thereupon their Imperial Majesty Majesty would have let herself be heard, her Majesty would have been astonished that on this part the means proposed by princes, princes and estates would not have been accepted, that therefore her electoral and princely graces could well respect also the envoys of the cities, if, however, Her Majesty were to bother with further action in such a way that, for Her Majesty's sake, it would be a futile endeavor and an unprofitable delay for other legal dealers who were drawn upon it. Graces, also the others of their part, unwillingly give or want to be cause. Therefore the Elector of Saxony and his Electoral Grace would not like to be given cause for this. Therefore it should not be imposed on the Elector of Saxony and his electoral relatives, where perhaps the disfavored would like to interpret it, as if this part of the Imperial Majesty's negotiation were to be dismissed. Majesty's negotiation; it would also undoubtedly, since it is meant for the sake of Her Majesty, quite subserviently, that the Imperial Majesty should have no objections to this. Majesty would have no objections against this part. But as to whether it would be expedient for the Elector of Saxony to have a further mediation, which would serve peace and unity between them and the Conciliation, which the Emperor would be inclined to promote in all respects, acted without danger, the Chancellor would now have heard in what manner the Imperial Majesty has been informed by the Electors, Princes, and

The envoys of the cities have therefore themselves given a submissive answer, because their electoral and princely graces, as well as the envoys, considered it to be the utmost request of their sovereign and princely graces. The envoys, too, considered it that the utmost request had been made by their electoral and princely graces. They also feared that it would be a mistake for them to do so. They also feared that, unless a peaceful parting or a rite were negotiated, without the confiscation of the articles of faith, further negotiation would be in vain. Or, if one ever wanted to proceed in such a way, that convenient and reasonable means would be proposed and given to this party in consideration (which the two alone indicated for themselves), so that the councils and also the envoys of the cities, which lords would not be at the place, and the other electors and princes, who are present, may also discuss the same in a proper manner, and the other estates and cities, who do not directly belong to the empire, and yet have also accepted the gospel, may compare themselves with their electoral and princely graces. and princely graces. The aforementioned two see this as useful and good, since the Gospel has been accepted in several Saxon and maritime cities, and for this reason most things have been laid down at the beginning, so that things may be settled by the grace of the Almighty, so that nothing untidy is done, if the cities are reported such a parting by the Electors and Princes of this part, and that now on this day, approximately after Christmas, a day and time be appointed, then and on such a day Imperial Majesty, ecclesiastical and secular, may declare the Gospel. Majesty, ecclesiastical and secular princes, or other decrees, and the Electors and princes, or some of them, would also come there, and decree such things for the attached cities, so that this part, after the consideration that has been given, and the proposals that have been made, could finally be heard as to what they consider they could or could not do with God and conscience. At the same time, the Imperial Majesty Majesty, so that it might not be taken for a delay or hindrance to Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's decision, which Her Majesty might have intended to make with other estates at this Imperial Diet at Augsburg, conclude what Imperial Majesty has decided. Majesty. Majesty's objections to this; and in the event that Her Majesty is not satisfied with the answer which this part would give on such a day, to have Her Majesty's resolution and parting published in accordance with Her Majesty's objections and pleasure. according to her Majesty's concern and pleasure. One would also know by and by who would be those among the estates who would like to bring these matters to an unanimous vote.

Some of them, especially the Elector's cousin, Duke George of Saxony, have taken it into their heads as if they had sworn to govern the Elector's lands and wanted to do so; but the Almighty would not grant them this, whether God wills it or not; Imperial Majesty, as a most benevolent and wise Emperor, would not follow their will. Majesty, as a most benevolent, most wise Emperor, would not follow their will. As for the monasteries that have been disposed of, up to now nothing has been done with the Elector of Saxony, nor with the other princes or cities, nor has any notice been given as to what special complaint the Imperial Majesty would have on account of this, that her electors and princes and the cities would have to report it. and the cities should have reported it, and again reported their need. For the previous evening a prince 1) had talked about it with Duke John Frederick of Saxony, son of the Elector, and had also raised the article, the dissolved monasteries and the restitution of the same, somewhat high. To which the said Duke John Frederick also gave the same answer, with request that his Princely Grace be informed. Gn. Father would be free to offer and do such monasteries, so that it should not be considered as if some own benefit would be sought in it, if one would also act on the article that only things of faith would not be confiscated, no burden would bear on him in this part, the Two Eighthths, as had often been indicated.

Her Majesty, as a wealthy Emperor, wanted to know well how to proceed. Therefore he wanted to ask the two aforementioned once again, as they had heard from him, to inquire of the Elector of Saxony, as the most proceeding, whether his Electoral Grace, together with the others, would allow Mr. Georgen [Truchsess] to have the same two as a doctor. Gn. together with the others would allow Herr Georgen [Truchsess] to speak with the same two, as Doctor Brücken and Magister Philippsen, about further means, if God would grant his grace. And even though he would have been concerned that the objection, as we have stated, would, even if it were to be acted upon, be difficult to raise with Imperial Majesty, since it was said that Imperial Majesty would be completely satisfied in the matter. Majesty would be quite inflammirt in the matter, so that her Majesty would want to receive science conducive to the end. Nevertheless, he did not want to refrain from talking to Mr. George about it, whether he knew something to be done by the Royal Majesty in Hungary and Bohemia, so that he, the Chancellor mentioned, would like to say that as much as he had been present at these actions, or had heard talk about them, he could not feel otherwise, because the fact that the King liked to see things well would also often bring his brother, our Lord Emperor, back to other ways, if the others would have moved Her Majesty a little at times. And if it would please the Elector of Saxony, then the two of them should come together with Mr. George himself, and the sooner the better, for delay would be detrimental, otherwise they would take leave of each other.

But they wanted all this, without order, also without foreknowledge of their most gracious lord, the Elector, but for themselves, and without danger, also without obligation, to have talked with the Chancellor. And although he himself would have to consider what the Elector of Saxony might agree to for the sake of such a conversation alone, since the matter would also concern the other princes and estates:

E. Of the new means of contract put forward by Baron von Truchsess and Vehus.

1099. of the Lord Georg von Truchsess and the chancellor of Baden, D. Hieronymus Vehus, proposed new means of settlement.

Sept. 10, 1530.

This writing is found in Latin at <sup>p. 318</sup> and in Ooelestinus, torn. III, fol. 78. German in Müller's Historie, lib. III, oup. 30, p. 875; in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 416, in another redaction from the Margraval Brandenburg Acts at Nuremberg, no. 40, p. 263. The meeting took place on September 10 in the Moritz Church at Augsburg. In his history, p. 161, Brück speaks of a double copy of these articles, one of which was given to Chancellor Brück on Sept. II, the other to Margrave George of Brandenburg on Sept. 13.

These essays could be completed by 14 learned men, who are to be assembled for this purpose.

First, the compared articles could be brought into a special formal essay.

On the other hand, the remaining articles, for which there was either no agreement at all or only some agreement, should also be described and included in the agreement, but the decisión should be left to the future concilio.

Thirdly, that the monasteries still in existence be allowed to keep the ceremonies and rules that have been in use until now, and that nothing of the ecclesiastical goods be sold or used for other worldly benefits until the Concilium. However, as far as the empty monasteries and their revenues are concerned, these could be administered by certain Sequesters ordered by Imperial Majesty with all fidelity and diligence until the Concilium, but with reservation of the Juris Patronatus to which the Electors and other Collators are entitled. In addition, those persons who leave their order and profession are to be restored to their former status, and they are to be provided with emergency maintenance until a council is held. Since an abbot or prelate who has been expelled from the monastery with his brothers and driven into misery also demands restitution to the monastery, this is to be effected.

The monastery income, however, was not to be granted to them, but to others who had been appointed for this purpose, who were to manage the administration in such a way that the monks and nuns could obtain necessary sustenance from it.

Fourthly, as far as the masses are concerned, these could be held in the future with the clothing, singing, and other ceremonies that have been customary up to now, especially with the reading of the two canons, but that about which a dispute might arise could be reserved to the decision of a concilii.

Fifth, concerning the communion under both forms and the marriage of the priests, the Electors and other states related to the faith should show themselves in such a way that they may keep a good conscience and give account to Imperial Majesty as well as to the Concilio, but especially to God. Majesty, as well as to the Concilio, but especially to God. If, however, it should be found at a future Council that some have not remained within such limits, and thus have done or permitted something contrary to their conscience, they would also, as is incumbent upon obedient Princes, not refrain from seeking Imperial Majesty's judgment in this matter. Majesty's judgment in this matter.

Sixthly, in order that common peace, tranquillity and unity may be preserved, the Elector of Saxony, and other princes and estates related to his faith, should not change anything in matters of faith and religion until a general and Christian council has deliberated on the matter and defined something definite.

Sevently, the Elector and his relatives in the faith should not take anyone into their protection and protection as their own subjects.

Finally, several reported Princes, Princes and Estates, like other Imperial Estates, should render obeisance to Imperial Majesty in these Imperial Diet matters, which are to be clearly named along with the others.

To the other means.

To consider the first two articles properly, and to say in what unfaithful manner the pieces on which we agree may have been recorded, would, as you can easily imagine, be endlessly disputed, and would probably not be settled in two years. Therefore, one must never get involved in such quarrels. Our confession is clear, and the emperor was surprised that the popes gave in so much. Therefore nothing more is to be hoped for.

On the third.

The Concilium must be allowed as a human means.

This is what we must do, and if we do not do it, we commit sin and injustice. It is written, While men slept, the enemy came and sowed tares. We must therefore beware lest we sleep, and let tares be sown, which cunning men seek.

On the fifth.

That's bacon on the trap. That would be to confess tacitly that one has done wrong, and to take the punishment upon one's neck wantonly. We do not want to reach for the cross ourselves (or make it for ourselves); but if God sends it and lays it out, we want to bear it patiently.

To the sixth.

That is, to kill Christ, and to deny the word, that it should not continue, when it is written, The word of God shall not be bound.

Here's to the seventh.

Why should not a poor subject, who is persecuted by his tyrannical rulers, be received and lodged, when he goes from the same place to another, secure, and where the gospel is taught? This is to deny the word and works of love, since it is written, Save the widows, and judge the fatherless.

Without giving their authors, these articles are found in Latin in lostztstnns, tom. III, col. 79, and in Ol'lrnsus, p. 312. Afterwards in German in Walch. I. That the articles of faith according to the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, and the others on which there is agreement, be recorded by deputies of both parties and brought into the record or settlement.

II. That the articles on which there is no agreement at all, or at least not complete agreement, shall also be drawn up and entered in the bill, with the general condition (or reservation) attached: That these articles, on which there is no agreement, together with other articles and customs not specifically mentioned, which anyone does not intend to observe with a clear conscience, be referred to the decision and pronouncement of a general, free council, and that, however, each local authority should decree among its own that nothing be taught contrary to the common peace and tranquillity there.

III. that the monasteries and colleges (foundations), which have not yet been changed or abolished, be left free to keep their rules and ceremonies according to their conscience, with all their property and income, until the council; but that the monasteries and income of the foundations, which have been abolished, be administered honestly until the council by sequestri (or interimsverweser) appointed by Imperial Majesty. Majesty, shall administer them honestly until the Council, to which they shall also render account, but without prejudice to the right of the sovereigns, the patronage, the bailiwick (or bailiwick, xrutzkseturus), fiefs, and other customs (Herkommen), so that each prince, prince or estate had them before such change. Likewise, that the parishes, which are incorporated into the monasteries or foundations, and the schools are not deprived of anything; also that such expelled persons have their maintenance until the concilio.

IV. Masses are to be celebrated in the usual dress, chants, lections, and other Christian ceremonies, and all that essentially belongs to them. But what is in dispute and is said to be burdensome to the conscience, shall remain at the discretion of the Council.

V. In regard to communion under both forms and priestly marriage, the princes and those who hold it with them in this matter shall do so as they intend to answer first to God and then to the Imperial Majesty in the said Concilio. Majesty in the said Concilio. And if it is learned in the Concilio that one of the two parties has transgressed therein, he will submit to Imperial Majesty's judgment and command. Majesty's judgment and order.

VI. to preserve Christian peace and unity, the Elector of Saxony and the estates of his part shall not start any further innovation in Christian religion until the Concilio.

1102 Melanchthon's Letter to Luther. Sept. 8, 1530.

This letter is found in OoslksUnus, torn. III, kok. 75 and in Oorp. Usk. Vol. II, 355.

Translated from the Latin.

Philipp Melanchthon (deprives) M. Luthern of his greeting.

Yesterday evening the princes were in the imperial court (palace) until half past eight. They received this answer: the Emperor wants to hold a concilium, but according to the old custom of the Roman Church, and perhaps outside Germany, because of the Emperor's business; in the meantime, everything should be returned to the popes. But this is not yet decided. If our people still have something to advance in the articles that are being disputed, the Emperor wants to sit for eight more days and hear it. Today our princes will thank the Emperor for this, and they will say that they cannot give way in anything. In Ferdinand's jousting (tournaments) (since he received the fief from the Emperor in the open field, according to Austrian usage and law) six men died in one day. Two died because the rifle burst, and almost all the bystanders were hit. One of the soldiers, since the rifle was not properly aimed and it went off, was hit so that the bullet flew through his mouth and right through his brain, so that he immediately fell down and was buried under the grass. Another was stabbed by a fierce Spaniard, whom he would not avoid. The sixth was pushed down and drowned in the crowd as he crossed the bridge. The Margrave of Baden was beaten by the horse, so that he could not escape from such a show.

The king himself was thrown from his horse three times in the tournament. The king himself was thrown from his horse three times in the tournament, as the story goes, and the third time he is said to have been very wounded in one side. Fare you well. Given the 8th of September.

1103 Luther's Answer to Melanchthon's Letter. Sept. 11, 1530.

This letter is found in Latin in Lndāsus, p. 202; in Oo6l68tinn8, tona. III, col. 80 and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 162. In Walch twice, namely here and in the appendix, no. 16; in the latter place we have omitted it.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in the Lord! It seems to me an age since you wrote to me in your last letter that the conversation was over, 1) so much am I weighed down by the delay of this uncertainty, in which I await the last, either favorable or unfavorable, decision of the Emperor. Long ago there was a very certain rumor here that the Prince had escaped from Augsburg. Some say that he has arrived at Nuremberg, others that you will suddenly be with us. In the meantime, I prophesy many things to myself here. At last I am led by my thoughts to think that there are some who would like to put their strength into the means, whether I could perhaps attain peace. These thoughts are followed by my prayer and sighing of the heart; if this heart is not heard, it would be surprising if the head of the bishops were not governed by a great doom, and not a good one at that. 2) I am beginning to yearn for your

1) Melanchthon had made this announcement in the letter of September 1, No. 1084 in this volume. He then wrote again on September 4 (6orp. kek., Vol. II, 340), but in this letter he only reports that the decision was still with the Emperor. The preceding letter (if it could otherwise already be in Luther's hands) also brought nothing new.

2) This passage is very puzzling. Assuming Aurifaber's readings, pc> 88int instead of po88im, and nki instead of nisi, the translation of the preceding would be something like this: "who would like to put their strength into the means, if they could perhaps attain peace. These thoughts are followed by my prayer and sighing of the heart; if this heart is not heard, it would be strange to me. The head of the bishops is governed by a great doom, and not a good one at that." The translation given by us above might be understood according to the almost parallel passage towards the end of No. 1107.

God would have you return, though cursed by the pope and the emperor. For there is another greater than the pope, and the emperor, and their God, which saith, [Psa. 3:9], With the LORD is found help, and thy blessing upon thy people." The Lord will avenge the perfidy and wickedness of the Sophists and Papists.

2) I will not answer your Martin Bucer. 3) You know that I hate their game of dice and their craftiness; they do not please me. Thus they have not taught hitherto, but yet will not acknowledge it, nor repent; rather, they continue to assert that there was no disagreement among us, namely, that we should confess that they had taught right, but that we had falsely disputed against them, or rather that we had been senseless. Thus the devil opposes our confession on every side, since he can do nothing by force, and is overcome by the truth.

3rd Other things thou shalt know by the deputies of the Luebeckers, that is, by thy kinsman. I do not like that Pomeranus is absent, and yet I do not see how it could have been denied them, at least for a time. For both our church and our school are in great need of him, especially since I suspect, out of my age and health, and more properly out of weariness of life, that I will not have to see and bear this cursed world much longer. You shall do here what the Spirit shall give you. But, what I almost forgot, I beg you, my dear Philip, do not torture yourself with the insinuations of those who either say or write that you have given in too much to the papists). There must be weak ones also among ours, whose ways and infirmities thou must bear, if thou wilt not despise Paul Rom. 15:1. They do not sufficiently understand the jurisdiction restored to the bishops, nor do they take heed of the circumstances connected with it. And yet God would have the bishops accept them under these conditions; but they have not accepted their

1104. Spalatin's misgivings that the Elector of Saxony would interfere in further religious action ...shall not be admitted. The 14th of Sept. 1530.

This concern is first printed from Spalatin's own manuscript in the common archive at Weimar in Cyprian's Beilagen zur Historie der Augsb. Confession, p. 206 and thereafter also in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. II, p. 428.

Although one does not need my poor consideration, I will nevertheless gladly indicate my subservient good opinion according to my duty, and it is just this: Whereas Roman Imperial. Majesty will be very sorry with the restitution of the ungodly ceremonies, war and other burdens, that nevertheless my most gracious and gracious Elector of Saxony, princes and their relatives, where they otherwise consider the things to be godly and righteous, will be due, not to enter into any further or other actions and agreements with anyone, but to stand by their previous confession and appeal to a future free Christian council and not to be forced or persuaded to do so, for many necessary reasons.

First of all, that there is nothing fruitful in the I hope to raise the opposite.

Secondly, that the opposite party intends to misuse God's word and this part of it, by engaging in further action, solely as a cover for their shame, to their own advantage, and to this part's greatest disadvantage, disgrace and harm, to raise up again all their ungodly nature, life, teachings and abominations, and to make people believe them to be right and godly.

Thirdly, that the other party's pretence is certainly full of deceit, fraud, and deceitfulness, and hopes to reestablish the abominable articles of the papacy, of purgatory, of indulgences, and other many other things, as if we approved of them all tacitly, and to preach and practice them as right, good, and salvific. Should it now come to further action, and the parting be established, then our part would have to contest the same articles with expressed words. They would not suffer this, and would come to great expansiveness, and yet nothing good would be obtained from them.

Fourth, what's the point of even thinking about the five...

What would have been the purpose of the present Concilium if all the articles in dispute, which is impossible, were now to be dealt with?

Fifthly, one should give way to the opposite and allow something contrary to God's word, which would cause eternal annoyance and eternal unbelief to the preachers of this part, as if one acted differently now than one had taught and preached up to now, it would also bring great diminishment to the princes and lords that they now so easily stepped out of their articles of confession out of human fear.

Sixth, first the tyrants would embellish all their murders with us, and if they attacked anyone, they would pretend that the Lutherans themselves had approved and consented to it at this Diet.

Therefore, there is nothing better than that no further action be taken, but that we otherwise offer ourselves most humbly to Imperial Maj. Maj. and ask for a peaceful decency, with notice that one, caused by many high moving urgent Christian causes, is not to get involved in any further way. So that Her Imperial Maj. Maj. and only to note that they do not seek anything unreasonable.

So they first of all offered to live peacefully with everyone, that only such victories would be done to them again.

Secondly, to obey Maj. in all other matters to all obedience.

Thirdly, to faithfully manage, until the Concilio, not to allow any continuation of erroneous doctrine and sects against the holy sacraments 2c. in their lands and territories.

Fourthly, to give a permanent account of the disposed monastery estates to Imperial Majesty. Maj. in future Concilio to make a constant and irreversible account, of which they shall, if God wills, be well satisfied.

Fifth, to keep both of them in the meantime with the "doctrine, ceremonies and everything else, as they hope to answer to God and Imperial Majesty. Maj.

But if all this would not help, but the Imperial Maj. would threaten with restitution, war 2c. Maj. would threaten 1) with restitution, war 2c., it is true that it would be frightening if war, bloodshed and destruction of country and people should come about, since God is before us in eternity, which we are all reasonably obliged to use our greatest diligence, nothing saved on earth, to prevent; but it is also true that it would be a thousand times more frightening to hand over God and His holy word out of human fear. For how could one come to this, that for the sake of time...

1) "dräuen" is missing in Förstemann.

For 1) the almighty God still lives and reigns with an unabbreviated hand, who bears this high title, that he is called the LORD God of hosts, who is mighty of all host powers. This same mighty Lord can keep the angry nobles at home and call them to keep their swords in the scabbard, even against their will, if they were still so angry, raging and furious. In ancient times, the mighty king Sanherib of Assyria was as wicked and stiff in his mind as our present tyrants are, and he knew no other way, for he wanted to devour both the king Ezechias of Judah together with Jerusalem and the whole kingdom of Judah. But God turned it around, as we read in Isaiah 37, that he told King Ezeziel, "Sanherib shall not reach Jerusalem, nor shall he attack it, but shall turn back and leave him alone. Yes, that the angel of God slew the same tyrant in one night 185,000 men. That also shortly thereafter Sanherib was stabbed to death in the Temple by his own sons, Adramelech and Sarassar. The same God can also do strange things to our great nobles and cause them so much trouble that they may forget us.

If not, we must nevertheless not surrender God and His precious, sacred Word to the devil and the Antichrist, but hold fast to it, and with God's help remain true to it, considering the manifold rich promises of God in the Old and New Testaments, and the eternal God granting His divine grace, spirit and strength to our pious princes, lords and their relatives, and to all of us, to praise Him and to promote His divine Word, Amen. 1105: The consultation of all Protestant theologians about the means "proposed" by Truchsess and Behus, Sept. 17, 1530.

Latin at Oo6t68tinu8, tom. III, col. 80, and imperfectly at Oüvtr-n6U8, p. 320. Completely in Oorp. Uek. vol. ii, 373.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

(1) First of all, we must confess that it is dangerous to indicate by name the articles which are thought of, and at the same time (or together) to publish them.

1) In the original: "When".

Draw. For the opponents would like to draw up the other articles, which are not mentioned by name in the confession and yet are disputed, at the same time and consider them known and revoked.

(2) After this, there seems to be some annoyance and offence. For the list of all the articles would lead many to think or say that we have agreed with the adversaries, and have fallen in with them, and have gone over entirely into their camp, and that because we have made a stand with them they are also called brethren; and that, though we were not yet agreed in all the articles, yet we regarded such things as nothing, that thus their errors were padded, and they were strengthened.

(3) For these reasons and reasons, many think it better not to adopt a splch list of articles. But we think that, in order to preserve peace and harmony, we can finally put up with such a proposal, with the measure:

(4) If there is to be no danger, it is necessary that the articles in dispute, which are not mentioned by name in our confession, should be expressly mentioned, such as the Pope's supremacy, purgatory, indulgences, 2c., with an appended general reservation, which is found in the same document, since we were asked whether we wished to enter and defend more articles?

(5) As to the grievance, it is our opinion that, since this treaty is made only between princes, and concerns only the common and temporal peace and external tranquillity, it is a work without grievance, and that no just and sufficient cause can be adduced why this settlement of common strife and other grievances should not be made.

006 For we do not thereby include them (the adversaries) in the company and number of the brethren, but only testify thereby concerning which articles we are agreed, and concerning which we are still divided.

(7) For that one part should not publicly punish and condemn the other in sermons is not hereby decreed or forbidden; but the princes may only, for the sake of common peace, make covenants and settlements among themselves for the preservation of public tranquillity, which may well be approved with a good conscience. It has therefore seemed advisable to us to report and recount by name the disputed articles, of which there is no small number; as, of justification, of merits, of the doctrines of men, of confession, of pardons, of vows, of the power of bishops, of both forms, of the Mass, of marriage, of Invocation of the saints, of the unity of the church, with the added reservation that some of our teachers consider such articles necessary and Christian.

(8) For in this way all will see that we do not agree or agree with their errors and opinions, and this reckoning will be, as it were, a clear confession of which we must give account to friends and enemies. For if the papal teachers want to know in which articles they agree with us, and in which they teach differently from us, then we must certainly declare and explain it, as we also did in Marburg with the disputed articles; but for this reason we have not included them in the number of the brethren, although the opponents have desired and earnestly asked for it. If, however, they do not wish the disputed articles to be remembered by name and counted, or if they wish to add any other burdensome reservations or conditions, such as that nothing of such matters should be brought up in the churches, then all such negotiations should be left undone. We also think that the opponents will not take up the matter so eagerly, but will soon give up the trouble of recording it, so that their ignorance and simplicity will not come to light before everyone.

(9) And though there are many things to be considered in this first article, of which it would be too extensive and tedious to speak separately, yet we all admit this, that in the said manner and condition the common peace may well be concluded.

010 But to the question, Whether the bishops ought to be allowed to abate and concede jurisdiction, and certain other things, so far as they do not dispute the doctrine in use in our churches, when they have already persecuted adherents of the same doctrine in other places? we answer that this is a dangerous thing, for many would certainly say that we were strengthening the other part by indulging in such things, that we were unstable, and that we could not in good conscience defend or protect the doctrine which we had once accepted to maintain, and that we were trying to restore the old customs and to reintroduce the papal doctrine into the church, which would turn many away from our doctrine.

(11) Likewise, that the bishops should be regarded as people under ban, and that we should not greet them; therefore we would do wrong to offer ourselves to their obedience. To this we reply that it is unnecessary to act on what concerns the presentation and ordination of ecclesiastical persons.

meets. For since the bishops do not accept our doctrine, but only tolerate it as a weed, as they call it, by silence, they will of course burden all who appoint (ordain) them with intolerable burdens and unjust oaths.

(12) Our preachers and church servants will also not be able to seek confirmation from them because of danger to life and limb, since they not only persecute, but also kill and murder those who are of our teaching. Therefore it is useless to deal much with this, unless the bishops themselves declare and let it be known how they are minded, and promise that they will confirm the preachers of our doctrine. But if the bishops will not confirm our preachers and ministers, they deprive themselves of their jurisdiction.

013 But if they desire to have jurisdiction in matrimonial matters, we think that they have no great objection to judge and adjudicate, if only they do not manifestly act contrary to the word and commandment of God. For the jurisdiction and obedience of the priests are not merely worldly things, which are due to the bishops from the custom and order of men; therefore, such is to be reasonably held in honor and recognized as valid.

(14) Nor do I see why the imperial majesty cannot entrust a secular prince with the recognition and judgment in matrimonial matters. First of all, the ban is something secular, although it actually belongs to the church and must be administered by a priest (or pastor). Everyone will know that the punishment of common and manifest sins belongs to the clergy and ministers of the churches. Nor is such authority and jurisdiction of the bishops burdensome or detrimental to any but those who sin, for whom it is, however, expedient that they be punished and restored.

015 But that some pretend that the tyranny of the bishops is thereby strengthened and exalted, it is to be known that by such an indulgence (or grant) we escape the censure of those who are always laying upon us I know not what kind of factions and divisions, which is very vexatious and distasteful to us.

016 If then we sat down with the bishops in this manner, we might easily restrain such talk as is spread abroad. For it is written, As much as it is in you, keep peace with all men. For Zacharias also is under the power of one Caiph, and many others under the power of another.

rannet confessed. And though we restore them to the jurisdiction of the churches, yet we do not approve of their doctrine, neither do we call them happy therein.

1107 Luther's letter to Nicolaus Hausmann about the above last, but fruitless actions at Augsburg, and that the Elector has taken leave from there with the Emperor. Sept. 23, 1530.

This letter is found handwritten in the Oock. oüart. 6otü., col. 451 and in Aurifaber, vol. III, p. 101. Printed in Luckäsus, p. 210 and in De Wette, vol. IV, p. 171.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in the Lord! Although I believe, my dear Nicolaus, that you know everything that is going on at Augsburg, now that the younger prince has returned home and has undoubtedly brought everything with him in abundance, I will nevertheless, since you ask me to do so, briefly communicate as much as I have. I believe that you have heard that arbiters were chosen to discuss doctrinal unity and peace, among whom was Philip. But since they could not agree, the matter was again referred to the emperor, whose judgment is awaited, although in the meantime they wrote in their last letters that they were once more consulting with each other about the means of peace, which, however, they have not indicated. In the previous negotiation, the opponents demanded that we should permit the private masses, likewise that we should retain both [the major and minor] canons with a suitable gloss, namely, that the word "sacrifice" should be understood as a memorial sacrifice (gaoriütnum Memoriale repraesentativum), likewise that we should say that it is free to take both or one form.

They also said that monks and priests bound by marriage should be free to leave their spouses and return to the monasteries, and that they should not be taken for spouses. If we were to accept this, then they would admit us in both forms, and tolerate those married couples for the sake of the children born until the Concilium, just as one tolerates whore houses. Thou seest, my dear Nicolaus, the very sure hope of Satan, who presumes to propose such vile, shameful, and ignominious conditions as a tyrant proposes to his prisoners. Our people have not allowed any of this, but have offered to restore jurisdiction to the bishops, with the restriction that the bishops should see to it that the gospel is taught, and abolish all abuses, and also some festivals. But nothing has been done; the adversaries are determined to perish; an inevitable doom presses upon them.

As I write this line, a letter from the Prince arrives from Augsburg, in which the dear Prince indicates that he has been permitted by the Emperor to depart from Augsburg today, Friday. Therefore, we now expect ours to return. The Emperor Carl is a very good man; he hopes that he will be able to establish harmony and peace, but I do not know whether he will be able to do so, since he is surrounded by so many monsters of the devils. Farewell. From Coburg, September 23, 1530.

F. How one tried to make Melanchthon suspicious and hated again by the Nurembergers because of the new means of comparison.

1108 Hieronymus Baumgärtner's other letter to Lazarus Spengler, city clerk at Nuremberg, dated September 15, 1530, in which he accuses Melanchthon.

This letter is found in Joh. Friedr. Mayer's ckis86rt. äs ismtats ?üil. NsiaueiiOiois, p. 48 and from it in Salig's Hist. der Augsb. Conf., Ub. II, oap. 8, p. 334. also in the Oorp. Lsk. II, 372.

My friendly willing services beforehand. Dear Mr. Rathschreiber! I have written to you in the next post about how some theologians in our part of the world are holding up in the matter of our holy faith. I hope you will receive it. Now there is no end to such theologians' peregrinations and unchristian practices, but since the next time we wrote, they have repeatedly discussed other means with them, and yet so far neither we, nor the Hessians and others from the cities, have ever been required to do so, and are thus more suspiciously regarded by them than by the opposing party. We are also often blatantly reproached for always relying on our theologians and scholars, and yet it is found that our theologians are quite different 1), but we do not want to follow them. Then they show Philippi's manuscripts, which he sends to them secretly, unquestioned by men, and makes suggestions that are not only unchristian, but also quite impossible to raise before the Elector himself; then they say, "If only we were gone," as if they still wanted to do what they wanted. But it is for the sake of the poor afflicted consciences, which would not only be annoyed by this, but would also give the tyrants cause to rage against those who desired to receive the pure word of God, much more sharply than ever before. I cannot sufficiently consider, let alone express in words, the complaints that result from this baking of cookies 2). Therefore, for the sake of God and His word, I ask you to do your part and to write to Doctor Martin Luther that he, as the one through whom God first reopens His word to the world, should forcefully confront Philip, and yet warn the pious princes, and especially his own lord, against him, and admonish them to persevere. For at this Diet no man to this day has done more harm to the Gospel than Philip. He has also fallen into such presumption that he not only does not want to hear anyone else speak and advise about it, but also goes out with clumsy cursing and scolding, so that he frightens everyone and dampens them with his authority. I do not like to write such things about him, because up to now he has been held in such high esteem by men, and I have left it at that, and have nevertheless often admitted much to him against my conscience. But now the test has come that, if God wills, neither Luther nor Philip shall be so dear to me, that I will fall to them against God's word. Let us comfort and strengthen Mr. Hieronymum Ebner and all good-hearted people in this, for the tales we are writing about Mr. Georg Truchsess will not be so severe. For some of us only believe what Mr. Georg Truchsess and D. Eck tell us, do not consider that they are far too clever and courtly^ for us, and ever paint a devil at times; you understand well what I mean. My brother and I know that Herr Georg Truchsess said in another place that he might pledge to one's hand that the opinion of their part is not to start a war. God grant that we ourselves may not flee, he may hunt us down. I have not left all this unreported to you in good Christian faith, and hereby offer myself for your friendly service. Date Augsburg in haste, Thursday the 15th of September, Anno 1530.

Grace and peace in Christ! Be angry and do not sin. I have read, my dear Link, your very grave complaints about Philip, and if I had not learned from the letters which I received from our people at Augsburg on Saturday last [Sept. 17] that our cause is at the Emperor's decision, I would have been greatly disturbed. I hope, however, that in the meantime you too have perceived that our cause now stands differently than you now write. If this is not the case, then I am now writing sharp letters to those who are to be sent to them by Spangenberg, but I have also indicated sufficiently beforehand that my opinion is not to approve of such conditions and articles; whether they have been moved by such letters to reject the means, I do not know. I hold that they also have the full

We have to understand how shameful, disgraceful and sacrilegious the means are, by which the adversaries surely and hopefully have and mock our small and weak group of people clearly and obviously for the best. But Christ, who blinds and hardens them, so that they believe nothing of the gospel, thus prepares them for the Red Sea; their inevitable fate drives them. Therefore let them go and perish, if they will; the Lord will be with us. Therefore I beseech thee to cease thy indignation. Though Philip may have negotiated some means, yet none have been agreed upon, not even with his consent. But I hope that Christ has made use of this mask to "mock" our scoffers, that he may namely "scandalize" them by means of false

I am sure that without my consent their consent is null and void, and that without my consent their consent is null and void, and that without my consent their consent is null and void, and that without my consent their consent is null and void. Thus I construe the matter, and am sure that without my consent their consent is void. But even if I (which God forbid) should give my consent to these god-robbing, man-murdering, and faithless monsters, yet the whole Church and the doctrine of the Gospel would not consent. But pray for me and be well in the Lord. Give my love to your Eva and your children. From the desert, September 20, 1530, Martin Luther.

The tenth section of the thirteenth chapter.

Of the first parting of the Diet of Augsburg and the actions that occurred at it.

A. Of the intention of the Elector of Saxony to depart from Augsburg.

111V. Presentation why the Elector of Saxony could not stay longer at Augsburg.

This and the following document can be found in Müller's Historie, Üb. III, eap. 37, S. 881.

After Imperial Majesty has required his Electoral Grace by her other letter that his Electoral Grace would certainly arrive at Augsburg at the end of April. After His Imperial Majesty had demanded of His Electoral Grace by their other letter that His Electoral Grace should certainly arrive at Augsburg at the end of April, His Electoral Grace, as an obedient Elector, had wanted to be held and found against His Majesty's request; accordingly, His Imperial Majesty had raised himself to obedience and submission. Majesty has thus raised himself to obedience and subservience, that his Electoral Grace shall be granted a new sentence. His Elector's Grace would have arrived at Augsburg at the time requested by Her Majesty. Grace arrive six weeks before Her Majesty, and now in total twenty weeks, with burdensome costs, also for the sake of His Electoral Grace's physical comfort. Grace's bodily condition, until therefore he had moved, and lay burdensome; therefore his Elector's. His Electoral Grace had their noticeable objections and complaints by some of His Electoral Grace's counsellors reported three weeks ago. His Elector's Grace had their noticeable complaints and troubles reported by some of His Electoral Grace's counsellors three weeks ago, with an account of His Electoral Grace's marital affairs, namely the burdensome expenses. namely the burdensome costs, item, his electoral grace's physical inconvenience. His Elector's Grace's bodily inconvenience. Grace did not know how to save his Majesty's necessities, at this time commonly fell into burdensome diseases due to the stone, therefore especially dangerous for his Electoral Grace. His Majesty's Grace would find it particularly dangerous and burdensome to remain there any longer; item, that the dying process in His Majesty's Grace's house would be a great burden. Gn. and especially the end of the year, when His Electoral Grace's young lordship and children are in the process of dying. and children were still at the time, for which his Electoral Grace, as the Lord of the Land, nevertheless had to take care of them. His Elector's Grace, as Lord and Father, would nevertheless also be obliged to strive before God, so that they would not be left in danger, but would be ordered to other, safe places. In addition, that all kinds of wrongdoings had begun to occur in his lands of grace, in which it was necessary to have due understanding. And although his churfürstl. Grace, upon the request made, two days, and then several days to so his Elector's Grace, for the sake of his much-touched answer, has suggested many times and especially during the past week and almost every day. His Elector's Grace, for the sake of his much-touched answer, has suggested many times, and especially during the past week and almost every day, that Count Palatine Friederich, his Elector's Grace's counselor and servant, Mr. Hansen von Minkwitz, gave this notice to the Elector on the Thursday before. Hansen von Minkwitz, knight, on Thursday before, to inform the Elector that Imperial Majesty will certainly send a letter to the Elector on the following Friday. Majesty would certainly answer on the following Friday, or at the longest on the Saturday, but he believes rather on the Friday than on the Saturday; his Electoral Grace's mind would not be prepared for that. His Grace would not have been willing to leave without His Imperial Majesty's knowledge. Majesty's knowledge, for his Elector's Grace would have been anxious to leave on Saturday. His Elector's Grace would have been anxious to have some of His Elector's Councillors leave. His Electoral Grace would have been anxious to send some of His Electoral Grace's counsellors to Her Majesty for this purpose. Her Majesty would also know how it was customary with Her Majesty herself before, and how graciously Her Majesty would have shown herself if a Prince or Elector had indicated his objection and asked for permission. And although the Elector did not wish to indicate this to Her Majesty, in the opinion that the Elector wished to give or set a measure for Her Majesty, as to how Her Majesty should promote or carry out the affairs, for which Her Majesty announced the Imperial Diet, but that His Electoral Grace, the most humbled of His Majesty's graciousness, had the right to do so. Grace would be most submissive confidence, because it is with his Electoral Grace that the matrimonial primordial matters are to be settled. His Electoral Grace would have the matrimonial causes and opportunity, beforehand, for the sake of her body, that Imperial Majesty of His Electorate. Majesty of his electoral. His Electoral Grace's gracious permission, and that His Electoral Grace's departure... Grace's departure, as also his Electoral Grace, the Imperial Emperor. Grace Imperial. Majesty hereby ask again in all submissiveness, and would humbly put off to their Majesty 1) For so that for the sake of his Electoral Grace there would be no lack, his Electoral Grace would, as previously indicated, be allowed to leave. Grace, as indicated before, would be obliged to act for the same counsels there and behind them, with full power, as if His Electoral Grace himself were present in person. Grace himself were present in person, and that in other matters, for which the Imperial Diet was announced, their Majesty and the realm be considered for benefit, honor and welfare.

1111 The Elector of Saxony repeated his presentation of the departure, and requested to remain three more days.

See No. 1110.

1) "thäten" put by us instead of: "hätten".

Kaiserl. Majesty would have graciously heard why his electoral. His Imperial Majesty would have graciously heard why it would be most burdensome and impossible for His Electoral Grace to remain there longer, especially for the sake of His Electoral Grace. His Elector's Grace Imperial Majesty would have graciously heard why it would be most burdensome and impossible for His Elector's Grace to remain there any longer. Grace Imperial. Majesty to obedience and the most submissive will and good opinion, at their Majesty's description and request, come here to this Imperial Diet appointed by their Majesty, and where it is of their Electoral Grace that the Imperial Diet is to be held. Grace Caiferl. Majesty would not have meant submission and loyal obedience, there would have been matters before His Electoral Grace. His Elector's Grace would have had matters before him, and especially His Elector's Grace, as now a prince, would have been able to do so. Grace, as now a prince of years, would have had the marital responsibilities for the sake of his body that his Electoral Grace would also have been entitled to. Grace would also have been justified in making excuses against Imperial Majesty. Majesty, so that his Electoral Grace would have been in agreement. His Elector's Grace to be forgiven in the same way as others, and his Elector's Councillors to be forgiven in the same way as others. His Grace's counsellors in his Electoral Grace's stead. Grace's place, and to dismiss them with emergency force; but his Electoral Grace would have decided, in the absence of the Grace would have subdued His Imperial Majesty. Majesty's submissive obedience and favour, would not have allowed all this to be mistaken nor prevented, but would have sent His Imperial Majesty to the city of Vienna out of submissive obedience and favour. Majesty out of the most humble heart and will. Thus also the Imperial. Majesty would know that with their Majesty and their ancestors, Roman kings and emperors, as reported in the previous speech, it was otherwise customary for princes and princes to attend an Imperial Diet for their Majesties' favor and obedience, and had required an opportunity to depart again, he would have been graciously permitted by their Majesty and their ancestors, and would not have been so distressed, if he had wanted to leave his counsellors behind him with due force, as his Electoral Grace had always been obliged to do. Graciousness would have offered to do so, and would be inclined to do so. Thus also the Imperial Majesty of both Majesty of both the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Lüneburg would graciously take heed of this, so that Her Majesty would be more helped than helped in the realm. Since then the Elector of Saxony, as touched, at Imperial Majesty's request, is obedient to His Majesty. Majesty's request obediently and in such a timely manner, and has requested permission until the third week, and has also waited for Imperial Majesty's answer until the last ten days. Majesty's answer; but, as indicated by Count Palatine

Friederich to Hansen von Minkwitz, it did not fall on last Friday and Saturday, and for the sake of His Electoral Grace such marital bonds are to be granted. and that for the sake of his elector's grace such marital affairs had occurred that his elector's grace could not be forgiven any longer. His Elector's Grace that it would be quite burdensome and almost impossible to delay any longer.

moreover, that his churfürstl. Gn. cooks and waiters H and all behind would be dispatched, and the counsellors would be inclined to leave with sufficient force: so his electoral graces would not let him be ordered to do so, as if his electoral graces were to be the ones to do so. would not let it be imposed on him, as if his elector's grace would have been would be the cause of some disruption by his departure, if it should happen. His churl. His Elector's Grace also wanted Majesty most humbly, her Majesty wanted to ask his Elector's Grace. Gn. who might have wanted to impute such a thing to him, and to graciously allow his Electoral Grace to have the matter decided by the Emperor. and graciously allow his Electoral Grace or his Electoral Grace to leave. after such marriages have been granted to his electoral grace in all fairness and in all fairness to his elector's grace. His Elector's Grace in all fairness and justice. But if Imperial Majesty Majesty would ever have misgivings about this, his Electoral Grace together with the same. If, however, the Imperial Majesty should ever have any misgivings about this, if his Electors and their cousins, Duke Ernest of Brunswick and Lüneburg, should depart and not pass the desired days, the Elector would know that he and his Electors would be without glory. Gn. brother, then Duke Frederick, on account of their Imperial Majesty and the same. Majesty and the same ancestors and forefathers, he would be obligated to do so. This, as much as possible, his C. F. Grace would be inclined to do again, even to his grave. And although his churfürstl. would have to forgive the desired days with great inconvenience, he nevertheless wanted, together with his Elector's Grace, to be able to go back to his home. Gn. cousins, Imperial Majesty's most humble favor, not to be lacking in three days, but in such a way that the Imperial Majesty of his Electorate would not be lacking in three days. Majesty of His Elector. and Duke Ernssten now graciously permit him to depart thereafter on the following Thursday without further delay or delay, with the request that this be done for both their high necessity. and their High Necessity, and to be understood in their Grace 2c.

1112. note, issued secretly to the protesting princes, how they could behave after the publication of the parting.

From Müller's History, p. 893.

So the farewell given to the Elector of Saxony and his co-relatives, in which they have been given until the fifteenth day of April.

1) In the old edition: "cellar".

they shall depart, and the Elector of Saxony, together with Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg and the Duke of Lüneburg, shall appear before the Emperor's Majesty tomorrow. Majesty before the Elector's farewell, and to present Her Imperial Majesty most humbly. Majesty most humbly request and entreat that the matter, in which they have been granted consideration, is excellent, highly important and great in itself, that then Her Imperial Majesty will so graciously grant them the right to a new life. Majesty may be so gracious to them, if after the expiration of the appointed time they petition her Imperial Majesty for further consideration. Majesty that Her Imperial Majesty will grant them the right to their subjugated Majesty will graciously grant them further consideration on their submissive request; thereupon the Imperial Majesty shall grant the Princes and the Princes of the Holy Roman Empire the right to the same. The Imperial Majesty shall answer the Electors and the Princes, insofar as they obediently live up to and comply with this request, which has now been given to them, that then Her Majesty, at their most humble request of the Electors, Princes and cities, will graciously grant them further consideration, but that in such consideration peace and unity will also be preserved, as then reported in the present treaty.

(1) After the imperial majesty has announced and proclaimed a general imperial diet and assembly on the eighth day of the month of April, next to the next, in the city of Augsburg, to act on all matters concerning the holy empire, common Christianity, and the German nation; and especially, among other things, how, as not the least grievance, the confusion and discord in the holy faith and Christian religion may and should be acted upon and decided upon.

002 And that such things may be the better and the more wholesome done.

2) In the old edition wrong: "Thursday after Mauritiu", because Mauritius was Thursday, September 22.

to lay aside discords, to cease from unwillingness, to yield up past errors to Christ our Saviour, and to apply diligence, to hear, understand, and consider in love and kindness all every man's discretion, opinion, and opinion between himself, to bring them to one Christian truth and to compare them, to do away with all that would not be rightly laid out or done for both parts, to do away with everything that is not rightly interpreted or acted on both sides, to accept and keep one true religion by all of us, and, as we are all under one Christ, to live in one community, church and unity, and finally to decide, make, establish and maintain good unity, peace and welfare of the holy kingdom in these and other matters incumbent upon it; as then Imperial Majesty. The Imperial Majesty's decree of the same Imperial Diet contains and is able to contain all this and more according to its length.

(3) At which Imperial Diet of Her Imperial Majesty the Princes and other Estates of the Holy Empire appeared in person. Maj. princes, princes, and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire appeared in person, and by their embassy with authority, obediently before her Majesty, and thereupon also her Imperial Majesty, together with the said princes, princes, prelates, counts, estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and the same embassies. Maj. together with the said Princes, Princes, Prelates, Counts, and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and their messages, the points and articles, in her Imperial Majesty's hand, to her Majesty. Maj. and especially the article concerning the error and division in our holy Christian faith, and, in accordance with the aforementioned letter of Her Majesty, next to anyone who wishes to bring forward something on account of such error of faith, and namely the Elector of Saxony, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, the brothers Ernst and Franciscus, Dukes of Lüneburg, Philippsen, Landgraves of Hesse, and Wolfgang, Princes of Anhalt, also the envoys of the cities of Nuremberg, Reutlingen, Kempten, Heilbronn, Winsheim and Weißenburg, have graciously heard their opinion and confession in the presence of the other Electors, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have advised them with timely and valiant counsel, and have refuted and rejected them with good reason through the Holy Gospels and Scriptures, and have thus manifoldly acted by their Majesty, also the aforementioned princes, princes and commoners in their own persons, as well as their committees of princes, princes and others, first fourteen, and then six persons, have had, practiced and cultivated with them most diligently, that they have come to an agreement with her Majesty and the other princes. and the other princes, princes, and commonwealths of the Holy Roman Empire in several Christian articles.

(4) But for some other articles, of which they did not compare themselves with the Imperial Majesty and the common estates of that time. Majesty and the common estates of this time, her Imperial Majesty has granted the Holy Roman Empire, the praiseworthy German nation. Majesty has granted the Holy Empire, the praiseworthy German nation, for good and welfare, so that peace and unity may be preserved therein, for the sake of her Majesty's clemency, and out of but her grace. and out of but mercy, the same Elector of Saxony, the five princes, and also the six cities, to confer between here and the fifteenth day of the next month of April, and to consider whether, for the sake of the other articles, they agree with the Christian Church, Papal Holiness, Her Majesty, and the other electors. and the other Princes, Princes and common Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, as well as other Christian leaders and members of common Christendom, in the meantime of the discussion of a future Concilii, or not; and besides this, their Imperial Majesty wishes to devote himself for the same time to this matter. And that the Elector of Saxony, the five princes, and six cities, before the end of the fifteenth day of April, in which their minds under their seals ascribe and open to her Majesty, then she will report her Majesty against it and thereupon her opinion in writing.

(5) That the Elector of Saxony, the five princes, and the six cities decree in the meantime on this fifteenth day of April that nothing new shall be printed, sold, or traded in their principalities, lands, and territories. 5. That also the Elector of Saxony, the five princes and six cities, meanwhile on this fifteenth day of the month of April, decree that nothing new in matters of faith shall be printed, traded, or sold in their principalities, lands, and territories, and that thereupon it shall be the earnest will and command of their Majesty that all princes, princes, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, meanwhile on this account, keep good peace and unity, and that neither the Elector of Saxony, the five princes, and six cities, nor their subjects, their Majesty, and the Holy Roman Empire, nor the other princes, princes, and commoners of the Holy Roman Empire, shall be in peace and unity. and of the Holy Roman Empire, nor of the other Electors, Princes and commoners' subjects, as has been done hitherto, to themselves and their sect; Also, whether some of the Elector of Saxony's, the five princes' and six cities' subjects, of whatever rank they may be, who still adhere or wish to adhere to the old Christian faith and nature, do not err in their services and ceremonies in their churches and places of worship, nor oppress them, nor initiate any further innovation therein; Likewise, the women's and men's religious should not in any way prevent them from attending mass and hearing confession, and from offering and receiving the holy sacrament.

6th And to this, that also the reported Churthe five princes and six cities, against those who do not keep the holy reverend sacrament, and the Anabaptists, with their imperial majesty, the other princes, princes and states. Majesty, the other Princes, Princes and Estates, and not at all to separate themselves from their Majesty and their loved ones and them, but to advise, encourage and help what and how action is to be taken against them; as all the aforementioned Princes, Princes and Estates have granted and consented to their Imperial Majesty to do all this, as is evident, so far as it concerns each of them. Majesty and have promised it.

(7) And because no common council has been held in the Christian Church for many years, and yet many abuses and complaints may have occurred in common Christendom among all heads and estates, ecclesiastical and secular, for a long time, that after all this, and for a Christian reformation, their Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, and the Holy Roman Emperor. Majesty and all Princes, Princes and Estates, now assembled here at Augsburg, have finally resolved to decree with the aforementioned Papal Holiness and all Christian kings and potentates that a common Christian council shall be held within six months, the next after the end of this Imperial Diet, the next after the end of this Imperial Diet, and that it be held in the most beneficial manner and at the earliest within a year of such notice, in the good hope and confidence that by this means common Christendom will be brought into lasting good unity and peace for the sake of its spiritual and temporal affairs.

1114 Answer given to the Protestants by the Chancellor Brück. September 22, 1530.

This document and its continuation, No. 1116, is reproduced after Brück in Müller, lib. III, enp. 39, p. 899; German also in Chyträus, p. 298; according to the Margraval Brandenburg Acts in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 481. Latin in Coelestin8, tom. III, col. 188 and torn. IV, col. 85, and in Cūtmens, p. 322 and 369.

The Elector and the same's co-relatives would have given the understood imperial. Majesty. Majesty, and have reported therein, among other things, of this part's confession and creed, as if the same were to be confirmed by a confutation, drawn up by Imperial Majesty and the imperial estates for this purpose, with the Holy Gospel. Maj. and the estates of the realm, had been sufficiently rejected and refuted by the holy Gospel, this part nevertheless held without doubt that the confession in the holy Word of God is the only confession of this part.

1) also considered it to be divine truth to such an extent that they hoped to be able to stand before God's last judgment. This part also wanted to have the aforementioned confutation, where they might have been copeed with, thus answered for and trumped up, so that Imperial Majesty and the people would have felt it. Majesty and all men should have felt that they could not do anything against the reported confession. So that such a confutation would not remain unanswered by this part, they would have undertaken and allowed themselves to be heard to answer for the same, as much as they could note in a hurry from the reading; as they had intended to do long ago, but had nevertheless been prevented from doing so by much negotiation since then, until such responsibility was now also made. And even though it would have been impossible to provide the same for all points of the Confutation, this part nevertheless hoped, where the Imperial Majesty had seen and mentioned it, to be able to provide the same for all points of the Confutation. Majesty had seen it and considered it, she would have found that the confession handed over still existed unharmed, with humble request that Her Imperial Majesty would have the same writing and apostles. Majesty would graciously accept the same writing and apology.

1115. apology of the Augsburg Confession, which was presented by the Protestants at the same time, but not accepted.

See above the 1030th document. - Spalatin in his Annals, p. 197, reports that when Brück presented the Apology, the Emperor reached for it, but King Ferdinand made him "flinch back again" and did not accept it.

1116. continued answer of the Augsburg Consession relatives by D. Brück.

This continuation is found besides at the locations given in No. 1114 also in Förstemann, "Archiv", p. 185.

Concerning the peace, the same is accepted by their Electoral and Princely Grace together with their kinsmen with submissive thanksgiving. Together with their co-relatives with humble thanksgiving, with the obedient and willing offer to live up to the same. And as further indicated that nothing new is to be done, also not to be printed, have feil.

1) The following to the end of the sentence is missing in Förstemann.

2c., in which the Elector of Saxony, and his relatives, at the recent Imperial Diet at Speier, had quite duly offered to do so, and also intended to keep themselves unprovoked in this. Thus this part also would not be related to any sect, but what they believe and hold, that would be in the Word of God constantly with reason and so dedicated that it would be the right true Christian faith, and no sect, in and with which they also could not err. And even though this is the case, they have not yet compelled anyone to their faith, nor do they intend to do so, and in this they know how to keep themselves Christian and proper by the grace of God. As for the sects of the Anabaptists and those who did not believe in the Sacrament, they had not tolerated them in their lands and territories, but had acted against them with Christian teachings and sermons, had severely punished the Anabaptists, and had thus ensured that the same sects were not heard or found in them by the grace of God, much less rooted, and still wanted to prevent it with all the diligence in their power. Because this would be an excellent and most important matter, in which the welfare and misfortune of souls would be at stake, which would require good care and caution, and also because some from this part would not be here, nor would be to be met, and because the need of the counsels and embassies would also require that this parting be diligently considered and contemplated, the Elector of Saxony, together with other princes and fellow relatives, would request Imperial Majesty the Most Hospitable Grace of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty most humbly that they will graciously deign to deliver to them the farewell copies reported to them, and that they will graciously allow them to consider the matter in general until the appointed time of the 15th day of April, so that they will in the meantime consider, deliberate and consult the matter, and then submit it to their Imperial Majesty, if she has the right to do so. Majesty that they have made up their minds.

1117 Luther's judgement of the above imperial goodbyes.

From Ooelestinus, tom. Walch explicitly notes that this document "had not previously been included in the collections of Luther's writings". In the only edition published after Walch, the Erlanger, it has not yet been included.

Translated from the Latin by U. A. Tittel.

(1) As often as they speak of things that are to the glory of God, the holy gospel, and our Christian

If we are to be justified before God by true and pure doctrine, we can separate doctrine from doctrine, and works that proceed from a true and hypocritical heart from false and hypocritical works, and we can be justified before God by true and pure doctrine, and works that proceed from a true and hypocritical heart from false and hypocritical works. For if we are justified before God by true and pure doctrine, we can discern and judge doctrine from doctrine, and works that proceed from a true heart from false and hypocritical works.

002 It is therefore necessary that we believe the gospel with our hearts, and confess it with our mouths. And 1) Not only is this required, but our confession must also be directed to be made before the unbelieving world, that they may be severely punished, and their works and doings not approved. The Holy Spirit must punish the world for sin, but we must sing the verses Psalm 26:5, 16:4: "I will not approve the assemblies of the bloodthirsty, neither will I take their name upon my lips."

003 Wherefore for the confession of the gospel we must do, suffer, forbear, and accept all things, whereby nothing escapes faith and confession, and such things are not approved which the contrary will teach and do contrary to the gospel.

(4) Because Imperial Majesty has ordered to act to restore and maintain peace in the Holy Roman Empire and also to advise religion. Since His Majesty has commanded us to act in order to restore and maintain peace in the Holy Roman Empire, and also to advise religion, we must diligently see to it and strive to prevent our part from approving or yielding to anything that is contrary to the faith, the Gospel, and divine honor, for the sake of anyone or for the sake of any cause. Namely, in this way:

5. i. The first article, in which peace is promised to those who signed (or defended) the Confession and Apology presented at Augsburg, and freedom from all danger, if only they would not henceforth begin anything new, and those who, enlightened by divine grace, would accept the true doctrine of the Gospel, would not be received or cherished, is by no means to be taken for granted.

1) "is" put by us instead of: as.

(6) And if it should be objected that the Emperor is now dealing with the Elector of Saxony and his religious relatives, but not with those who may join him in the future, and that the Elector of Saxony has no care for others, and that he or his kinsmen have nothing to say about subjects of other dominions, but only about his own.

008 And not only of them which are yet to come, but also of the Christian church which preacheth the word, and of ours which are the members thereof, must we observe. For it is written in Gal. 6:16, "As many as walk according to this rule," 2c. by which saying no one is excluded. Are therefore all who believe and live according to the doctrine of the Confession and Apology, according to such faith and doctrine our brethren, and is their danger as much our concern as ours. Nor can we leave them as members of the true church; they may join us when they will, they may do it in silence or publicly, they may live among us or in foreign lands. This we say and confess.

010 Fourthly, since the Lord says, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against the church," and yet such gates do not rest, it necessarily follows that the doctrine is not bound to any certain time, place, or person, but will always endure and remain for all those who either already believe or will hereafter believe.

12. II. The other article belongs to the third part of the Gospel, namely, that it must not be approved nor accepted. For by naming only the Zwinglier and Wiederbäuer, they wish to go forth freely, and to be exempt from it, as if they never taught anything contrary to the gospel and the holy sacraments. This, however, cannot be done without violating the conscience and honor of God.

(14) (III) The article of Concilio is to be believed, confessed, and adhered to only in so far as it admits that our doctrine, which we confess, is true, and that no angel from heaven can judge or change it.

1) Here we have erased "not".

The Church is not allowed to judge and change them, much less are emperors, popes, and bishops allowed to judge and change them. Thus in a concilio nothing can be approved or spoken rightly except what agrees with the word of God and is according to it. St. Paul did not yield in the least to those who considered themselves pillars of the church, which example of St. Paul also belongs here. Otherwise one must confess before councils, kings, princes, and all the world that no part acts contrary to faith and confession when he desires that the word of God and preaching be measured, since the word of the Lord cannot nor should be bound. The disciples are commanded in the Acts of the Apostles to remember nothing but the name of Christ; but we hold to their answer, saying, "Judge ye yourselves, whether ye obey God more than men," or Caesar? "For man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth by the mouth of GOD."

IV. Nor can it be admitted and approved that the sacraments should be administered, but that the ministry of the word should be separated from them, since both must go together. For the Lord saith, "Go, preach," and then, "Baptize. And St. Paul saith unto the Corinthians, When ye come together (to preach), let the sacraments be administered.

(16) Nor can it be approved or accepted in good conscience, and without injury to divine honor, to desire that the mere text should be recited to the people without much explanation or exposition; for in this way the edification of the church, and the gift of prophecy, so necessary and useful, would be abolished, since Paul writes to the Corinthians that without the gift of prophecy and exposition of the Scriptures the Christian church cannot exist. Moreover, without prophecy the hearts and consciences are neither awakened nor revealed. For if this gift is gone from the Church, no one can worship and call upon God, or give Him due honor, nor say that God is with His Church. The same is true of all the articles which are in the same way derived from the Word and Sacraments, and not to approve them.

017 In other regions and countries therefore it is not necessary to usurp dominion, but yet to show love and friendship to all men, as Paul saith, "If it be possible, as much as is in you, keep peace with all men." Therefore let us give no occasion to discord and unrest. Pliny writes of the Christians in the time of the emperor Trajani, that their modesty and discipline were admired by other nations, which, of course, is a glory to the gospel.

18. v. The article concerning the preachers and ministers of the word is to be directed that they teach according to the word, "Let your wisdom be known to all men, and teach the word of God with all gladness and meekness." Likewise, "A servant of the Lord needeth not quarrel." 2 Tim. 2:23. Though outward peace be given us, yet disputes about doctrine will always remain, and not be settled. For the gospel will remain a vexation to the Jews and a foolishness to the Greeks, and will take captive (or overpower) all power that opposes God. For this reason we can make (and keep) peace concerning things and goods of the flesh and of the earth, but because of doctrine we must suffer persecution continually.

(19) VI. As to spiritual jurisdiction (or church government), the matter seems to have an inequality, and the equality of ceremonies to serve for the betterment of the church; but against such delusion is this, that the church rulers compel us and our priests in many grievous things, and still like to compel us. To hold many things contrary to the Gospel and conscience. Therefore the jurisdiction and power of the church can by no means be restored to them, nor can they be approved; and it is better that there should be some inequality in dress, ceremonies, and other church customs. For such things belong only to fine order and prosperity, but are in themselves nothing essential. Wherefore the consciences cannot be entangled and made to feel as if they were necessary to salvation.

The aim of the project is to link the two, as has been done in the past and is still being done in some places.

VII If it is desired and demanded that the monks who still live in monasteries should not be expelled, lest the mass and other ceremonies, which are a dishonor to the divine name, should be abolished before a general and Christian concilium takes place, we cannot consent to such a desire at all, for the following reasons:

021 He who acts contrary to conscience paves and prepares for himself the way to hell. But it cannot be hidden from anyone that the adversaries consider monasticism and the observance of mass to be useful and necessary for salvation, since they have taught that through such works they would become righteous and blessed before God. Which highly disparages and degrades Christ's merit and suffering, not unlike the fact that it would not be sufficient for the attainment of salvation, nor would it be able to reconcile us to the Father. Next, Hezekiah, king of Judah, is praised for breaking and shattering the bronze serpent, which had been erected by command of God, because it gave rise to idolatry. Thus much less can the mass, as the greatest abomination and detestation of all the abominations that can be named, be approved and admitted.

(22) If it is the duty of the temporal authorities and Imperial Majesty to punish seriously and severely all those who sin against the other table, and to banish them from human society, then the disgrace of the other table must of necessity be punished. If it behooves the temporal sovereignty and imperial majesty to punish severely and harshly all who sin grossly against the other table, and to banish them from human society, then the dishonor of the divine name, and the sins that manifestly and truly dispute against the first table, must necessarily be punished and scolded. And although in some places, because they are ordered and instituted by emperors, the masses are to be tolerated, yet they can and should neither be approved nor justified.

23 VIII. Concerning church goods, revenues, tithes, and interest, because they are secular things, the jurists will be able to pronounce on them, and it seems that it will serve greatly for the restoration and preservation of peace if a forgetfulness (amvssUa) of all that is past is introduced. For we find in the Histories that much the like is done among the heathen also, and that it is much for the confirmation of the Peace in Athens. It is to be hoped that everyone will admit that such a thing is very necessary even now; namely, that he who possesses something may keep quiet possession, and that the dispute may not be increased over things that must be lost and given back again. For if everything were to be restituted, it would cause much disorder, which would be bad for peace.

(24) IX. If it should be desired to be released, according to every man's conscience and pleasure, to enjoy one or two forms, this can by no means be entered into or accepted. For in this way we absolve from sin those who receive only one form, contrary to the institution and command of Christ. For many godly consciences would be offended at this, since innumerable holy and godly men have been imprisoned for this very cause, and have almost come into danger of life and limb, and have even been banished and actually killed. If, however, one were to emphasize at once what benefit and promotion the common peace and nature, all pious people, the German nation, the Holy Roman Empire, and the Christian faith would derive from this, if one were to yield somewhat in a few pieces and articles, and, at the same time, cite what defeats, damages, and hardships would result if war and upheaval were to break out, because in this way religion and evangelical doctrine would perish on both sides, and the most miserable confusion of all laws and orders would take place, and the Turk and other kings and princes would overwhelm the German people, who are divided and disunited among themselves, for which reason it would not be necessary to break and tear up the peace for the sake of minor disputes over a few articles:

025 It is therefore evil to answer such objections, saying, Let it come to pass that which is right, though all the world fall to pieces over it. For I say that peace is to be relegated to the lowest hell, which is bought with the damage of the gospel and of faith, and hinders and injures them.

026 Hereafter, although such pretence has a fine appearance, yet in the reason of the doctrine which God would have us to have, and we know that it is true, and for the sake of which we shall be preserved in all wars, hardships, and dangers, we must not lose a hair of our heads.

broadly give way, for the sake of temporal and common peace, because such a pretext can easily seduce and deceive us all.

27. Third, since we are commanded and enjoined to confess the word of God, and not easily to depart from that commandment, all danger that may befall us because of the confession of the gospel must be committed to him who, even without our counsel and instruction, already knows how to protect his church in the time of the fiercest tyrants, as he did before these times in a world that was full of tyrants and zealots (namely, in the time of Arii and other heretics). He therefore, who hitherto, when no hope of salvation hath looked forth, hath helped and counseled, and will continue to do so, govern and lead us thus, that we may confidently confess the pure and sincere doctrine of the gospel; to whom be glory and honor for ever and ever. Amen.

(28) If, however, since God is in favor, Imperial Maj. Maj. should, at the instigation and incitement of zealous (restless) people, insist on the words and opinion of certain articles, e.g. of the Concilio; of those who in the future still wish to sign and accede to our Confession and Apology (or Defence); likewise of both and one form, of monasteries and masses, and would have them not abolished, but remain and be tolerated until the time of the Concilii, and that by perfect power and the rule due to her Imperial Majesty: then it is to be considered that their power and authority by no means extend so far. Majesty: it must be considered that their power and authority by no means extend so far. For this would be the case if a matter were to be decided between lands and estates, and the boundaries were to be set, and the dominions were to be separated from one another, since her Majesty would want to mitigate and rectify the settlement and its contents. Here, however, one acts before doctrine and confession, what is to be recognized as right or wrong, to be approved or rejected, as Jerome writes of the woman who was struck seven times, 1) and of whom the Savior says: "Be without falsehood, as the doves."

1) Luther cites the history Oe mutiere septies per6U88A several times as an example of constancy; namely, an innocently condemned woman has been beaten by the executioner seven times without his being able to behead her.

(6) Of the harsh and threatening speeches that were made to the Protestants on the day of the trial by the Elector Joachim of Prandenburg in the name of the Emperor, and how steadfastly they responded to them.

1118: The sharp speech of Elector Joachim of Brandenburg to the protesting estates. 23 Sept. 1530.

The following four documents are found in German in the supplement to Brück's Geschichte, p. 464; in Chyträus, p. 301; and in Müller, lib. III, onp. 39, p. 903. Latin in Oo6l68tinn8, tom. IV, tot. 8o, and afterwards at 00*trg.6N8, 372. - We have used the variants given at Förstemann, Urknndenbuch, vol. II, p. 607 f. from Brück's Geschichte.

The Imperial Maj. Maj. had heard after the Elector of Saxony and his Elector's Grace related Princes and cities. Her Majesty could not be sufficiently surprised that they might so presumptuously represent that this part of the doctrine and confession handed down was founded on holy divine Scripture and the Gospel, in accordance with God's order; for Her Imperial Majesty would have found them through the holy clear Gospel and the Fathers' Scripture, according to the brave council of many. Maj. would have rejected the same by the holy clear Gospel and the Fathers' Scriptures, according to the brave counsel of many scholars of the Holy Scriptures, not of one nation alone; so also the same doctrine, and all that which the Elector of Saxony and his electoral relatives preach, would have been rejected. G.'s fellow preachers, had been recognized as heretical and unchristian many years ago in many Christian congregations, for which it would again be regarded as such. Maj. would have to be surprised that this part of her Maj. would want to ascribe to it as if she and other princes, rulers and estates were mistaken and did not believe rightly. For if it were the opinion that her Maj.'s noble ancestors, emperors and kings, also other noble electors and princes, especially also the elector of Saxony and other princes' noble ancestors, in whom this holy, lawful and true, Christian, well-founded, long-established faith was planted, should also be considered heretical; for which reason her Maj. cannot be persuaded nor led into this way, and it is by no means true that the Elector of Saxony and his Electoral Grace will not be persuaded to accept this faith. Gn. and his electoral relatives is based on the Gospel in such a way. But because the Imperial Majesty, who ever loved peace in the Holy Roman Empire and in all things wanted to see this farewell to the Elector and his Electorate. Gn. If the Elector and his electoral relatives, out of but mercy, and more than she deserves, have this parting made, it would be her Maj.'s gracious request that he, 1) the Elector, and the other relatives in this matter, accept this parting, which even Imperial Maj. and the other estates could by no means change. Maj. and the other estates could by no means change, as then the other Electors, Princes and estates of her Maj. Maj. had accepted and approved the same, considering that, if this did not happen, what complaint, discord and disagreement they, the Elector and his merchant relatives would owe to God would come about. Nor could one find in any Scripture or Gospel that one would take away one's own by force, and then say that one could not in good conscience give it back. As far as the list handed over to Imperial Majesty's Confutation is concerned, it would not have been possible in good conscience to reproduce it. Maj. Confutation, Her Majesty had previously let it be heard that she did not wish to enter into any dispute, as it was also not her Majesty's duty to do in matters of faith and was not her office; therefore Her Imperial Majesty did not at all agree to accept it. Maj. has by no means consented to accept the same, for if this parting were not accepted by them, Imperial Maj. Maj. would, as her Majesty is well entitled to do, cause it to be kept 2c. In addition, the Electors, Princes and Estates would have ordered him to speak, if ever the Elector of Saxony, together with his electoral relatives, had accepted this parting. G. did not want to accept this farewell, that they should turn to Imperial Maj. Maj., as obedient princes of the empire, to offer their body and goods, land and people, and all their property, so that this cause may be helped, as then also Imperial Maj. Maj. again gave them a consoling promise to surrender all their property and also not to leave the Holy Empire until this trade was brought to an end. By order of all the other princes and estates, he would thus have wanted to announce this to them.

1119. the answer given to the Protestants by the chancellor Brück. 23 Schi. 153<sup>n</sup>.

See No. 1118.

Most Sublime Emperor 2c. The Elector of Saxony, together with my most gracious princes, as well as the other related persons in this matter, have, without any danger to your Imperial Majesty, expressed their opinion and their wishes.

1) "he" put by us instead of: ehe.

Answer by my most gracious lord, the Elector of Brandenburg, skillfully, terribly, and in such a way that I would not know how to extend it for my own sake, and also that it would give rise to futile prolongation, humbly heard. Thereupon my most gracious and gracious lords here present, together with the other relatives of these matters, your Imperial Majesty, give this most gracious report. Maj. this most humbly report and answer, that their Supreme and Federal Governors and the others have submitted their confession in writings at the beginning of this Imperial Diet, as yesterday their Supreme and Federal Governors and they also reported to your Imperial Majesty. Maj., are so founded and dedicated in the divine holy Scriptures and in the holy Gospel, as the Scriptures and the reasons which have been introduced and given beside them sufficiently, also loudly and irrefutably testify, that against them, as against the Word of God and the holy Gospel, the gates of hell cannot stand nor be held fast, as is also the case with their Major and Federal Governors and the rest of their kinsmen, for the rejection of Your Imperial Majesty. Maj., as much as may have been gathered and retained from a speedy reading and in haste, even as it were in the air, since their Lord and Lady and they could not have obtained the same Confutation in any other way than to the extent desired by Your Imperial Majesty at that time. Majesty's request at that time, and yet to their electors and princes. and to them, in such a way as to have been highly burdensome, have had them assembled, and Your Imperial Majesty has graciously, in this way, made it possible. Maj. graciously, as a praiseworthy emperor, will have to note that their electors and princes, as well as the co-walkers, have been able to take over the matter. Your Imperial Majesty, and also your fellow relatives, herewith once more in all submissiveness. Maj. with all submission and humility. But as far as the farewell is concerned, which Your Imperial Maj. Maj. yesterday held against my most gracious and gracious lords and their kinsmen, let your Imperial Maj. Maj. shall undoubtedly take it for granted and respect that their sovereign and princely sovereigns are ever submissively inclined. Your Imperial Majesty shall consider it without doubt and take care that your Highnesses and Princes are ever humbly inclined, in all that is possible with God and conscience, to respond to your Imperial Majesty's request. Maj.'s request; but for what most important and most valiant reasons their sovereign and princely lords, as well as their co-relatives, are not willing to be submissive. and princely graces, as well as their kinsmen, their consciences, and the most touching Christian confessions made before Your Imperial Majesty. Maj., it is burdensome for them, even impossible, to grant such a read-out parting, or to accept its contents, is this morning presented to my gracious Lord, Mr. Georgen Truchsess, your Imperial Maj. Maj. Councillor and Servant, and the Chancellor of Baden, who have met with my gracious Lord, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg.

bürg, also the other councillors appointed by my most gracious and gracious lords, and the envoys of the cities, have been admitted for the purpose of discussing such farewells, and have been notified according to the length which their churlish and princely hope of your imperial majesty, the prince, and also your fellow kinsmen, have hoped for. G. also of the co-relatives hope of Your Imperial Maj. Maj. and Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, Princes, Princes and Estates, my most gracious, gracious and favorable Lords, have reported such causes and complaints without doubt according to necessity. However, if this does not happen, my most gracious and kind lords and their relatives are requested to bring the same complaints before your Imperial Majesty and Royal Highness. Majesty and King, also Princes, Princes and Estates, and to have them reported themselves. And therefore my most gracious and gracious Lords' most humble request of this part is once again, as it was yesterday, your Imperial Majesty's most humble request. Maj. in all submission, that they wish to grant their Lordships and Princes, also you, such a request. They also, as their most gracious Emperor and Lord, graciously send them copies and transcripts of this farewell, which has been read out, in the most gracious consideration of this most important transaction; as Your Imperial Majesty, without this, for the sake of the articles, so unparalleled, by virtue of the same farewell, graciously gives consideration to their Electoral and Princely Graces. Your Imperial Majesty has graciously granted that, without the articles of the same decree being so incomparable, their Electoral and Princely Graces may diligently and urgently consider, deliberate and consult the articles of the same decree, together with all acts done, and the envoys may deliver and bring the same to their lords and friends by whom they have been appointed, and in all things may be found in good counsel, that their Electoral and Princely Graces may also bring the other covenants to the attention of their lords and friends, and in all things may be found in good counsel. Gn. also the other kinsmen, may, shall, and may always do, or not do, according to the divine word and conscience, for the sake of love and unity, and Your Imperial Majesty may, between the appointed time and the appointed time, give the same to their lords and friends by whom they are ordered, and in all things as may be found in good counsel. Maj. between the appointed time, as the 15th day of the month of April, henceforth to make known to your Imperial Majesty by their sealed letters what their minds and concerns would be thereon. Maj. by their sealed letters, and also wish to show all submissiveness to Your Imperial Majesty. Maj. in all submissiveness with body and goods, and all that is inviolable for the sake of conscience, and, no less than other Princes, Princes and Estates, to all owing, also entirely willing obedience. But when Your Imperial Maj. Maj. by the Elector of Brandenburg, my most gracious and gracious lord, together with their co-relatives in this matter, have furthermore indicated how your Imperial Majesty is to obey their sovereign and gracious lordship. Majesty of her Electoral and Princely. Gn. and Princely Grace a great astonishment, that their consciences are also drawn to the others by their sovereigns and princes, although it is not written in any place in the Word of God or in the Gospel that one should take away one's own 2c. and their kinsmen, agree with your Imperial Majesty that such a thing is contrary to the law. Maj. that such would be contrary to God and his holy word. But their graces and they know themselves to be quite free and certain of the same from the graces of God, and that they have not deprived anyone of what is his (who would like to put it on with reason and conscience). Where it might also be meant and intended for the dissolved monasteries, your Highnesses and F. G. also humbly remember the others, inasmuch as by those who have been appointed in their part to the Committee of Fourteen, a written request has been made for the sake of such dissolved monasteries and estates, and against your Imperial Majesty, also before this, and against the other monasteries and estates. Maj. also before, and today against Mr. Georgen Truchsess and the Chancellor of Baden, in this form and always, for the sake of their chur- and F. G. and the others, namely, that they want to keep and show themselves between here and a general, Christian Concilio, so that your Imperial Maj. Maj. should have to decide that they neither seek nor desire their own benefit therein, so that then in the said General Concilio such monasteries and estates may be transferred to your Imperial Maj. and a Concilii christii. Maj. and a Concilii Christian concern, such monasteries and estates may be ordered and turned to other Christian things and ways, as the Elector of Saxony has also done on this account, free, unprovoked report, also due submission, on some clergymen's unfounded handed over complaints, to those who deserve the Supplication on these Imperial Diets, with attached permanent causes of the administration and maintenance of indicated disposed monasteries, all this his Electorate has done before Your Imperial Majesty. G. before Your Imperial Maj. Maj. herewith repeated. As much, however, as is touched upon concerning the Electors and Princes, my most gracious and gracious Lords, so in the negotiation, of which some of your Electors and Fathers, together with some absent embassies, undertook on various days at this Imperial Diet, almost the same report has been made to their Electors and Fathers and to their relatives. and their kinsmen; however, their Supreme and Federal Governors, with a necessary reply, have in turn had the matter heard without reference, which Supreme and Federal Governors and the embassies have at that time, for the sake of a more equal retention and hearing, been served with writings and publicly read out, which have undoubtedly been presented to Your Imperial Majesty. Maj. that there was no need for such a reminder from the Elector and Princes. And for this reason my most gracious and gracious Lords, also their related cities, that Electors, Princes and Estates would burden themselves with such a burdensome obligation for the sake of their Supreme and Federal Governments, as spoken of by the Elector of Brandenburg; for their Grace, and the other undoubted hopes, 1) if their Supreme and Federal Governments also do not give the Estates cause to do so, as they would also unwillingly do so again for the sake of inequity. Gn. do not give the estates cause to do so, as they would also unwillingly do so again to the inequity, with again most humbly request to your Imperial Majesty, that they will comply with the requested obligation. They want to show themselves merciful to the requested copy, also for the sake of a precarious time limit, towards their Lord and Queen and their relatives, and against them, over such manifold requests and entreaties, by no means let themselves be moved to disfavor, but be their most gracious Lord and Emperor. This they offer in all submissiveness for the sake of Your Imperial Majesty. Maj.

Emperor! Her Majesty would again have listened to this part's rebuttal, and her Majesty would not admit, as we would slowly persuade her, that our part's faith and confession is so founded in the Gospel. For her Majesty would also have a conscience, and would be much less likely to deviate in her opinion from the holy Christian church, and [from the] long established holy Christian faith, than the Elector of Saxony and his electoral kin. Grace's fellow relatives 2c. But as far as the parting is concerned, where the Elector and his kinsmen, whom, as he has placed, also Imperial Majesty has no change of the Christian faith. Majesty does not tolerate any change, then it would be there; if not, then Imperial Majesty would let it remain with the answer given before, with the appendix that Her Imperial Majesty, after the expiration of 2c. 2) after the end of this Imperial Diet, with Princes, Princes and Estates, how to proceed with the matter, to finally decide on a Christian farewell; also wanted to seek advice from the Pope and other Christian kings and potentates on what Her Majesty, as a Christian Emperor and protector, should do in this matter for the preservation of the old true Christian faith, and that this new error and sect should be completely eradicated and the German faith should be strengthened.

Nation to be brought back to Christian unity. But as far as [the] Prince, Princes and the other estates of the empire are concerned, the matter would not be so pure as presented by the widow's remarks; For the princes and sovereigns would have been given sufficient cause by the fact that the preachers of this part, who aroused the peasant revolt, overthrew and strangled a hundred thousand people because of it, just as some princes and sovereigns have met with all kinds of insults and tolerated all kinds of things in the same cities, both clerical and secular, to diminish their honors; therefore it would not be so pure that they would not give cause. And it would be the Emperor's Majesty's serious command to restore and reinstate the abbots, monks and others who have been spoliated and expelled, because 3) Her Majesty would be solicited in many ways by Supplication 2c.

1121: The repeated declaration of the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen. 23 Sept. 1530.

See No. 1118.

The remonstrances made by Imperial Majesty to the Elector of Brandenburg and the other princes and estates of this part. Majesty by the Elector of Brandenburg 2c. the Elector of Saxony and the other Princes and Estates of this part, their Electoral and Princely Graces and they, the cities, have listened in submission. Their electoral and princely graces and they, the cities, would have listened in subservience. And it would be their necessity to let themselves be taken again with responsibility according to the length. But the estates of this part would think that it is a little late in the day, and that Imperial Majesty has already been delayed a little. Majesty has already been delayed a little long, which is why they wanted to shorten the matter as much as possible. And first of all, as far as the read parting and the offered replica are concerned, even though the princes and princes together with their kinsmen stood in the most humble hope to the imperial majesty that her imperial majesty would grant this part of the treaty. Majesty would send to this part the requested copies of the aforesaid farewell, together with the questionable time limit, also the offered replica, which is to be sent to the Emperor. M. [Order], and the read Confutation, compiled by sovereigns and princes, together with the cities related to this part, would not have refused, but nevertheless Imperial Majesty of her sovereignty would not have refused. Majesty has granted their most humble request in the

3) Here the Margraval Brandenburg manuscript continues thus: "where this does not happen, her Maj. would cause a fair understanding to do so herself". On the other hand the words following here in the text are deleted.

Not inclined to give, they would have to leave it at that. For the estates of this part would not give the Imperial Majesty, as their most gracious lord and emperor, any measure in this matter. Majesty, as their most gracious lord and emperor, no measure to give in this, but they have wanted to comply with their previous request with the replica; but for what constant and important causes the princes, princes and cities of this part do not know how to grant in the aforementioned parting, the Imperial Majesty has asked Mr. Georgen Truchseß and the Chancellor of Baden to give their consent. Majesty has received sufficient report from Mr. Georgen Truchsess and the Chancellor of Baden, as this part would understand. Nevertheless, the Elector of Saxony and his electoral co-relatives, the Prince of Saxony and his electoral co-relatives, wished to have a report from the Chancellor of Baden. Nevertheless, the Elector of Saxony and his electoral relatives, princes and cities wanted to discuss and move this part of the treaty with them between now and April 15, and to show themselves in all that they can, should, and may or may not do with God and conscience, out of love for Christian unity, to serve this part, and to show themselves against the imperial majesty, under their electoral authority. Majesty, under their chur- and princely grace. With a Christian, unquestionable answer, let the matter be heard within the time concerned. And thereupon it is once more humbly requested that Imperial Majesty will not bear any burden of this, but will graciously regard and consider this part of the Prince, Princes, and related cities' need, together with the greatness of this trade, as a most gracious Emperor. After that, when the Electors, Princes and Estates, on account of the other part, by the Elector of Brandenburg, and especially the Elector of Saxony, before the Imperial Majesty, have imposed a treaty on the Emperor. Majesty, as if his Electoral Grace had acted against the other Elector. His Elector's Grace has not shown himself to such an extent against the other Electors and Princes that there is no reason for them to turn to the Imperial Majesty, as has been said before. Majesty, as mentioned before, that also the matters of his Electoral Grace are not quite pure. Grace's things were not quite pure 2c. Such unfriendly imposition and complaint before Imperial Maj. Maj. from the princes and princes of the other part, as his electoral graces lords and friends. The princes and estates of this part would also know where their Imperial Majesty should hold out longer. Maj. would have good reason to postpone all of this, purely and continually, as the Elector, together with his Electoral Grace, and all of his friends, have done. Grace, would be innocent of all reprimands before God and men. For if anyone among the princes and princes of the other part were to accuse the Elector of Saxony or the other co-relatives, and thought that he did not know how to obtain justice for them in kind.

The Elector might not have been aware of the right to ordinary courts, of which also his Electoral Grace and the others were reluctant to refuse. and the others would not have liked to refuse; therefore the Elector should have been spared such a suit besides the others of his Electoral Grace. Grace's fellow relatives should have been spared. But besides this, the estates of this part ask to be heard by the Imperial Majesty as their lord and master. Majesty, as their Lord and Emperor and as the authorities decreed by God, now and herewith once more to an abundance, that they will bring to the attention of the Imperial Majesty or of the same Majesty, the Princes and anyone who thinks to accuse the Christian estates of this part, or who thinks to have some matters in dispute. Majesty or the courts ordered by the same, or as is always due, be of the right, and have the right knowledge shown and divorced, and in everything that is legally known and proven, want to keep duly and obediently, in comforting and good hope, Electors, Princes and Estates of the other part, Princes and Estates of the other part will in one part recognize that the manner in which one shows and holds oneself towards his Electoral Grace, also towards his fellow relatives, lands and subjects, must be that which is sufficiently to be shown, where it would have time, of the unlawful, 1) which also the Elector of Saxony wants to condition and reserve for him before Imperial Majesty. Majesty has conditioned and reserved for him. That also the Elector of Saxony wants to be basically blamed by the other part of the estates and causes of the next peasant uprising to several disparagement, that would have been much less provided for this part. It is also the duty of the Elector of Saxony and his electoral relatives before His Imperial Majesty to further discredit him. Majesty, because the Elector of Saxony has given neither advice nor action, or some cause for the same sedition, which would also have to be understood from this, because such sedition is not less burdensome to the Elector than to anyone else of the Electors, Princes and Estates. Thus also the estates of this part, but for their glory, have not shown themselves with less earnestness and expense to quell the same rebellion than anyone else, and to all this the Elector does not know any other way (although his Electoral Grace will have it changed), than that four years ago the smaller number in the 26th, at the first Speier Imperial Diet, which the Imperial Majesty proclaimed there. Majesty proclaimed, an instruction was issued and discussed, also by the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia,

1) In the preceding, the text is corrupted. Gin sense would be produced, if one instead of: "the Elector of Saxony, to" read: "recognize that".

as Imperial Majesty's governor and brother, together with other commissaries then ordered by Imperial Majesty. Majesty, also Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, had been unanimously approved and resolved, whereupon also a stately brave embassy to the Imperial Maj. in Hispania should have been made. In this Instruction the Causes, whence or from whence such Rebellion arose, have been clearly expressed and incorporated by the Electors, Princes and Estates of Saxony, whereupon the Elector of Saxony, in order to ascertain such Causes, wishes to have referred and drawn, that therefore his Electoral Grace and related Princes of the Empire are to be granted the same. His Elector's Grace and the princes and cities related to him should therefore have been spared and spared. And finally, the consolation and hope of the Elector of Saxony, as well as of the other princes and fellow relatives, in all this is to God the Lord alone, and also to the Imperial Majesty, as a praiseworthy God. Majesty, as a praiseworthy Emperor, in the most humble hope that Her Imperial Majesty will give these matters an opportunity. Majesty will graciously consider this matter, and will not be moved to disfavor the Christian estates of this part, but will be their most gracious Emperor and Lord, and offer themselves against the Imperial Majesty to the same no less than for the sake of the Emperor. Majesty no less than anyone else, in all things due or due, even above their due duty, their body, goods and fortune; is also Electors, Princes and Estates above the aforesaid of their Electoral and Princely Grace. and Christian hereditary and legal commandments, it is not necessary, for the sake of this part, to obligate themselves against Imperial Maj. Maj. for this part. And thereupon they have pledged themselves to the Imperial Majesty in all submissiveness.

Emperor! Majesty was based on her opinion, which she decided with Princes and Estates, and how it would have been indicated to the Elector of Saxony and the other Princes and Estates of this part; and she would not have considered changing the given agreement this time. What has also been reported to this part, and especially to the Elector of Saxony, would have been done by all Electors, Princes and Estates in general, together with what they have offered in writings also against the Imperial Majesty. Majesty shall henceforth remain and be based.

Their Electoral and Princely Graces, also their fellow relatives, wish to have their most humbly given notice, request and entreaty, so that the Imperial Majesty would not be delayed any longer, raised again most humbly. Majesty would not be delayed any longer, again also most humbly, with most humbly request, that Imperial Majesty would in his graciousness Majesty, in gracious consideration of them, would not be moved to disfavor them, but would be their most gracious Emperor and Lord, which they wanted to deserve for their Majesty's sake with body and soul. Majesty, as the Elector of Saxony in particular did before, manly, be he ecclesiastical or secular, before the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and as was due, to be just, so that no one would have to complain on their account.

To the honorable, prudent Mr. Lazaro Spengler, the City of Nuremberg Syndico, my favorable master and friend.

Grace and peace in Christ. Honourable, careful dear lord and friend! I have received my letters, which I sent to you, again through M. Vitum. And that you are concerned that M. Philip might have been more distressed by them, you do as a good friend, although [I] had not named anyone in them, and the like had been mentioned to me before was announced to great gentlemen. And I think they would have given us credit for taking such care of this matter and writing something serious, and I am also willing to let them read these letters. But God has promised that our dear Prince will one day be released from hell. God willing, he is uutoi- pueis ot urbitor belli. We have done enough, he who does not want to have peace, God can create discord enough for him. I will also write without this, if you desire, to the pious prince Margrave Georgen, admonishing and comforting both. May the merciful God also strengthen your dear Lord, together with you, your preachers and the entire congregation, amen. Hiemit Gott befohlen, Amen. Your honorable, prudent Mr. Lazaro Spengler, the city of Nuremberg Syndico, my favorable lord and friend.

Grace and peace in Christ! The farewell in Augsburg, my dear Lord and friend, which you R. Vito indicated in writings, has been revealed to me orally and in writing by my beloved Duke of Lüneburg. I mean yes, that is called worldly wisdom. Let it be understood that our Christ, condemned by them, is nevertheless so powerful that he can govern not only washers but also fools. And how should or could it be otherwise, where they rage against God's public wisdom, than when they disgrace God and mock us, as the other psalm sings? But there is no end to it, they must also experience the following little verse: Io'uotui- uä oos in ira sua. So they want it. Isiut, osuoä potitur. We are pardoned, and have done enough. LunAuis ooruii sit super euput ipsorum. I also wrote D. Wenceslao, for my good old confrere and monastic, Mr. Martin Glaser, that he may be with you and others.

wanted to promote his cause. For this reason, please also ask your fathers to command him, for I do not know how he is doing without him writing to me that he must leave the preaching ministry for the sake of armuth, which I do not like to see. May the merciful God strengthen and guide you by His Spirit, and may He help us to be happy together there, Amen. From Coburg, on the first of October 1530, Martin Luther.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Johans, Duke of Saxony and Elector, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord, in S. C. F. G.'s own hands.

Grace and peace in Christ. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I am heartily pleased that C.F.G. has come from hell to Augsburg with the grace of God. And even though the disgrace of men, together with their God, the devil, can almost be regarded as sour, we nevertheless hope that God's grace, which has begun, shall also henceforth be all the stronger and more with us. They are in God's hands as much as we are, that is not lacking, and they will neither do nor accomplish anything, let him have it, nor will he harm a hair of our head or anyone else's, for God Himself will do it mightily. I have commanded this thing to my Lord God. I know that he has begun it; I believe that he will bring it forth. It is not in the power of any man to begin or to give such teaching. Because it is

If God's will is that all things are not in our hand nor in our art, but only in His hand and art, then I will see who will be those who want to overtake and surpass God Himself. Let what is done be done in the name of God. It is written [Ps. 55:24] that the bloodthirsty and the false shall not be brought to judgment. Let them begin, and let them threaten; but let them finish, and let them perform. Christ our Lord, strengthen E. C. F. G. in a steadfast and joyful spirit, Amen.

Also, most gracious sir, because I have kept house here in Coburg this half year, I must report several defects to E. C. F. G., please E. C. F. G. not to complain, for I acknowledge myself guilty of such reporting, and E. C. F. G. not to complain. C. F. G. no more trouble than to give a serious order to the officials and whoever is ordered to do so. I have not only seen it from lesser people, but also through myself. So E. C. F. G. can find out all this from Hansen von Sternberg 1) and the Kastner, both of whom have secretly complained to me about it themselves, and as pious faithful people (when I experienced them) have great displeasure with it, and yet can do nothing. Will present such deficiencies here in the enclosed note 2) to E. C. F. G., and have humbly requested that E. C. F. G. would use some seriousness for once, and thus order that one would have to take it for an order. Date at Coburg, October 3, 1530.

1127 Report of the envoys of the Electorate of Saxony to the Elector of the Excuse of the Elector of the Palatinate because of the troublesome speech of the Elector Joachim of Brandenburg.

September 24, 1530.

This and the following document are found in Müller's Historie, lib. III, 41, p. 927. - This document is found as an enclosure to a short letter of the Councillors to the Elector in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 014.

After the deputies of the Count Palatine, Elector, had heard the arduous speech, after the given farewell of Roman Imperial Majesty, of yesterday's day against our most gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony, also the other princes. Maj. of yesterday, against our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, as well as the other princes and relatives of this matter, they would have been willing and willing, immediately in the presence of Imperial Majesty, Royal Duke of Hungary and Bohemia 2. Majesty, Royal Duke of Hungary and Bohemia, and the other princes and rulers, to speak against it, that such a thing had been brought forward without their knowledge and consent; yet they would not all have been together, and even those who were present among them, could not well have come together in the press of the interrogation and talked it over. For their lord would not have known how to attract our most gracious lord, nor the other princes and relatives, in such matters; therefore their lord would not have tolerated it, nor would they have suffered it, nor would they have been commanded to do so. But immediately after the end of the interrogation they had come together and discussed the matter with Duke Frederick, Count Palatine, and were first of all of the opinion that they should inform our most gracious lord as soon as possible, and before his Elector Palatine departs. They had first of all the opinion that they wanted to ask our most gracious lord as soon as possible, and before his electoral majesty departs, with a touching apology from their lord. Majesty and King Ferdinand beforehand, which was also done in this manner, and reached both lords, the Emperor and King, on the day of yesterday, Friday [Sept. 23], as a matter of necessity, with notice, as is evident, that this had happened without their knowledge and will, and they did not know our most gracious lord in this. 3) In addition, they had been informed today, Saturday, that they would be leaving the country. Furthermore, today, Saturday, they also appeared before the other sovereigns and princes who were together in the town hall, and publicly made a special report and apology to each estate, although one of the princes, whom they did not name, answered that they would present or report this to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty or to report it. Whereas the Palatine would have let it be heard again, they let it happen well, are not afraid of it, for it would have been announced to the Emperor and the King by themselves without this before. M. and the King without this having been opened and made known by themselves. Besides that, they did not want to save us from the fact that Emperor M. was on their side. M. personally answered to their request in this matter: "It was wrong and it was too much. For this reason 1) we finally asked that we would like to make such a report and apology to our most gracious lord, for it would have happened without her knowledge, and would also have no order to grant it, for her lord would have known his electors and the other princes. They also wanted to present such a complaint and apology to Margrave George of Brandenburg and the landgraval councillors as soon as possible on this day. To which we replied, after due consideration, among other things, that we wished to have such a request and application made to our most gracious lord without delay, without doubt that his C. F. Grace would graciously take note of it, and that his Electoral Grace would be pleased with what had happened. His Grace would graciously note it, and that his Electors would not have had anything else to do with the Christian, lawful, and high inheritance that had occurred, except that it would not be their will and opinion to approve or give chance to such burdensome and seriously disadvantageous undertakings, considering all the opportunities and careful circumstances that might arise and occur from it; moreover, that we have noted our most gracious Lord's mind of the friendly will towards their Lord, where his Electors would have been unconcerned about legal inheritance. We have also noted that our most gracious lord's mind of kindness towards their lord, where their gracious lord would like to be charged with an unjust complaint about a legal inheritance, that our most gracious lord would show himself to be a friend and prove himself to be a friend; as their graces on all sides would be well obligated to each other in matters of their proper and sincere inheritance, so that everything that would be beneficial and detrimental to everyone would be well taken care of.

1) The subject of this sentence is: "the Palatine counsellors".

To the well-born of our ranks and dear faithful, Albrechten, Count and Lord of Mansfeld, Hansen, Noble of Plaunitz, Christoffen of Taubenheim, Knight, and Hansen of Dolzigk 2c.

...in general and in particular...

By the Grace of God John, Duke of Saxony, and Elector 2c.

Dear Councillors and Faithful! We have received your letter, dated Augsburg, Saturday after Mauritius [Sept. 24], yesterday, Tuesday thereafter, towards evening, here at Nuremberg; and that our friendly dear cousins, Count Palatine Ludwig, Elector 2c. We have understood this from them as a special gracious favor, and that our friendly dear cousins, Count Palatine Ludwig, Elector 2c., in place of and on account of his love, according to the enclosed document sent to you, have so shown themselves and kept themselves to us. And although we had no doubt at all about our cousin, the Count Palatine, that his love's mind, opinion and disguise 2) had not been in such indications, as has nevertheless been publicly and grievously brought forward against us by our grandfather, the Elector of Brandenburg, on account of all Electors, Princes and Estates in general: It is a special pleasure to us that we should have heard this on account of his love, and we request that you inform the Palatine Councillors of the fact that you have let us know of their presentation and gesture, which they made on account of our dear cousin, and that we have reported our friendly good confidence, which we have towards our cousin, the Palgrave, their Lord, the Count Palatine, their lord, we thank them graciously, with the offer, with which we know how to show honor, love and good to his love again, that we, as cousin and friend, will gladly do so again with body and goods, even without that of our blood relationship, and will not forget this again in good. What else you will learn of this and other matters, you may send to us for our attention and make known to us; in this you do our pleasing opinion. Date at Nuremberg, Wednesday after Mauritius [Sept. 28] Anno Domini 1530.

E. How the decree of the Diet has been published to the cities as well, and what they have done for an explanation from this.

1129. declaration of the cities which have accepted the parting, but only conditionally.

The following three documents are found in the common archive at Weimar. Printed in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 640 ff., namely this document from the Margravian Ansbach Acts No. 55, the other two from the archives at Weimar, L. toi. 37. further with Chyträus, Bl. 305 b and with Müller, lib. III, onp. 49, p. 936. Förstemann places all three documents on September 29, and lets these declarations be the answer to No. 1131, while it is the other way round with Walch.

When on account of Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, by the most illustrious Highborn Prince, our most gracious Lord, Duke Frederick 2c., a further most gracious telling, request and demand was made yesterday, which the required free and imperial cities heard in all loyalty, and on approved consideration, further consulted, and considered that which your Imperial Majesty had done in all loyalty and faithful opinion. Majesty has done in all loyalty and faithfulness. And although it is a burden to them, at your Imperial Majesty's Majesty's most gracious request, after the opportunity of the runners, to give a more truthful answer, however, to be subservient to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's most subservient favor, the cities hereunder will, upon such request and petition common to Their Imperial Majesties, give a more explicit answer. Majesty's common request and desire, most humbly comply. With the most humble confidence, Her Imperial Majesty. Maj. will, in addition, give the highest and most gracious consideration to such report and request as they have given before, and will undertake ways and means everywhere that will serve peace and rights, as well as administration, government, and the prevention of disagreement, and, in addition, will have the most gracious understanding as to whether, at this and other Imperial Diets, such a thing would be undertaken that would be burdensome, unpleasant, and not deceptive to the cities mentioned; not that they would like the same thoroughly badly, as has been presented to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, but that they should also be heard in their complaints and most humble presentations, and that the charge should be acted upon, as has also been done before in the old imperial diets, and especially what is subsequently done here in the resolution and decree, that they should also hear the same, and that their necessity should be brought forward against it, then they will do everything that can be done for them in the most humble manner.

The most obedient obedience will be possible, and at the same time to live up to the Speirian farewell in all submissiveness.

1130. declaration of the cities of Frankfurt, Ulm and Schwäbisch-Hall that they cannot accept the farewell without having orders from theirs.

See the previous number.

Most Sublime Emperor, although we have no doubt that your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, will be our lords and friends. Majesty, our most gracious lord, our lords and friends, what serves for the handling of peace, justice and Christian faith, with all their property, body and soul, as obedient subjects, but since the matter, for which we are requested to give further answer, may reach further in itself and in the action already taken, than we may now think, also for this reason no order from ours, as they do not provide for this case 1) according to their reputation, then Imperial Majesty may graciously accept that we, behind the aforementioned our friends, in such an important and great matter, are to be given the order of the Emperor. Maj. graciously accept that we do not know how to respond to the aforementioned friends of ours in such an important and great matter without an order. Maj. would graciously grant us, as the envoys, such to no disfavor, but according to our necessity and for the above-mentioned reason, and to let such reach our friends behind them, 2) most graciously. For the sake of Her Imperial Majesty, we are obliged and inclined to do so.

Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Most Humbled Envoys to the Honourable Imperial Cities of Frankfurt, Ulm and Swabian Hall.

1131 The Emperor's answer to the declaration of the cities on the question whether they wanted to accept the parting or not. Sept. 29, 1530. 1)

See No. 1129.

On Thursday Michaelmas kais. Maj. gave this answer to the cities:

First of all, that Emperor Majesty acted with the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen. Majesty has acted with the Elector of Saxony and his co-relatives, not as an imperial state, but as a Roman Emperor, to find ways and means with his advisors to bring the matter to peace.

On the other hand, to preserve the peace of the land, her Majesty is inclined to all peace, and has also made peace everywhere where he has been; but because an error and discord has arisen in the holy faith, her Majesty must expiate it as he may.

Thirdly, Her Majesty is inclined that a Concilium be held, and his desire is also to help to manage the same.

On the fifth) that the cities request a consideration to bring such behind them to their sovereigns, so far the usage has not been to give them no consideration, not to bring anything behind them, but what common estates with the sovereigns have come to council, that the cities shall accept and stay with it, and it is still her Majesty's gracious request that the cities want to indicate whether they want to stay with her Majesty or not, as they were also held out to them before.

1132. imperial lecture to the city of Augsburg, in which it is harshly urged to accept the imperial decree for the sake of religion and, in the case of of the Catholic religion. The

13 November 1530.

This document is found in the supplements to Brück's History, p. 483 and afterwards in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 825. Latin in Ooslsstinus, tom. IV, x. 99 and from it German in Walch.

Translated from the Latin by I. F.

1) That this document cannot be the answer to the declarations of the cities given in the two preceding numbers is obvious from the contents of these documents. In the Weimar archives, the declaration of the cities follows only after this answer of the Emperor. In the Acts, our writing has the external inscription: "Was von wegen röm. kais. Majesty has been held up to the honorable free and imperial cities in response to their given answer on Thursday Michaelmas, and they have replied to it."

2) To the fourth point of the cities the emperor had no objection. (Förstemann.)

(1) The Emperor Carl, always greater, our most gracious lord, has listened to your opinion that you cannot accept the religious renunciation, and is most astonished that you want to reject it from you, since you have not brought forward any sufficient moving causes for your action and resolution. For the Emperor's Majesty Majesty never believed that you would separate yourselves from his Majesty as Roman Emperor and your rightful head, and not rather follow in the footsteps of your forefathers, the Imperial Emperor and his predecessors. Majesty and his predecessors the due obedience and reverence.

(2) Moreover, you cannot be unaware of how many and great acts of mercy the Emperor Maximilian, of blessed memory, and the whole House of Austria have done for you in former times, which will no doubt still be fresh in your memory, because they are far too well known and important, and for that very reason should be before your eyes every day.

(3) Accordingly, it is the command and will of His Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious lord, command and will that you, after mature consideration of the matter, accept the religious agreement, as you also formerly accepted the Speirical 3) agreement, and from many testimonies of holy Scripture it can be proven and made clear that this conclusion is entirely in accordance with the old religion and Christian doctrine, as your ancestors also approved and accepted it, especially since it refers to the pronouncement and the prestige of a future, free and general concilii.

(4) You are therefore again earnestly commanded by the most invincible Emperor not to refuse to take leave, and not to separate yourselves from his Majesty, your lawful lord. For the most Christian emperor, our most gracious lord, is as concerned about the salvation of his own soul as others, and because he seeks to keep his conscience pure and unharmed, he would, as is easy to see, unwillingly deviate from the right path of truth, much less knowingly lead others into error.

5th If this cause should stand in your way, that you would gladly accept and approve the parting for yourselves, if citizens and subjects did not oppose it, then the Imperial Maj. assures you by his loyalty not to arise with his protection and power, and to help to ensure that the rabble, if it

3) In the old edition: "Spanish" instead of: "Speirifchen".

4) "unwillingly" shredded by us instead of: against our will.

may retain the upper hand, as he also prevented and averted in the peasants' uprising. For your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord, well understands that such a dangerous uprising would be regarded primarily by you, as brave, just, rich and respectable men, and would affect you the most.

(6) Therefore, his Majesty is entirely of the opinion that, if you set an example and rid yourselves of the suspicion of the cause that you seem to protect and defend, the citizens could easily be kept in obedience and in check, so that they would not separate from Imperial Majesty and their authorities, but would follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. Maj. and their authorities, but would follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. But if, after this kind reminder from the most gracious Emperor, you nevertheless continue to act obstinately and contrary to his wishes, and out of guilty obedience to his Majesty do not accept the farewell, then you alone will have to ascribe all the blame to yourselves, [since] your office entails punishing and restraining the rebellious, disobedient, seditious subjects, as we still remember having happened in the Peasants' Revolt.

(7) Moreover, you can easily assume that Imperial Majesty's honor and reputation will be greatly diminished by such proceedings. Maj.'s honor and reputation will be greatly diminished by such a procedure, as you are not afraid to do such things in their presence, and thus also cause others to disobey and be cold-hearted. Which, since it was ordered by God to His Imperial Maj. Maj.'s office and the prestige conferred upon him by God, is immensely diminishing and detrimental, so Imperial Maj. wants and commands that you do not do such things in the presence of others. Maj. earnestly commands you to consult diligently on the whole matter, and to make known your opinion of it by a clear answer. Done on the Saturday after Martinmas, on the 13th day of November, in 1530.

F. Of a new peace treaty between the papal and Protestant envoys, whereby again no settlement was reached.

1133. means of settlement proposed by Margrave Ernst of Baden. The 3rd Oct. 1530.

This writing is found in Müller, lib. III, enp. 43, p. 941 and from the common archive at Weimar, ItsA. L. col. 37, no. 3, p. 196, m Förstemanns Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 664. The date results from a letter of the churfürstliche Rätthe of October 6, ibid. p. 680.

When the Imperial Maj. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, on the next Thursday after St. Matthew the Apostle's Day [Sept. 22], has had read to the Elector of Saxony and other relatives of the matter, a concept of a farewell, in matters concerning the Christian religion. The said Elector and relatives, however, with notice that these matters are important and great and concern their consciences, have humbly asked for consideration until the fifteenth day of April, but this has been refused to them by Imperial Maj. Maj. refused them. But since the said Elector and relatives have ever gladly submitted to the Imperial Maj. Maj. in all possible ways, they wish to accept the aforementioned parting in all articles as it is read to them, as they ask the Imperial Majesty to deny them their request. Majesty may graciously hear from them. Namely, as Her Imperial Majesty Majesty reports in the first article of the aforementioned farewell, how Her Imperial Majesty has responded to their letter of request. Maj. has taken notice of the irregularity and division of our holy Christian faith, and in addition to any one who has wished to present anything on account of such irregularity of faith, and named the above-mentioned Elector of Saxony and relatives, 2c. their opinion and confession in the presence of the other Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, graciously listened to them, advised them with timely and valiant counsel, and refuted and rejected them with good reason by the Holy Gospels and Scriptures 2c. Since the Elector of Saxony, the five princes, and six cities consider that such is the mind of the Emperor. Maj. is in this article itself, that what would be against such article, that the mentioned Elector and relatives do not reject respect with the Gospel and holy scriptures, that should be put to the decision of the Concilii. As it is further reported in the above-mentioned agreement that the Elector of Saxony and relatives are to consider between the 15th day of April whether they agree with the Christian Church and Papal Holiness, and with the Imperial Majesty, also Electors of Saxony, in the articles which have not been settled. Majesty, and also princes and rulers between the Concilio or not 2c. Although the Elector and his relatives, of their own understanding, cannot consider or know that they hold anything in their Articles that is against the Christian Church, for which reason they now want to have the permitted consideration written off, they do not, however, want to insist on their opinion finally or self-willedly, but to have their Articles and their contents put to the subsequent Conciliar decision.

As they then also hope and believe that the Imperial Maj. Maj. gracious opinion and reserved consideration also have this understanding. And after further in the farewell given to the Imperial Maj. Maj. that the Elector concerned and his relatives are not to print anything new in matters of faith, and that peace is to be kept by all the estates of the realm in the time of the above-mentioned intention, they humbly hope that Imperial Maj. Majesty's gracious opinion that also in matters of faith nothing new shall be printed by their opponents or counterparts contrary to that which the Elector of Saxony and his relatives' scholars have written so far in the same matters, so that they may keep their scholars the better off and prevent their subjects from having anything further or more distant printed in matters of faith. Likewise also concerning peace, since the above-mentioned intention has been rejected, that in the meantime peace be kept with the Council by all the princes, princes, and estates of the realm. Item, as further indicated in the aforementioned agreement, among other things, that neither the Elector of Saxony, the five princes or six cities, nor their subjects will be held in peace against the Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty, the Holy Empire, or the subjects of the Electors, Princes, and Estates, as has been done hitherto, shall draw or compel them to their sect. 2c. But because the said Elector and kinsmen would not remember that anyone had appealed to them in matters of faith, they have not yet set up a special sect, but consider that their detractors have brought this to the attention of the Imperial Majesty. Maj., for which reason they herewith humbly apologize, and do not wish to cause anyone's subjects or relatives to take their position, according to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. However, they do not want others to do the same against their subjects. And in addition, the reported Elector of Saxony, the five princes and six cities, have declared themselves against those who do not keep the holy sacrament, and against the Anabaptists with their Imperial Majesty, the other electors, and the other electors. They should by no means separate themselves from their Majesty and their loved ones, but should advise, encourage and help them as to what and how to act against them; as all the aforementioned Princes, Princes and Estates have agreed and promised their Imperial Majesty to do, as far as each of them is concerned. Maj. and have promised it. And because no common council has been held in the Christian church for many years, and yet in common Christendom, among all heads and estates, spiritual and spiritual authority has been given.

and secular, many abuses and complaints may have occurred a long time ago, that after all, and for a Christian Reformation, Her Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress, the Holy Roman Empress. Maj. has, in addition to Papal Holiness, also resolved with all Princes, Princes and Estates, now assembled here at Augsburg, to decree with the aforementioned Papal Holiness and all Christian kings and potentates that a common Christian council be held within six months, the next after the end of this Imperial Diet, the next after the end of this Imperial Diet, and that it be held in the most beneficial manner and for the longest possible time within a year of such notice, in the good hope and confidence that by this means common Christendom will be brought into lasting good unity and peace for the sake of its spiritual and temporal affairs.

1134 The Protestants' answer to the proposal of an even, or, in the absence of it, of a peaceful farewell.

This is a passage from the letter of the Electoral Councils to the Elector of October 6, mentioned before, in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 681 f., which arrived in Torgau on October 12 and was answered by the Elector on October 15. Also in Müller's Historie, lib. III, eup. 44, p. 946. The following two numbers are excerpts from the answer of the Elector.

Because their speech and presentation were noted in two ways, namely, to act for the sake of an even farewell and, in the absence of it, for a peaceful farewell. As far as a peaceful parting is concerned, we know that our princes and relatives on all sides would like nothing better than to have peace, to which they are highly inclined, and which they have sought and asked for several times in action, as is evident. Therefore we would be willing to enter into action with them in that case; for our, the Saxon, authority would be, among other things, to act and advise in all articles and matters not concluded by the realm, which might be conducive to the peace and welfare of the realm, in addition to other princes, princes and estates. But as far as the other article is concerned, for the sake of the equal parting, in which we noted that perhaps religion should also be included and meant, we did not want to reassure them that we really had no command to act in it, and presumably out of the desire of the people, we would not be able to do so.

the reason that such a request for the ungracious and swift farewell was by no means to be assumed, therefore they [the Imperial Deputies] would have to judge for themselves and assume that it would not be proper for us to act outside of the order.

Excerpt from a letter of the Elector to the Councillors left behind at the Imperial Diet, concerning the religious and peace treaties. October 15, 1530.

From Müller's History, lib. III, eap. 44, p. 948. complete is this letter from the communal archives at Weimar, II, 6A. L. fol. 37, No. 3, p. 143 printed by Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 741. This extract idick. I. 6. p. 744 ff.

Concerning the fact that Margrave Ernst of Baden, through 1) Count Georgen of Württemberg, has spoken to you about the farewell, we have read together with the delivered declaration or measurement, on which the Imperial Majesty of his hope should act; and that you have taken the same action on measure as you indicate against our grandfather, Margrave Ernst. And that you have averted the same action, to the extent that you indicate against our grandfather, Margrave Ersten, although we do not understand such indication of his love in any other way than friendly, is also a favor to us from you. For in addition to the fact that we have not considered that we and the rest of our kinsmen would be granted a leave of absence based on such a proposed declaration and opinion, we have sent the list to Doctor Martin Luther and several other of our scholars in Wittenberg, with the request that they consider it and inform us of their concerns. Among other complaints, they point out to us why such means could not be accepted: For first of all, it would not be understood from this whether such a declaration should be expressly stated in the agreement, or should be executed by an act alone, for if it should not be expressly stated in the agreement, it would be an inadmissible act; but nevertheless such a means or declaration would be burdensome, if it should be expressed by any article in the agreement. For by such a declaration, for the sake of the first and other burdensome articles of the read parting, it should be done for the good of ourselves and our kinsmen,

1) Förstemann wrong: "also", as the letter of the counsels in Förstemann l. c. shows. p. 679 shows. the doctrine, which we profess to be Christian and certain, would again be called into doubt against our conscience, and the devalue of abuses would thereby be raised to certainty and tacitly admitted. Furthermore, as far as printing is concerned, with such an opinion we would agree not to print the doctrine that has been written and taught among us until now, which would be nothing other than to ally and bind God's word against the holy Scriptures. Thus, before our departure from Augsburg, we spoke with Mr. Georg Truchsessen and the Chancellor of Baden about another declaration, namely, that no new doctrine should be printed here than has been taught up to now. Thereupon they indicated to Imperial Majesty. They then indicated that His Majesty's mind would not be otherwise; only that to include such a declaration in the decree would, in their opinion, be a burden on him; but that Margrave Ernst of Baden wanted to repeal such an act, so that even the righteous Christian doctrine would not be printed, which could by no means be approved without violating conscience. Furthermore, in such and similar negotiations, it has always been felt that what concerns the truth on our part should be put to a concilii decision, and thus be considered, in which way Imperial Majesty would order a concilium. Majesty would be inclined to institute a concilium, that it should be made solely for the sake of abuses and reformation in head and members, but not at all for the sake of doctrine 2) and to be thoroughly traced by the same, from which and the like it may well be inferred what is sought thereby). And this we have not wished to leave undisclosed to you, whether it might be possible to get further with the same or similar suggestions to you, so that you might have some knowledge of it, and our mind in it, besides what concerns the lack of authority. And although we may not respect what the Palatine Court Master and the three Chancellors and Princes, who spoke to you on behalf of the Elector, Princes and Estates, may have meant by the words "equal parting", Since our minds and those of our kinsmen have heard sufficiently before that we are burdened with such articles as are drawn to faith in a parting, your answer, which is given to the aforementioned councils everywhere, is pleasing to us. And since they have made such inquiries of you, as of princes, rulers, and estates, we doubt not that they will be informed of it by

2) Förstemann: "Doctörin".

3) In the original: "became".

The men who have commanded their loved ones and the others will no doubt have continued to deal with you or will deal with you in the future. And although we know nothing else than that before our departure you were given a short, harmless opinion as to whether, by the decree of the Almighty, things would be suitable or occur in such a way of a peaceful farewell or decency, on which the substance of such a farewell is to be safely directed, we nevertheless send you herewith once again a harmless opinion or copy of our previous consideration. For how such a parting might be made, so that it would be useful for the preservation of external peace, and inviolable to conscience and faith, should have no shortage of ours, as no doubt our kinsmen in agreement to grant, will also well, as much as is conducive to action, and that it cannot be interpreted as if it were done out of special fear, know how to use all convenient diligence to see whether the Almighty God will grant a common peace to the kingdom for the sake of these things; for there are nevertheless, on account of the Turks and otherwise, troublesome affairs enough before us. And we consider it acceptable, if a peaceful decree were to be made and established against us and our distant kinsmen, that Imperial Majesty, upon the arrest of the others, should grant us peace. Majesty, at the behest of the other princes, princes, and estates, would nevertheless, upon opinion, as your letter reports, make an arduous and serious departure, as a deterrent, so that the Gospel may not break in further, or be accepted. Now it is not for us, Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty to set a standard in this, so everyone will have to keep to it, so that he does what he is obligated to do first against God, and then against the authorities. And if you will receive a copy of this arduous parting, which you have partly seen, then, according to your request, send it to us without delay. And even if the decency to peace, of which the above-mentioned counsels have spoken to you as a way, on the other side should decline again, as we nevertheless want to provide ourselves to some of our friends that they will promote the things, to the benefit of the realm, with diligence, but that the aforesaid grievous parting should be publicized and publicly read, we nevertheless consider, for several reasons, that without this, for the sake of the matter of faith, you have no authority from us, as well as from our fellow councillors and envoys, for which reason you also have no authority from us.

1) "all" put by us instead of: "main".

your silence in this may be to no disadvantage. So you should also have a mandate for such a protest, without which you would be addressed; to the effect that the protest is invalid in the absence of such a mandate, it would be more convenient 2) that the protest should remain from you, rather than that it should be brought forward. For we, and our kinsmen, have nevertheless the time, that we may protest, and also appeal, after the report we have received, and within ten days a tsmxors notitias 3) against it; but we would shorten ourselves in this, if we should have a mandate protested by you, and yet it would not be possible, within ten days, the next thereafter, to appeal in full power by you.

And if further proposals come to you, or if requests for further action are made to you, we are not opposed to your listening to such proposals as you have done up to now (that you have no power to act on account of your faith, and that you cannot be heard behind the other of our fellow envoys), or to what action should be taken. For if you find that there are ways which would serve peace, and yet be inviolable to conscience, you, and also the other counsellors and skilful men, may work on them, so that it may also be permitted to get the things back, and to await orders thereon 2c. Although we do not doubt, as soon as you find that some points of faith are to be confiscated, you will judge for yourselves whether the things are worthy to be returned or not. All this we did not want to do on your report to you gracious opinion again. Date at Torgau, on Saturday after Dionysii, the 15th day of October, Anno Domini 1530.

Whether some of our fellow councillors and commanders, because of the peaceable decency, so indicated to you, the Almighty grant his grace to it, would perhaps want to apply complaints on their masters' behalf, which would not be drawn into the consciences, or because in such a parting, or since in such a parting, if it were to gain a progress, we and our kinsmen would not be put to any disreputable disgrace, but that they would say that it was a burden on him to grant such a remonstrance, unless the opposing party also admits the gospel, or does not wish to pursue it: Let not this be contested, but consult with the rest of the relatives of these things, and be agreed with the same.

We will compare the two, so that the outward peace may be established by a comfortable farewell or special action with us and the other kinsmen. Where the peaceful parting is to take place, and such a parting is to be made public, of which your letter reports something, you will also know how to take note, so that it<sup>1)</sup> is included in this Reichstag's parting for our sake, as you would have agreed to an article with the other for our sake. For we want to know how to keep ourselves in other matters, that it should not be reproachable to us, as then also happen to the next Speier farewell from us, if we also did not want to behave towards you. Date ut supra.

1136 Further excerpt from the same letter of the Elector to the Councillors at Augsburg, concerning the aid of the Tyrol.

See No. 1135. Förstemann I. c. S. 742 f.

For since (as Margrave Joachim next spoke against us and our kinsmen) the King [Ferdinand] together with his followers, for the preservation and re-establishment of the old faith and the suppression of the eternal, indestructible word of God, have offered to surrender body and goods to Imperial Maj. Maj. offered, we will take care that the royal dignity will be much more willing to offer the body and all the property of their royal dignities, without any withdrawal or objection, especially since they are more obliged to use force against the Turks and the Mahomet's faith for the salvation of their poor subjects before God than against us, together with all their appendages. Thus it has been done for our good pleasure that you, together with the other princes and the six princes, as well as the assigned councillors, have considered it good that such help against the Turk should not be considered good, if the king intends to persist with the pope's pardon, so that he should have to deal with the spiritual goods and jewels in the German nation. For if such goods are to be attacked and used for the resistance of the Turk, it is more reasonable that we, and other princes and rulers, use and sell the same goods ourselves for this purpose, since all of us and the whole realm, for the sake of the war waged by the king and for the sake of the irritation, are now above all counsels and friendly objections which the king has before the king.

1) Förstemann: "ir".

The monasteries in our principality, which have been denounced in the Hungarian war, must not be less afraid of the burden of the Turk than he himself, than that such should be granted to him, and finally be wasted on duties without benefit. Therefore, we want to diligently keep up with the other estates for our sake; for although the disposed monasteries in our principality can be used more cheaply for other and more godly and charitable things, to which we also offered ourselves many times at this Imperial Diet, but rather than we could suffer that the king should have to sell such monasteries and associated properties, we would rather and much more gladly sell them ourselves to knightly people or otherwise distribute them to serve and act against the Turk on our behalf; But this we point out to you alone, so that you may know how to dispute such opinions for yourselves, since it is convenient to do so, since they want to seek much glory against us in restituting the abbeys.

1137 Article of the Peace read to the Confessors of the Augsburg Confession. The 22nd of October 1530.

This document is found in Chyträus, Bl. 307d; in Müller, lib. III, eax. 46, p. 960 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 753.

(1) We, the princes, prelates, and estates, who have accepted and approved this treaty, have agreed that no estate, ecclesiastical or secular, shall overreach, force, or require the other, nor shall any authority have its interest, rent, tithes, 2c. stolen or held against it, nor shall any one take the other's subjects, either for faith's sake or for any other cause, into his protection and shield, with penalty of our imperial peace. We have herewith fully observed and enforced the peace of the land.

(2) Furthermore, we have agreed and united with princes, rulers, and estates, and they in turn have agreed and united with us, as far as our ancient Christian faith and religion is concerned, to present all our kingdoms, lands, people, body, and goods. If one state wants to overreach or violate the other, the violator shall 2) report this to our Imperial Court of Appeal. The court shall order and command the violator to stand still with the proposed armor, subject to the penalty of eight.

2) Förstemaun: "so" instead of: shall.

(3) But if the perpetrator appears disobedient to such mandate, then our Imperial Fiscal shall proceed and proceed against him to the declaration in the penalty of eight. 1) also in virtue of the same eight the next-sitting princes, sovereigns and others shall be required, and the damaged party shall be helped in the most beneficial way.

(4) We, as the head, also want to do the same with our kingdoms and hereditary lands, and the perpetrator or rapist shall be obliged to pay the helper his costs and damages and to restore them, and it shall also be at the helper's discretion whether he wants to make the damaging party pay such damages by deed or by our Imperial Chamber Court. Chamber Court.

5. In addition, for the sake of the rebellious subjects, we leave it at the Speier agreement, namely, where some subjects of some authority, ecclesiastical or secular, further converge, again arouse rebellion and indignation, then the next adjacent Electors, Princes, Counts and other authorities shall approach, save and help the same authority in which the rebellion has arisen, from hour and in view, also most urgently, on horseback and foot; and if the same help, so requested, would be too weak for the riot that has arisen, then the other next-sitting princes, lords, and estates shall, upon request, as is stated above, likewise, to the greatest extent possible, also move to quell the disobedient rioters again, and to bring them into obedience and to punish them for the offence, and in this we all show and hold ourselves one against the other no differently than if such rebellion and outrage had occurred and happened in each of our own principality, dominions and territories, and to the extent that each would have liked to have done and to take from the other.

6. In order that no error or misunderstanding may arise between the helper and the one being helped, the help of the princes, lords, counts and estates required for the rescue and help of the other shall be given to the authorities in whose principality, dominion or territory the riot has arisen, in whose principality, dominion or territory the insurrection has arisen, at horse and foot, and, if necessary, at their own expense and damage, for one month against the disobedient subjects, but that in such month the arrival and departure shall be counted. If, however, such assistance extends beyond one month and is delayed, then the person to whom the help would have been done, unite and compare with the helper for the help, which is done and shown over the month, in which the helper, against whom he has helped, shall thus keep and show himself tolerably, friendly and neighborly for such help, as he would like to have had and done by others in the same case.

(3) About all this we command from the Roman Imperial Majesty. Majesty. We hereby earnestly command all and any Electors, Princes, ecclesiastics and seculars, prelates, counts, barons, knights, servants, captains, bailiffs, governors, stewards, administrators, bailiffs, mayors, judges, councillors, citizens, municipalities, and otherwise all other of our and the Empire's subjects and faithful, regardless of their dignity, status or nature, and we wish to do so, that none of them may violate, attack or damage the other by force and deed, contrary to the law and our and the Holy Roman Empire's established truce, but that they may keep peace with each other, as the said truce is able, according to its articles, to avoid our and the Empire's severe disgrace, as well as the penalty, 4) included in the aforementioned truce of our and the Holy Roman Empire's land. This is our serious opinion 2c. Actum Augsburg, Saturday after Simonis and Judä [Oct. 29] Anno Domini 1530.

3) The following does not actually belong to the preceding, as Müller and, after him, Walch have connected it with, but it bears the date October 29, 1530. It is found in Förstemann 1. a. p. 773 under the title: "Decision, how the Emperor wants to handle the article of the peace of October 22." This section should have been placed before No. 1143. It was read to the Protestants on October 30. See No. 1154.

5) Förstemann: "dasselbige", for which "desselbigen" is to be read, as follows from the conclusion of No. 1140.

The same would have offered to do so, and in that case would not have separated from them, the estates, nor would they have wanted to separate themselves yet. Now the same would have been undertaken without their presence, contrary to traditional usage, and the estates would thus have separated them from them. But since the same article of peace is based on the parting without means, and the content of the same parting would be hidden from them, necessity and opportunity require that they also have an explanation and report. For this reason, I request that a copy of the aforementioned agreement, as well as of the read article concerning the peace, be sent to them in writing, so that they may be able to see the necessity therein, so that they may be heard all the more respectfully with an answer to it.

Electors, princes and other estates, also his electoral grace, with them. They would have heard the answer to the previous announcement, which was certainly not made and carried out in any other way than in a friendly, gracious and good opinion, and without doubt the counsellors and embassies appointed, as well as their lords and masters, would know from the actions taken that their, the Electors, Princes and Estates', minds and opinions at this Imperial Diet were never other than to act for peace and unity, and that they have had much diligence, effort and work, as well as a long time, to establish peace. They hoped and were sure that it would be found that they did not separate themselves from Saxony and its kinsmen. But they would not have liked to hear that they had separated themselves from them, nor would they have liked to change their mind about this by means of manifold notices and reminders, and so they would have had to place this in their will and favour. In addition to the fact that they had allowed themselves to be heard as the councillors, as they had no command to act further in religion, therefore they did not require nor draw them to the position of peace. But that the Saxons and the others did not know what the treaty was based on, and asked for a copy of it and of the article of the treaty, 2c., it is indicated that such a treaty was based on their religion, for which reason they did not know how to give them a copy without the knowledge of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to give them a copy, because they have no command to act on account of religion, as they have heard. had let them. But they wanted to take care of themselves, because some of them offered to help the Turks in advance, they would not separate themselves from the common estates for such a praiseworthy Christian work, and would show obedience to their sovereignty. For, as reported, it would be such a custom in the kingdom beforehand, what the several parts would decide, that the others would have to follow it.

40. the Saxon and her fellow-relatives' rejoinder according to existing consideration. 22 Oct. 1530.

See No. 1137. with Förstemann I. c. S. 757.

They would have understood the reproach again to good measure, and would not know to remember, would also have never noted it from their most gracious and gracious lords and the others of their electoral and princely graces. They would not have remembered it from their most gracious and gracious lords and the rest of their electoral and princely relatives that they had ever been, nor should ever be, willing to separate themselves from the commonwealths. For what is conducive and conducive to the common and lasting peace, welfare of the empire and the German nation, that their graces and the others therein have submissively and benevolently offered and acknowledged themselves among others. But that their lords might not have compared themselves to the other estates, as far as religion was concerned, their electoral and princely graces, together with their co-religionists, would not have done so. Graces together with their kinsmen in Imperial Majesty and their present. Maj. and their presence have shown sufficient and well-founded reasons for leaving it at that. And when it was indicated by them later on that the parting concerned religion, and that the article of peace, which had been read out, also extended to this, they, the Saxons, together with the others, had received clear information from it, because it was stated in the article of peace that no one had the right to it and could receive it, except those who had accepted and consented to the same parting, so that our lords did not understand it, which they had not understood before. Therefore his Electorate and the other estates Therefore his Electors and the other estates have to judge that their search and request was not unnecessary, and they have to report this to their lords to respect their need. For the sake of the help of the Turks, they would not have offered or allowed themselves to be heard in any other opinion beforehand, except in the case that a common and lasting peace would be effected and provided, as its sufficient cause would have been indicated to them, on which they also again relied.

1141: The Estates' Rebuttal, after the Council had been held, again presented by the Elector of Brandenburg. Oct. 22, 1530.

See No. 1137. Förstemann I. c. S. 758.

After a stirring rebuttal and repetition, his Electoral Grace said: "If the Saxons and the others had taken the letter of the article of peace correctly, they might have understood from it that their lords had not concluded from the peace. His Grace said: if the Saxons and the others had taken the letter of the article of peace correctly, they would have understood from it, and also that their lords had not concluded the peace, but that their lords had not compared themselves with the common estates on account of religion, that would have been the same as the right, therefore it would also have remained that they were not drawn to the action. But that they let themselves be heard as if they had concluded the peace, they did not consider it so, as said before, if they considered the letter right; so there would also have been a common land peace beforehand, which was now included in the article of the peace, and their lords would have also certified and sealed the same 1) together with other estates. For this reason, it should be ensured that the Saxons and their relatives do not have cause to speak out on account of the peace, and that they do not provide help against the Turks from such a common field, as is partly noted in their offer of inheritance. For if they should refuse to do so, they, the common estates, would have to refer the matter to Imperial Majesty. Maj.

1142: The Saxon and its relatives' more distant rebuttal. 22 Oct. 1530.

See No. 1137. Förstemann I. o. p. 759.

On the other hand, the Saxons, together with their relatives, after repeating what was said by the Elector of Brandenburg, through Mr. Hansen, nobleman of Planitz, knight, have said this: that their lords and their own were not concluded from the peace, according to their report, they could not judge this from them, for their own declaration and report, their understanding, indicated otherwise; because the receipt of the article of the peace of the property and sound, that only those who consented to and accepted the parting, should be drawn into it and meant to be in possession of it and to receive it. If they, the princes, rulers, and estates themselves, were to admit that religion was included in such a parting, on which it was then based, and their lords were to be satisfied with it, they would have to accept it.

1) "the same" is missing in Förstemann.

They could not have compared it to them, therefore they could not have agreed to part with God and their consciences: how could our lords understand or think of such peace? as they would have been able to judge it for themselves. But that they would be informed of the common peace, they would well remember that it had been established and united all the estates, of which their lords had also had enough; but since the serious parting by the Roman Imperial Majesty, in their own peace with the estates, had not been possible, they would not have been able to understand it. Maj., in the presence of the estates, would be given to their most gracious and gracious lords and relatives in such a way that they would see their body and goods, land and people with their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and in turn her Imperial Majesty Majesty also undertakes against the estates with their kingdoms to purge the present and to bring it back into the old use and essence of the traditional faith, and then their lords with God and conscience would not desist from their surrendered confession: then they, the estates, would have to consider what the same land peace would work and be beneficial to their lords and theirs, about such union, peace. If, however, it should be the opinion that their lords and their own should be included in the peace, then it would be their submissive request that they, the estates, express this clearly and loudly, and that also the Imperial Majesty be named in such peace. Majesty would be consulted in such peace, as has been done before at other imperial congresses and "agreements" concerning peace with Emperor Maximilian, of blessed high noble memory, and with this Imperial Majesty. Maj., and that the article concerning faith and religion, as well as the given parting, would be declared necessary and for lasting peace, so that their lords and their own would remain calm, unrestrained, and unviolated in their faith, religion, and ceremonies, until a general, free, Christian concilium. In that case, they would show and maintain their lords' submissiveness in all things that are good for the common Christianity and for the help, protection and protection of the needy, as well as in all other things that would benefit the empire and its welfare, in addition to other imperial states.

1143: The Augsburg Confession's Reply to the Conclusion of the Article of Peace Transcribed to The Estates of the Empire

(No.1137). The 30. October 1530.

History, lib. III. eaz". 46, p. 970 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 774. Förstemann dates this document from October 29, but since the conclusion of the peace article (according to no. 1154) was not read to the Protestants until October 30, that date is inaccurate.

Most Reverend, Most Illustrious, Most Highborn Prince, Most Reverend, Most Highly Illustrious, Most Highborn Prince, Most Noble, Most Strict, Most Learned, Most Gracious, Most Gracious, Most Favourable Lords and Good Friends! We, as our most gracious and gracious lords, the Elector of Saxony, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, Landgrave Philippsen of Hesse, also other princes and the cities of these matters, have ordered your electoral, princely, favourable lords and good friends, to be granted the right to the land. Gn. and favour, and afterwards delivered in writing the article of peace, which is to an abundance, from word to word, hereafter recorded, inasmuch as roman emperor maj. Maj., our most gracious lord, settles the same with your electoral and princely graces and favors. and favour, and resolutely, in submissiveness heard.

(2) And your noble, princely, and gracious favors have undoubtedly recalled. and favour, that our most gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony, and the other Princes and Estates, who have been concerned in this matter, have each time heard and been heard of a common and lasting peace in the Holy Roman Empire; as their Electors and Princes, and the others, are most eager that such a common and lasting peace should again be established and preserved. and the others, that such a common and lasting peace be established and maintained, are highly inclined and eager, with the entreaty that nothing shall happen to the Turkish case, and all the concerns and welfare of the Holy Roman Empire, as far as they may have such peace. Since, however, the article of peace which has been handed over is somewhat unfair and obscure for a number of reasons, we, the envoys, wish to make the same complaint to your electors and princes. We, the envoys, hereby report these complaints to your noble and princely graces and in your best interest.

(3) And first of all, in such a delivered article of the peace it is not explained on what the same is based, because neither before nor after nothing has been reported or indicated, and how the words in the opening, namely, "About all this we command," 1) are to be understood.

4th For the other, that the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has not entered into such articles of peace. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has not entered into such articles of peace.

005 Thirdly, our most gracious and gracious lords, and others, have well to remember what burdensome parting their chur-

Majesty with the other estates, and the estates again with their Majesty, have had themselves heard; from which your churlish and princely graces and favours are to be considered. and favor, that our most gracious and gracious lords and their relatives have to take care of this.

(6) Fourthly, because (as we have reported) in the matters of our holy faith and religion, a burdensome decree is to be drawn up, which our most gracious and gracious lords and relatives cannot nor may not accept for the sake of their consciences, by which cause might perhaps be taken to give an order to the Court of Appeal or Fiscal to proceed and proceed against their Electoral, Princely and other legal (as one would like to call it) rulers. and the other legal (as one would like to call it) to proceed and proceed, which then could lead to much disputation and complication. Since the Christian, honorable, and lawful call, petition, and request of our most gracious and gracious lords and kinsmen has always been and still is to provide, establish, and maintain a common and lasting peace, on which they will then let themselves be heard in all submissive obedience, along with other princes, princes, and estates of the realm, then, by the grace of their sovereign and princely lords, and of the others, our sovereigns, princes, and estates of the realm are to be heard every time. and the others, our most humble and most diligent request, Your Electoral and Princely Grace, Your Grace and Your Grace. Grace, Grace and Favor want to direct the matters again so that for the sake of faith and religion no one has to wait for a Christian concilium and the outcome of the same, that also our lords and relatives of these matters of all fiscal and chamber court proceedings, because of the article of our faith and religion, are discharged in between. For one.

(7) For the other, that the Imperial Majesty has entered into such peace. Majesty has joined in such peace, as then Her Imperial Majesty has done. Majesty. Emperor Maximilian, Most Sublime Memory, as well as their Imperial Majesty himself. Majesty himself, was also included and incorporated in the given established treaty and land peace at Worms. Our most gracious and gracious lords and relatives, nevertheless, do not wish to separate themselves as far as the peace treaty in general is concerned, but have agreed to keep it steadfastly, firmly and unbreakably. And therefore, for the sake of our lords and others (since this is a matter that concerns first of all God and his holy word, and in addition our conscience and the salvation of our souls), we humbly request, and provide, that Your Imperial Majesty also grant your electoral power. Majesty, also your electoral, princely. graces, favors, and favors will-

We again, as stated above, have your gracious providence, so that such a common peace may be permanently established, maintained, and the diligence therefore refused; for if such, as we do not wish to comfort ourselves, should not be considered over such a manly reminder and suggestion, your electoral, princely graces, graces, and favors have graciously and understandably to deem that we, according to the order we have received, may not allow ourselves to be granted any further help against the Turks. graciously and understandably deem that we, according to the order we have received, may not allow ourselves to be granted any further help against the Turks, but would have to let this reach our most gracious and merciful lords and the others. Once again we humbly ask your electoral, princely, gracious and most gracious Your electoral, princely and gracious graces and favors do not want to hear all this other than according to our great need; we want to hear this for your electoral, princely and gracious graces, favors and favors. graces and favors in subservience and willingly.

1144 Imperial reply to the Augsburg Confederates on the document submitted to the Imperial Assembly.

Oct. 30, 1530.

See the previous number.

(1) In response to the writ and articles which the Saxons and their supporters have handed over to the common princes, princes and estates, they have sent the same articles to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and thereupon his Imperial Majesty, together with the same chieftains, has sent for them. Majesty, together with the same princes, princes and estates, decided on the opinion as follows:

2nd Namely, on the first article, when the Saxons and their kinsmen denounce that the mandate and precept is obscure and unfair, and is not explained to what it refers 2c.,

(3) Is Imperial Majesty also the Princes, Princes and Estates answering? Majesty has also answered the Princes, Princes, and Estates: Because they have not accepted, nor do they wish to accept, the separation on account of religion, Imperial Majesty, as Roman Emperor, who is inclined to maintain peace and unity in the Holy Empire, has offered a common peace to all Estates, with no exceptions. Majesty, as Roman Emperor, who is inclined to maintain common peace and unity in the Holy Empire, has commanded a common peace to all the estates, excepting none.

(4) And when they secondly declare that the Imperial Majesty has not entered into such a mandate, their Majesties also answer. Majesty has not consented to such a mandate to keep the peace, her Majesty and the princes, princes and estates answer that it is not proper, nor has it ever been necessary, that her Majesty herself should command peace, but that her Majesty, on account of her sovereignty and authority, should and may command peace to her subjects. Majesty herself should command peace, but His Majesty, on account of her sovereignty and authority, should and may well command his subjects to keep the peace.

5th Then, thirdly, when they complain of the parting which has taken place in the presence of the Emperor, their Majesties and Princes, Princes, and Estates answer: Because they have refused the parting for religion's sake, and thereupon have allowed themselves to be heard by the Imperial Majesty, Princes, Princes, and Estates, that they have joined their bodies and goods to one another for the entertainment of our holy Christian faith. Majesty, Princes and Estates, that they have set body and goods together for the maintenance of our holy Christian faith. Majesty and Electors, Princes, and Estates have made a board for resistance and defense, from which they may well hear that His Majesty and Electors, Princes, and Estates' opinion is not to war against them, but to enjoin and command common peace.

6th Fourthly, when they ask that the treasurer should not proceed against them on account of religion, 2c. the answer to this is: that Imperial Maj. Maj. also the Electors, Princes and Estates, are not a little displeased at such an unseemly and unreasonable request of theirs, that his Maj.'s right should be barred, for it is contrary to the common peace of the land and all the orders, laws and statutes of the realm, and so it concerns her Maj.'s supreme authority to administer justice. If her Majesty's right were barred, her Majesty would not be able to execute that which is due and obligatory to his Majesty as Roman Emperor, and not only would his Majesty's right be barred, but all Princes, Princes and Estates would also be deprived of the same right in their lands. Maj. would not rightfully punish the Zwinglians and the Anabaptists, which would be contrary to their own opinion and opinion, which they had previously reported to their Imperial Majesty. Maj. have indicated to them.

(7) Further, as they desire that Imperial Maj. Maj. should also have entered into the common truce, 2c. Maj. and the Princes, Princes and Estates answer: Since the truce, formerly established, is still in existence, and her Maj. is involved in it, and the command which her Maj. is now issuing is based solely on the truce, it is unnecessary that his Maj. should command it himself; as is also indicated in the other article above.

(8) And because all their desires are innovations alone, Imperial Majesty also desires the Princes, Princes and Estates to refrain from such innovations. Maj. also request the Princes, Princes and Estates to refrain from such innovations, and to refrain from further annoying or attracting Imperial Maj. Maj. and Princes, Princes, and Estates with such opinions, and that they not further molest or attract them, and that they grant the Turkish relief and other things done for the benefit of the Holy Empire and the common German nation, and that they not differ from other Princes, Princes, and Estates in such matters, but keep to the custom and usage of old in the Empire 2c.

1145 The Augsburg Confession's Answer to the Imperial Resolution. October 30, 1530.

See No. 1143.

They would have received the letter, so Imperial Majesty. Majesty's reply to your humble answer, which you sent yesterday to your Royal and Royal Highnesses, favors and friends, on which your Imperial Majesty's mind rests. Maj.'s mind rests on; noted therefrom that Her Imperial Maj. Maj. have an ungracious liking and surprise for their submissive answer, which they do not provide for, because nothing else is required therein than what their most gracious and gracious Lords and their kinsmen have great need of, for cause, partly indicated in their answer, namely, to establish a common peace in the Holy Realm, for which purpose they have also sent their Imperial Maj. Maj. also Electors, Princes, and common estates would be inclined to for themselves. Therefore their most humbly request, Imperial Maj. Maj., Princes, Princes and Estates would not bear them an ungracious favor, but would consider the need of their lords in mercy. They also found that their Majesty was burdened by the fact that in their answer they had suggested that their Majesty was not at peace, and had finally asked that their Majesty also be consulted, which had never been heard, that their Majesty should command her herself. Now it would not be the opinion, nor would it be found in their answer, that they sought or desired that her Majesty should command peace to her herself, knowing well that it was not due to them to do so. But that they asked her Majesty to join them in the peace was due to the fact that in the Holy Empire of Roman Emperors and Kings, and especially by Emperor Maximilian, there had been no peace before.

The Emperor Maximilian, of high lordly memory, and by this present Imperial Maj. Maj. in the establishment of the Peace of the Land at Worms, in which it was clearly indicated that Emperor Maximilian had united, committed and bound himself with Princes, Princes and Estates to establish a common peace in the Holy Empire, in which then the present Imperial Majesty also followed in the footsteps of her ancestor. In this case, therefore, for the strengthening of a common peace, they also humbly asked for it, and not of the opinion, as heard above, that her Majesty should command peace for herself, but only unite, obligate, and unite with princes, princes, and estates. In addition, they also noted from the document read out that Imperial. Majesty, our most gracious lord, would be greatly displeased that she requested that in matters concerning faith and religion, the fiscal not be allowed to proceed against her most gracious and gracious lords and their kinsmen, for her majesty, also electors, princes, and estates are to be bound together. and estates, as unseemly and unreasonable, that her Majesty's right should be barred, since it would be contrary to the common peace of the land and all orders, laws and statutes of the realm. Thereupon they indicated that their opinion would not be to bar the right of their Imperial Majesty. Majesty's right, and that this should not be done, even if it were not the will and mind of their most gracious and gracious lords and relatives. For since Imperial Majesty Majesty has arrived in the Holy Roman Empire as the head, her sovereigns and relatives, in addition to other electors, princes and estates, have asked in the most submissive and highest terms that her Majesty wish to maintain peace and justice in the Empire, Their sovereigns, princes, and estates have also rendered assistance to the same with other princes, princes, and estates, so that the same has been preserved in the empire and also up to here and still; how then may it be imposed on them to block the right of Imperial Maj. Maj. to block the right? But that they requested that the Fiscal not proceed against their most gracious and gracious lords and relatives on account of faith and religion, would have been done because they were concerned that the decree, as far as religion is concerned, because it is set in general, should be understood that their most gracious and gracious lords and relatives should be included in it (which their electors and relatives are not allowed to do), F. G. and relatives could not nor would they want to accept with God and conscience), that then, where their graces and the relatives did not follow nor pursue this, the Fiscal or Court of Appeal would like to proceed with the penance, determined in the parting, which would be almost burdensome for her electorate, F. G. and the relatives, and would also bring little peace and tranquility, as her Imperial Majesty, Princes and Estates would well judge from their own high sense. Maj., Electors, Princes and Estates would have to judge from their own high sense. Therefore their most humbly request, Imperial Majesty, Electors. Majesty, the Electors, Princes and Estates will move all this graciously and favorably, and give them to know what is in their mind: whether their most gracious and gracious lords and kinsmen are to be meant and understood in the parting, concerning faith and religion, in such a way, if their graces and kinsmen do not keep or comply with the same, whether then the Fiscal and Chamber Court are to have power, against their Electorate and the other kinsmen, to take action, F. G. and the others on the penalties therein imposed, or not. For, if it should have the same sense, they would be caused to let themselves be heard further according to their lords' necessity; but if it would not have the sense, then they want to report their concern further. Thereupon they ask for a gracious and favorable decision, also a copy of the read document, to report it to their masters, who would undoubtedly let themselves be heard on it in a Christian and proper manner.

Common estates would have listened to her presentation, did not doubt, they would have finally noticed from the read out writing of Imperial Maj. Maj. and that her Majesty and the estates were not intending to do anything against their most gracious and gracious lords, together with their relatives, but that they should keep their fists with them; therefore, for the sake of peace, they would not have cause to be opposed by the common estates in the help of the Turks, if their request was that they wanted to settle with them in this matter. But as far as the Fiscal is concerned, the Estates have nothing to do with it, as they know, but they would like to present their request to the Imperial Majesty himself, if they would do so. Majesty himself, they would undoubtedly receive a decision from her Majesty.

1147: The Augsburg Confession Affiliates' Further Request. October 30, 1530.

See No. 1143.

They did not want to speak of peace at this time, but only asked them to declare whether their most gracious and kind lords and relatives should be included and meant in the parting. and relatives should be included and meant in the agreement concerning religion, in such a way that if their Lord and Lady and the relatives do not comply with the same agreement as far as religion is concerned, or live in accordance with it, then the Fiscal should proceed ex officio against their Lord and Lady and the others, and their Lord and Lady and the relatives should be subject to the penalties and punishments contained therein.

For Imperial Maj. Maj. and the other estates knew that their lords could not or would not accept the ordinance on account of religion; if the same were to be publicized and publicly issued, it would be considered a new constitution and law, and all those who understood and acted contrary to it would be considered to have fallen into the penalty and punishment imposed therein, which would be quite unpleasant to their lords. Therefore, in accordance with necessity, we ask for a declaration.

They could not remember that their masters were included in the farewell, as far as religion was concerned, nor did they think so. In order that they might clarify the matter, however, they were to come to the house again at 2 o'clock after noon, and if they were to be read the document, they would note from it that it was not in their opinion, as they had carefully discussed it. But it would not be in their power to send them the copy of the read document, but they wanted to send their request to the Emperor. Maj.

1149: Declaration of the Augsburg Confession on the read parting. The 30th of October 1530.

See No. 1143.

Her lordship, f. gn. and common estates would have heard in the morning, whereupon their submissive, official and amicable request would have stood, what also their electorate, their fathers, and the common estates give them an answer to this, and especially that they have consecrated the farewell to be read to them, their graces still bear it in good remembrance.

Now they would have read the same according to the length, but could not note from it that their masters were concluded from the same, also in that which concerned religion, but would have been included in their attention, and their diligence would now be greater than before, for the following reasons:

In the first place, it is found in the same that Caiferl. Maj., Electors, and the obedient estates, which have accepted or would still accept the parting, have united with each other and committed themselves that no one should overreach the other for the sake of faith 2c. From which it would be clear that, because their lords have not accepted nor will they accept the parting, as far as religion is concerned, that their electors, their fathers, and their relatives are out of the peace, for the others are not to overreach one another; but those who do not accept the parting of religion may well overreach them, as this is to be understood from the letter.

On the other hand, it is found in the farewell that Imperial Maj. Maj. has promised to uphold the same throughout the entire Roman Empire.

Thirdly, their Majesties command males of all ranks to keep their parting, and to live according to it until the Concilium, under penalty of punishment of life, limb, and property.

Fourthly, it is reported therein that Her Majesty wishes to issue a mandate for this purpose; on what the mandate is to be placed, they could not know, for it would be made more severe than at present.

Fifthly, it is hereby declared that this agreement shall be followed and lived in all its articles, avoiding the punishment that Imperial Majesty and the Empire have reserved for them on occasion. Maj. and the Empire reserve for them to do as they see fit. From all of which they may neither accept nor note otherwise, except that the parting includes their most gracious and gracious lords and relatives, because they have been in the empire, and no one except in the parting. Therefore, as their most gracious and kind lords and others' great need requires, they are requested to have 1) an explanation and actual report. For, where it would have been the opinion that her most gracious and gracious lords and relatives would not have taken part in the parting, the religion would not have been affected.

1) So put by us instead of: "Therefore instead of. . . Explanation".

If they should be understood, as they have been noted by their Lordships, their Fathers, and the other estates, and their Lordships, their Fathers, and the other co-relatives would not keep them in this case, nor would they comply with them, that the Fiscal should not proceed against them, nor that the Court of Appeal should act against them, nor that for this reason some punishment should be inflicted against their graces, they would be satisfied with this for their lords' sake.

1150 The Imperial Estates Answer by the Elector of Brandenburg. October 30, 1530.

See No. 1143.

They had heard their concern, if they were not satisfied with it, they would apply to the Imperial Majesty for it themselves. Majesty himself, where they would certainly receive a decision, but for the sake of the copies they, the Estates, wanted to apply to Her Majesty.

1151 The Augsburg Confession's Counter-Reply. October 30, 1530.

See No. 1143.

In the past, it would have been the case in this action that if Imperial Majesty had intended to report something to them, Her Majesty would have sent it to them, the Estates. Maj. had intended to report something to them, her Maj. would have sent it to them, the Estates, who would then have reported it to them, taken their answer to it, and reported it to her Maj. again; which, as they see it, should not have been done unreasonably. For where the Emperor. Majesty acted with them in the beginning, and they with Her Majesty, they would know well that they should spare Her Majesty, His Holiness, and the others. But because it is burdensome to their Majesty and friends, they must leave it at that, for they could not push it further than they wanted to go.

2) This time determination is according to the message attached to this writing in the acts, that it had been delivered to the emperor "Wednesday after All Saints' Day" both German and French. In the Weimar archives there is also a Latin copy, printed in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. II, p. 797.

In view of the read document and answer which Your Imperial Majesty, in addition to the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, had held before us this day in response to our answer of yesterday, on account of the article of the common permanent peace, we find that Your Imperial Majesty has received disfavor in two articles of our submission, which it is not unreasonable for us to dismiss. Majesty in two articles of the same received ungracious favor of our submission, which it is not unreasonable for us to hear. Namely, it has not been the opinion, request, or plea of our princes and kinsmen that your Imperial Majesty should grant her peace. Majesty should command peace to them, which is also reasonable for us to abstain from, but that your Imperial Majesty's forefather, the Emperor, should be allowed to make peace with them. Majesty's ancestor, Emperor Maximilian, of blessed and most noble memory, and that your Majesty himself at Worms has committed himself in the common established land peace and treaties with the princes, princes and estates of the empire, that it be now again graciously directed to this end; as our submitted written answer and request does not allow or explain otherwise, which we also ask to see and consider with grace.

As to the other, that our request extends or is meant much less than 1) should the right of your Imperial Majesty be barred. Majesty's right be barred, whereupon Your Imperial Majesty would be astonished. Our most humble request is based on the fact that the present decree of your imperial majesty, in which the article of religion is included and included, is made as a new constitution, and thus a new law and commandment is established, and commanded in the whole Roman Empire, that our lords, relatives and followers are not drawn into it, nor interpreted, nor meant, Against whom, without this, judicial or other proceedings would be taken, so that our lords and their relatives of these burdened religious matters would not be dragged into it, and in such non-observance of the same fiscal justification would be excluded and put in the background, and would otherwise be graciously spared and considered in their submissive, Christian, lawful appeals, petitions, and requests, ungracious actions and transfers. Since the Electors and their embassies, together with the other princes and estates, have let themselves be heard in their answer that they do not know how to remember that our lords and kinsmen are involved in this, but that we would like to ask your Imperial Majesty, if we do not know about it, to grant us the right of appeal. Majesty, if we have not been persuaded to do so: therefore, and on account of our princes, lords, and kinsmen, we are not to be held responsible for this.

1) In the original: "ßam" = as.

our humble request that Your Imperial Majesty will graciously drop Your Majesty will graciously drop your Majesty's ungracious will for the above-mentioned reasons of our princes and lords, also of our innocence, and be and remain our most gracious Emperor. On the other hand, the declaration, at our most humble request, to be directed by grace to the effect that our lords and kinsmen of this matter in the parting of faith, religion, and whatever else is pending, on account of their now belonging and previous grievance, because they cannot accept it, They are not to be drawn into it by grace, nor are they to be considered, until a common Christian concilium and the outcome of it, but they are to be included in the common and lasting peace, including the peace of the land, from which our princes, lords and kinsmen do not exclude themselves at all, and to which they will also live with true loyalty and obedience. With this, our princes, lords and kinsmen wish to pledge themselves to all submissive, willing, due and equitable obedience in the Turkish case and in all other matters of concern and welfare of Christendom, of Your Imperial Majesty, of the Empire and of the German people. Maj., the Empire and the German Nation, besides other Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, as they have been faithfully recognized and found to be so, and do not exclude themselves from the case at all.

perial Majesty most humbly

Of the Elector of Saxony, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, and the other princes and their kinsmen embassies, commanders, and counsellors.

1153 The last notice of the Emperor to the Augsburg Confession. The 11th of November 1530.

This and the following document is found in the common archive at Weimar, printed by Müller, lib. III, 6ux>. 46, p. 970 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. II, pp. 811 and 822. Also in Chyträus, p. 314.

To the first article, that they suppose that Imperial Maj. Maj. is to be in a common peace and farewell, as Emperor Maximilian of laudable memory, and the present Imperial Majesty at the Diet of Worms are also to be included. Majesty at the Diet of Worms are also to be included, is Imperial. Majesty. Answer: that the established land peace at Worms is still in force and essence, in which Her Imperial Majesty is also understood. Majesty also understood, and that no new peace has now been made or contemplated.

but that Imperial Majesty, as Roman Emperor, has commanded all estates. Majesty, as Roman Emperor, has only commanded all estates in general to keep the affected peace, to which this commandment alone refers, and not to act against it. Therefore, it is unnecessary that Her Majesty herself should command peace, or that she should be in command of it.

On the other article, in which they request that in matters concerning religion they shall not be included in the agreement, and on account of such non-observance shall not be justified by the Fiscal, Imperial Majesty has decreed that they are not to be included in the agreement. Majesty. Answer: that they are not understood in this religion, nor are they drawn into it, for the reasons that in an article of it it is expressed in clear words that they do not want to accept the abdication for the sake of religion; therefore Her Imperial Majesty, with 1) other chaplains, has given them the right of abdication. Therefore their imperial majesty has made an understanding with 1) other princes and rulers, outside of them, because they do not want to be drawn into it, where something would therefore be done by force or deed against those who have accepted this religion, how this is to be met with due resistance, that is only äksusivs, and not okisnsivs. For on account of the justification that the Fiscal should not proceed against her on that account, his Majesty does not want to bar her right and hand, for to do and to let justice be done is her Majesty's highest authority and sovereignty.

Most Reverend, Most Serene Electors, Most Reverend, Most Serene, Highborn Princes, Venerable, Well-Born, Noble, Strict, Honorable, Highly Honored, Honorable and Wise, Most Gracious, Gracious and Favorable Lords and Friends! Your electoral, princely. graces, graces, graces and friendships, know to remember, in which way we have requested and asked many times in this time, on account of our most gracious and gracious lords, and the same relatives, to establish and maintain a common lasting peace in the holy realm, and that her churfürstl. Princely. Graces and relatives, in the meantime, of a common free Christian council, for the sake of religion and faith, and what is dependent on the same, may sit and remain quiet, as their electoral, princely graces and relatives do against God and the Emperor. and the relatives hoped to justify this to God and Imperial Majesty. Majesty, whereupon a list was finally read out on Sunday after St. Simon's and Jude's, recently published, beginning: "About all this we command", 2). And since we do not sufficiently understand from the above-mentioned document that a common and secure peace in the Holy Roman Empire can be achieved, and that our lords can remain calm in their faith and religion, we have asked your Electoral, Princely, Grace, G. and Friendship for a copy of this document. We have applied to your electoral, princely, graces and friendships for a declaration of the same, but have not received any definite decision from your electoral, princely, graces, graces, for the sole reason that they have thereby directed us to the imperial majesty, that all things be done in peace. Majesty, where we have also most earnestly sought the same, and have therefore received an answer and farewell from Her Majesty, so our great necessity requires that we report the same to our lords everywhere in the most beneficial manner.

On the other hand, because we note that religion is included in the agreement, and Imperial Majesty wants to command them to abide by the severe penalties and punishments imposed throughout the Roman Empire. Majesty wishes to enjoin them to abide by the severe penalties and punishments imposed throughout the Roman Empire, and our most gracious and gracious lords and kinsmen cannot or may not accept the same farewell with God and conscience, nor grant it, and especially to our most gracious Lord, the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, as Archchancellor of the Holy Roman Empire, our most humbly official and friendly request that you will spare our most gracious and gracious lords and their relatives the use of this farewell. Furthermore, your lords and ladies know to remember that we have not entered into any other action concerning Turkish aid, except where a common and lasting peace is to be established and maintained in the realm, and where our lords and subjects, for the sake of faith and religion, wish to remain calm between here and a common and free Christian community. But if we now be-

2) The conclusion of No. 1137. Although that document is dated "Saturday after Simonis and Jude", it may have been read only on Sunday [Oct. 30]. In contrast Förstemann l. c. p. 755 puts the announcement, and also the answer of the Protestants to it, on October 29.

If we find that our most humble request and search does not want to take place, we herewith do not want to have anything granted by our lords as far as this Turkish help is concerned; as we therefore do not know how to get involved, but bring the matters, as stated above, to our most gracious and gracious lords and relatives, who will know how to keep themselves duly and without rebuke.

Thirdly, we note from the act concerning the Court of Appeal that, among other things, it has been stated therein that no one is to be admitted to the Court of Appeal as an assessor; he then pledges to live in accordance with religion. Because the Elector of Saxony, our most gracious lord, as an Elector, has to decree one to the Court of Appeal, also our dominions into the circles from which the persons are to be taken, and our lords with your Elector F. G. and the other lords of Saxony are to be taken into the Court of Appeal, F. G. and the other estates of faith and religion, it would be difficult for their Electoral, F. Graces and relatives to agree to the same article; as we, for the sake of their Electoral, F. Graces and relatives, do not want to be involved in this.

can or may consent. For this reason, we, as the envoys, humbly and kindly request that such an article be changed; for if our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, or from the circles in which our other lords are included, were to appoint someone to the Court of Appeal and, for reasons of faith and religion, to disown him, who is otherwise skilled in doctrine, life, character, and virtue: we, in place of our lords, do not wish to grant the entertainment of the Court of Appeal, but have hereby objected to it, of which we publicly testify and protest. All of which we, according to the necessity of our lords and relatives, do not wish to leave undisclosed to your Electors, F. G., G. and F.. Actum Saturday after Martini, the 12th of November, Anno 1530 at ten o'clock before noon.

Of our most gracious and gracious lords, the Elector of Saxony, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, Landgrave Philippsen of Hesse, also princes, estates and cities, and of these things relatives, decreed councillors, commanders and embassies.

1155: The Imperial Edict, or the Conclusion of the Diet of Augsburg, Concerning Religion.

November 19, 1530.

This farewell was published in folio in Mainz in 1531. In Chyträus, p. 503; in Müller, lib. III, eup. 48, p. 997; in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, part. Mn. cont. I, p. 541. Latin at. x. 389 and in Goldast, eonstitut. iurper., tom. III, x. 508. excerpted in many other places.

1st We Carl the Fifth by the Grace of God, elected R. Emperor 2c. 2c. confess and declare to all men: Although at the first Imperial Diet held at Worms, before our departure from the Holy Roman Empire, to which we, from the preceding feuds and wars, for the preservation of our kingdoms and lands, as men know, were highly induced, we have, with timely counsel, knowledge, and will of ours and of the Holy Empire, caused the following to occur Princes, Princes and Estates, for the preservation of our holy Christian faith, peace and justice in the Holy Empire, good order, German nation for honor, benefit, welfare, reception and prosperity, established: Nevertheless, we have heard for some time, with great sorrow in our hearts, how the discord of our holy Christian faith, as a result of our edict issued by the Emperor at Worms, has divided and taken root in our absence in many difficult sects, and how this has caused no small harm and accident to the common German nation. Since, however, so far, no salutary counsel has been found for such incumbent burdens and burdens by many imperial congresses and other brave and diligent actions of our governor, orator and commissaries, nor of the princes, princes and estates of the empire, except by our presence, we have, after the advent of the new church, taken up the matter.

to establish some order [so that] the Hispanic kingdoms of the time of our departure may live in the more peace, tranquility and unity, out of special love and gracious affection that we have and bear for the German nation and the Holy Roman Empire, exalted ourselves from our Hispanic hereditary kingdoms, left the same, and initially joined Italy, placed the same our Italian lands (praise God!) in good unity and peace; and that we may the more advantageously come into the German nation, and foresee such grave mischief in time, refrain from visiting our kingdom of Neapolis, as that would have greatly required our and our subjects' opportunity, welfare, and need, and to receive our imperial coronation (which we could have fetched at Rome without any danger or trouble, and from there sooner come to the touched kingdom of Neapolis) at Bononia, and thereupon to hold a common imperial diet here in our and the Holy Roman Empire's city of Augsburg, on the 8th day of April next week. We have herewith proclaimed and announced, in mind, will, and opinion, all matters concerning the Holy Roman Empire, common Christendom, and the German nation, and in particular how the confusion and discord concerning our holy faith and Christian religion (as not the least grievance) may be the more fruitfully acted upon and resolved upon, how to put an end to this discord of faith, how to forestall unwillingness, and how to surrender to Christ, our Saviour, the error that has occurred, our Saviour, and to hear, understand, and consider every man's good pleasure and opinion between himself in love and kindness, to bring them to one Christian truth and to compare them, to put away everything that would not be rightly interpreted or acted for both parts, to accept and hold one true religion by all of us, and as we are and contend all under one Christ, so to live all in one fellowship of the church and unity; And finally, to make, establish, resolve, and maintain good unity, peace, and welfare of the holy realm, in this and other matters incumbent upon it, as then our proclamation of this Imperial Diet contains and is able to contain this and other things according to length.

(2) At which Diet we, as well as the Electors, Princes, and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, appeared before us obediently in noticeable public numbers, in our own persons, and some by their embassies with full authority.

003 Accordingly, we have, together with the same our

Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates, and the absent embassies, the article of the discord of our holy Christian faith, in the above-mentioned our letter, as the noblest and most important point, first taken before the hand, and (by virtue of the same our letter) graciously offered to hear anyone who has wanted to bring something forward on account of such discord of faith. Thereupon our and the Holy Roman Empire's Princes, Princes and Cities, John, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, Archmarshall and Prince of the Holy Roman Empire, George, Margrave of Brandenburg, Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassubians and Wends, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen, Ernst and Franciscus, brothers, dukes of Brunswick and Luneburg, Philip, landgrave of Hesse, and Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt, also the envoys of the cities of Nuremberg, Reutlingen, Kempten, Heilbrunn, Winsheim, and Weissenburg in the Northgau, have brought us their confession and opinion, for faith's sake, written down; which we graciously received from them, and publicly read them in the presence of all the princes, princes, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire assembled here. And although we, after having had the constant counsel of excellent theologians and scribes from many nations, had such a confession of theirs refuted and rejected with good reason by the holy Gospel and holy Scripture, yet such a thing did not so much prevail with them that they would have compared themselves with us, princes, princes, and other common estates in all articles. Whereupon, for the good and welfare of the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation, so that peace and unity may be preserved therein, we now, out of Imperial clemency and but by grace, declare that the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation are at peace. and but by the grace of the Emperor, we now offer to the above-mentioned Princes, Princes, and six cities the following gracious dispensation, and graciously request that the same be accepted: Namely, that between here and the fifteenth day of the month of April next they should consider whether or not they wish to confess and unite with the Christian Church, Papal Holiness, us, and the other Princes, Princes, and commonwealths of the Holy Roman Empire, as well as other Christian leaders and members of common Christendom, in the meantime of the discussion of a future Council. And that they inform us of their minds under their seals before the end of the above-mentioned fifteenth day, in the meantime we also want to consider what is due to us, and then to give them our consent.

open our opinion likewise; with quite a few articles attached, as to how they shall behave in the meantime of the same consideration.

4th Namely, that it be our earnest will, opinion, and command that the Elector of Saxony, together with his kinsmen, decree in the meantime of this fifteenth day of April, that nothing new, for the sake of matters of faith, shall be printed, sold, or traded in their principalities, lands, and territories; and that all the electors, princes, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, in the meantime of this intention, shall keep good peace and unity.

(5) And that neither the Elector of Saxony, the five princes and six cities, nor their subjects, ours and the Holy Roman Empire's, nor the subjects of the other princes, princes, and common estates, as has been done hitherto, shall not draw or compel to themselves and their sect. Whether some of the subjects of the Elector of Saxony, the five princes and six cities, regardless of their dignity or status, who still adhere to the old Christian faith and nature, or want to adhere to it, do not err or oppress them in their churches and places of worship in their services and ceremonies, nor do they initiate any further innovation therein. In the same way, the men and women of the order should not be prevented in any way from attending mass, hearing confessions, and administering and receiving the holy sacrament.

6. To this end, the aforementioned Elector, the five princes, and six cities are to compare themselves with us, along with the other electors, princes, and states, against those who do not keep the reverend sacrament, and against the Anabaptists, and are not to separate themselves from us, their loved ones, and them in any way, but are to advise, encourage, and help as to what and how action is to be taken against them; As all our princes, rulers, and estates have granted and promised us all these things, as stated above, as far as each of them is concerned.

7. And because no common council has been held in the Christian church for many years, and yet many abuses and complaints have occurred in common Christendom for a long time, we have gathered here at Augsburg, with all our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, rulers, and estates, and their embassies, now all assembled here at Augsburg, in common discretion and counsel, and at the humble request and entreaty of all of them, in addition to papal sanctity, have finally resolved, also with all of the aforementioned princes, princes and estates and the same embassies, to petition the affected papal authority.

Holiness, and all Christian kings and potentates, so much to decree, that for Christian reformation a common Christian council, within six months, the next after the end of this our imperial diet, shall be advertised at the appropriate place, and that for the most beneficial and longest time, within a year after such advertisement, it shall be held, in the good hope and confidence that thereby the community of Christendom, for its spiritual and temporal things, shall be brought into constant good unity and peace.

(8) Furthermore, since the commandments of God and man, as well as the Gospel, are able to decree that no one should be deprived of what is his by force, or that he should be deprived of it, and since this has been done by them and their country manifoldly, therefore we have been approached daily by the deprived abbots or abbesses, as well as by others, and have been called upon with imploring and lamenting pleas to restore them to what is theirs. Accordingly, as a Christian emperor, who should not deny justice to anyone, it would not be otherwise due to us (since the laws provide and want that every spoliir and deposed person should first of all be restituted and reinstated), than for this reason to have due regard; Therefore, it is our earnest command that the Elector of Saxony, and his kinsmen, let the spoliated monasteries and other ecclesiastics in their principalities and territories, without any means and in the most beneficial way, return to their monasteries and estates, from which they have been deposed, expelled, and driven out, restitute and reinstate them, so that we would not be caused, as a Christian emperor, to do due execution ourselves.

009 But the Elector of Saxony and his kinsmen, above mentioned, did not want to accept such our gracious leave, but rejected it, and thereupon partly went away.

(10) The envoys of our and the Holy Roman Empire's cities, Strasbourg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, have handed over to us their confession of their faith in writings; which we have had read and considered with the greatest diligence for ourselves, as well as by many learned, brave doctors of the Holy Scriptures of many nations. And after we have heard from the same their own delivered confession, also otherwise credibly reported, and for themselves publicly, that the said four our and the empire's cities have not only separated themselves in faith from all other free and imperial cities, but from the whole German nation, also from common Christendom, and have committed the grave insanity against the reverend Sacra-

The same have been subjected to iconoclasm and other things, and until now have been allowed many disgusting sects, which have also been spread among the common people of the German nation, and are included in the booklet that is carried over from time to time, which neither they nor anyone else is entitled or entitled to. Thus, in praise of God Almighty, for the salvation of souls, for the preservation of Christian love, and especially for the tranquility, welfare, and unity of the German nation, we, through the scholars of the Holy Scriptures of many nations, and also with the valiant counsel of our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, princes, and estates, all assembled here, have had a counter-report, founded in the Gospel and Holy Scriptures, written, which we have publicly read to them before the princes, rulers and estates, and have graciously reminded, admonished and requested them, because they have clearly noted their error in the face of our confutation, and understand that they have renounced this cruel error, and have compared themselves with us, as well as with the princes, rulers and estates of the empire and common Christendom, which we have agreed to provide for them.

(11) Upon such our most gracious remembrance and request, the envoys of the aforementioned four cities have humbly requested that a copy of such a treatise be given to them, with the indication that they alone have orders from their council friends to request a copy of what is held before them and to send it behind them. Which request we refused them for movable reasons, and at the same time offered that we would have the same confutation read to them again two or three times, so that they would know how to act accordingly, and for this reason we again asked them to comply with our request. For if such a Christian admonition and reminder should not take place with them (of which we do not deny ourselves), then the same four cities could consider that we are caused to show ourselves and behave in the matters as is due to us, as Roman Christian emperor, supreme sovereign and patron of the holy Christian church, ex officio, according to our conscience, as was previously reported in the confutation. But upon such and such our most gracious remembrance and request, the envoys of the four cities concerned have insisted on their opinion.

012 But since it is due to us, as Roman emperor, and chief prince of Christendom, from the imperial office imposed upon us, as we also acknowledge our duty, to uphold the holy Christian faith, as it is upheld by the holy common Christian church, and to uphold it by the holy common Christian church, we are to be the first to be called to the holy faith.

and honorably kept and executed, to administer, protect, and shield, also to execute our Imperial Edict, issued at our first Imperial Diet at Worms: We, together with other electors, princes and estates obedient to us and to the Holy Roman Empire, have finally resolved, and also granted, for ourselves and our subjects, and have promised and pledged to one another to remain and hold firmly to the old, true, long-established Christian faith and religion, as well as to the same honest, praiseworthy ceremonies and customs, practiced in the common church until now, and also not to allow any change to be made before the decision of the next General Council.

(13) And since then our edict issued at Worms, and also after that many decrees of our imperial congresses at Nuremberg and Speier, which were written out and held, have been torn down by all kinds of complaints and innovations contrary to the Christian faith and religion.

014 Especially have some taught, written, and preached, that in the reverend sacrament of the altar the body and blood of Christ, under both the form of bread and wine, are not essential and present, but only figurative and important, with other more unchristian circumstances, additions, and appendages.

015 Some preach and teach that every man is bound by the commandment of Christ to receive the reverend sacrament of the altar under both forms, and that those who pass and receive it under one form do wrong.

016 Some have utterly abolished the office of the holy mass, and have preached that the mass is the highest blasphemy.

(17) Some have not entirely abolished the Mass, but have introduced a special change therein, contrary to the long usage, order, and statutes of the common Christian church, again to their liking. Likewise, the usual chants of the Mass, times of day, and other hymns of praise of the Mother of God, of the dear saints, and of the holy fathers, made for the glory of God and the devotion of men, and commonly and uniformly ordered, set, and kept in the common Christian church, have been done away with as annoying and unchristian, and yet in their place other chants of their liking have been made.

018 Some have taught that the baptism of infants is nothing, but that every man, if he come to understanding, should be baptized again; they also hold that baptism is no sacrament. Thereby some have rejected the praiseworthy Christian ordinances.

and prayers, which are kept at the dew, and made others.

019 Some use no prayers or ceremonies at all, and have their children baptized not by the priests, but by any layman, male or female, out of necessity, and in bad well water.

020 Some have not confirmed their children, nor administered the sacrament or chrismation to the dying.

021 Some have broken and burned the images of our Saviour Christ, and also of his most blessed Mother Mary, and of the dear saints, which have been kept for a long time for the remembrance of all the Christian people, and have raged inhumanly with them.

022 Some have held that there is no free will, but that everything that happens must happen thus, and not otherwise, from unavoidable necessity, and that therefore God is a real cause of evil.

023 Some have taught that there should be no authority among Christians, neither should any man use it.

024 Some have taught that faith alone, without love and good works, makes one saved, and have rejected good works altogether.

025 Some have utterly destroyed and laid waste the monasteries, parish churches, and churches of Mary.

026 Some have abolished, or caused to be abolished, in the foundations, parishes, and other benefices, the praiseworthy Christian ceremonies and customs, which have hitherto been practised in the common church, for the remembrance and encouragement of all the Christian people, for the devotion and contemplation of the life, passion, death, and work of Christ our Saviour, and have imposed other unchristian ordinances, of their own will, power, and pleasure.

(27) Some have entirely discontinued preaching in the monasteries of the four mendicant orders, to whom such preaching is due according to their rule or profession, and has been in use from time immemorial, thereby depriving many pious old Christians of the right true nourishment of God's Word, and have been compelled, against their conscience, to hear the new seductive preachers, or else to abstain from all preaching.

028 Some lords have forbidden their subjects, under severe penalty, to hear the preaching of the old, right, true faith, in or out of their villages, nor to go to the same preaching or churches, nor to follow the old faith.

to hang on. And if they enter therein, they have been punished unjustly.

029 Some bind their servants in their duty, not to hear the preachers aforesaid, but only to hear their seducing preachers, and to cleave to the same sect.

(30) Some have used monasteries, foundations, and vacated benefices for their own benefit, or in other ways of disorderly measure, of their liking, and have not lent the same further, contrary to their foundation, or permitted them to be lent to others.

031 Some have removed the rectors, confessors, preachers, and other Christian rulers of the same convents, and have appointed seductive preachers, confessors, and teachers in their stead.

(32) Some have closed and barred the monasteries entirely and in part, and have forbidden them to sing, to read, to hold mass, to distribute, to receive, and to give sacramenta among them, the religious, according to traditional Christian usage.

(33) Some of the monasteries of men's and women's religious, endowments and other benefices, and of the deceased endowments and foundations, established by many of our ancestors, of blessed and mild memory, Roman emperors, kings, princes, and other noble estates, have, contrary to their last will and decree, been wholly or partly taken away, or have been entirely deprived of them. The persons of the male and female orders were tolerated and allowed to leave the monasteries without the permission of their regular authorities and to enter into a supposed marital or other secular state. They also did not want to allow the prelates and prelates to abolish such or to be in favor of it. They have also urged some male and female religious to pardon the monasteries and their goods forever, and to give up their vows, in which they must also confess that their monastic life was unchristian and devilish.

(34) Some have permitted the religious to cast off their habit, and to wear secular or other garments than they were permitted to wear according to their rule and vows, and have nevertheless permitted them to dwell in the monasteries.

35 Some religious are forbidden to accept others who wish to join them in the order, and to receive profession or obedience from those who are already in their monasteries.

1) "conjugal" put by us instead of: honest.

036 Some have taken their children and friends by force out of the monasteries, against their will, and drawn them.

37. Some have installed and deposed priests in parishes and other benefices, as and when they pleased, without presenting them to the ordinaries, so that they might have been examined and invested; moreover, they have prevented the ordinaries from using their jurisdiction over the priests, as well as from visiting the parish priests and priesthood; they have allowed and tolerated the parish priests and preachers to interpret the divine word and scripture according to their will and liking, to reject the office of the holy mass in general, including prayer for the deceased, and to destroy Christian ceremonies. Singing, reading, praying, fasting, celebrating, and otherwise generally introducing and practicing all kinds of idiosyncratic deeds; which were and still are not only in keeping with our edict issued at Worms and the imperial decrees since then, but also with Christian order and devotion, over which such things are not proper and due to anyone, no matter what his status, nor have they had any authority or command.

38. Out of all this nothing good, but rather that the other customs of the common church were despised, all nobility and respectability in their preaching desecrated, blasphemed, the pious simple-minded people and laymen incited against each other, and also all kinds of frivolity arose from it, The seductive and previously rejected and condemned doctrine has gained the upper hand, much seductive insanity has grown up among the common people, all true devotion has gone out, and finally all Christian honor, discipline, virtue, commandment, fear of God, respectability, and good honest conduct and life, even the true love of one's neighbor, have completely fallen into disrepair.

39. And all this is not only contrary to the holy Gospel and divine Scripture, but also contrary to the old and praiseworthy custom and practice of the Christian church and ceremonies, and has been done and done in an unjust manner: We have united with our princes, princes and estates, and they in turn with us, and have resolved that the above, and all others, contrary to the common Christian church faith, order, religion, ceremonies, and all laudable statutes, shall be abolished, and all praiseworthy statutes, long established usage, as decreed by the same common Christian church, and Concilia held some hundred years ago, are done and passed, and we therefore shall and will be and decree, as it is due that those who have undertaken such an innovation unite and compare themselves with us and the affected common princes and estates until the next coming Council.

040 Therefore we command and will that it be firmly held, taught, and preached throughout the Roman empire, that under the species of bread and wine, and under every one of them, the true body and blood of Christ our Saviour and Beatificator be substantially and truly present. And all those who teach, write, preach, or hold contrary thereto, shall not be tolerated, accepted, or permitted. From this also it follows that the Christian Church, by inspiration of the Holy Spirit and good causes, has salutarily ordained and commanded that every Christian man, apart from the celebration of Mass, shall be administered the reverend Sacrament by the Consecutor under the form of bread alone, and yet under one form no more or less than under two, be enjoyed and received. As we also hereby command, and that no innovation shall be made in this matter until a future Council is decided, 1) we have commanded.

41 And likewise, common and special masses, with singing, with the inculcation and keeping of the major and minor canons, also other prayers, garments, ceremonies, statutes, ordinances, and all measures, shall be kept as has been and still is done in the common Christian church, and in all of this no change or innovation shall be made.

(42) And for the sake of the Anabaptists, we leave it at our former constitution and statutes, which we here, with the advice and consent of princes, rulers, and estates, wish to have renewed again; and command that the children be baptized in a similar manner, with the administration of the chrism, and likewise with the praiseworthy, wholesome prayers and ceremonies, which have long been established and held by the Christian common church. For the more unchristian and dreadful it is to shut up and deprive poor young children of the way of salvation and of the grace of the Holy Spirit.

(43) We also command and desire that the confirmation of children and other Christian people, and likewise of dying people, shall not be omitted, but shall be kept and used firmly in the same manner as it has been hitherto in the Christian church.

44 Because also the image of Christ, of his dear mother Mary, and of the dear saints, is the gift of the Lord.

1) "commanded" put by us instead of: asked.

We order that the images mentioned above shall not be removed, but shall be erected and maintained devoutly by all Christian people. Likewise, the altars and sacramental halls, where they have been removed, are to be restored and preserved for the glory of God.

045 Further, as some hold that there is no free will, 2c. Because this error, with its appendages, is not human, but rather animal, and a blasphemy, it should not be held, taught, or preached.

(46) Likewise, because the headship is ordained of God, and is proved from the holy Gospels, St. Paul, and other divine writings, it is not to be preached in any way, either publicly or secretly, nor otherwise taught, nor given out, which may be opposed to it with contempt, or which may come or come to disdain, contempt, or disparagement.

047 And since it is evident from holy Scripture that faith alone, without love and good works, does not make one righteous, and since God requires good works of men in many places in holy Scripture, let not the above article (that faith alone makes one righteous, and that good works are to be rejected) be preached or taught, but let modesty and distinction be kept, as the common Christian Church and the holy Fathers have kept and taught until now.

(48) And especially the seven sacraments and the ceremonies thereof shall be observed everywhere, as they have been used in the Christian Church from time immemorial, and before this schism, and all innovation shall be put an end to.

49) Item, that also in particular all high and low monasteries, convents, parishes, foundations and benefices shall be kept in their statutes, orders, rules, foundations, chanting, reading, preaching, holding of masses, prayers, burial and usual Christian praiseworthy traditional ceremonies, as those practiced in the common church until now.

50) That also the vacated benefices, according to due measure, be bestowed on fit, skilful persons, the deceased be given a foundation, and the clergy be given due visitation and punishment of the pastors, priesthoods and clergy. shall not be prevented. That also the religious and secular priests should abstain completely from marrying.

051 And the priests, who are supposed to have married before this our parting, shall from this time be deprived of their ecclesiastical benefices, administrations, and offices, and their benefices shall be filled by the patrons or ordinaries of any place, in time of right, to come next after the end of this Diet, and the pastors and other ecclesiastical benefices shall be filled by their ecclesiastical superiors or patrons with other, skillful, unmarried priests.

52) However, if some married priests want to leave their presumed wives and return to Christian order and practice, and also receive and accept absolution and penance worthy of their crime, papal holiness should now be requested by the legate to give the ordinaries power to absolve the secular priests and rehabilitate them for their administration.

053 But the priests who do not want to convert, or to live up to this our parting, as and where they are found, or (spiritual persons [monks and nuns]) 1) have intermarried with one another, or with other persons, they shall not be left in any principalities, dominions, and territories, but shall be expelled, or taken into due and lawful punishment.

54) In no jurisdiction shall clergymen be permitted or allowed to live dishonestly in public, and especially to live with dishonest, lewd wives, or to have them with them, nor in dishonest, unpriestly dress and behavior, but the offenders shall be punished according to the requirements of the case, and this shall not be allowed to continue, as has been done hitherto, so that all annoyance may be avoided.

(55) Where the clergy in any place have entered into an unjust ecclesiastical easement, patronage, or contract, we will that such easement, patronage, or contract be dead and done away with, notwithstanding any oath or obligation which may have been sworn or made in any way for that purpose. Likewise, where monasteries or other ecclesiastical estates and other such things in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation have been sold, altered, or turned to improper use or custom, all such things shall be void, null, and voidable, and shall be restored to their former status from that time forth, left, and the sold goods of due value to be refunded and paid.

(56) And all pastors and preachers, whether they be religious or secular priests, shall observe the above and following of our imperial orders in preaching. The priests and ministers are to keep to the above and subsequent imperial orders in preaching.

(57) Thereupon we have compared and united with princes, sovereigns, and estates, and have decreed and ordained that no preacher shall now be admitted to preach in any place, nor shall he be installed, unless he has first been examined by the archbishop or bishop under whom he has sat, and has been found experienced and skilled in life, doctrine, and skill, and has been sufficiently approved for the office of preaching. These licensed and accredited preachers, whether they be religious or other priests, none excepted, even without regard to some liberty, shall keep their preaching in accordance with this ordinance of ours. And especially that in their preaching they shall avoid and refrain from anything that might lead the common man to move against authority, or lead the Christian people into error, or incite them against one another, or give them cause to do so. And in particular, they are to measure themselves against the speech, which some have not been ashamed to do until now, that one wants to suppress and exterminate the gospel and the holy word of God, which not only has never been ours or the common people's opinion, but rather has borne the concern and affection of the Christian mind, but rather the care and affection of the Christian mind, that the holy word of God be planted for the increase of Christian love, godliness, devotion, and good works, and be preserved in Christian nature, and not, as is now the use of the new teachers, be preached according to each one's own will, benefit, envy, hope, or for the seduction of the unintelligent common laity; but it is our will, mind and opinion that the preachers preach and teach the gospel according to the interpretation of the holy Scriptures and teachers, approved and accepted by the common holy Christian church, and that they refrain from disputing matters, from preaching and teaching the same, and from insulting, 1) reviling and blaspheming, and that they await the decision of the said Christian Concilii.

058 The same preachers shall also especially prevent the common Christian people from being turned away from the offices of holy masses, prayers, and other good works, as has been done in many places until now, which is to be pityed; but they shall keep the Christian people in good order.

1) "Schimpfrens" put by us instead of: "stumpfrens".

instruct, instruct and incite them to hear the office of the holy mass with great devotion, to do their prayer sincerely to God, to devoutly command themselves much to the virgins of Mary and the dear wives, to forbid them against God; They are to celebrate the feast, keep the required fast days, and avoid forbidden food, as is customary in the Christian Church; they are also not to reject religious and others from their vows, but to teach them that they are obliged to keep them, also to give alms, and to practice other Christian, charitable and good works.

59. Such men, regardless of their status, shall observe and obey our order, statutes, and well-established Christian customs, ceremonies, and all other things that have hitherto been decently ordered, established, and used in the Christian church, as far as our holy Christian faith and worship are concerned, and shall not innovate against any of these things, all under penalty of death, injury, or property, which each authority shall and may impose on the transgressor, according to the nature of the transgression. Nor shall any authority prevent the other in this, but one shall be helpful to the other at its request; all this we, to avoid the above-mentioned punishment and penalties, wish to have kept completely between here and the next General Council's decision.

60. And since much evil has arisen from disorderly printing up to now, we decree, order, and intend that every prince, sovereign, and state of the realm, ecclesiastical and secular, in the meantime of the future Council, take care in all printing houses, also with all bookkeepers, with serious diligence, that nothing new is printed or offered for sale, especially abusive writings, paintings, and the like, either publicly or secretly, unless previously ordered to do so by the same ecclesiastical or secular authorities, and especially defamatory writings, paintings, and the like, are neither publicly nor secretly printed or sold, unless previously inspected by the same ecclesiastical or secular authorities, and the name and surname of the printer, as well as the city in which such things are printed, are put therein in the same words. And where there is a deficiency therein, the same shall not be permitted to be printed or to have it, nor shall any such defamatory or similar books printed beforehand be offered for sale or sold. And if the poets, printers or sellers transgress such order and commandments, he shall be punished by the authority under which he sat or entered, according to opportunity, in body or goods; and if some authority, whoever it may be, is found negligent in this, then our Imperial Fiscal shall and may ask the same authority for a fine. Fiscal shall and may proceed against the same authority for the punishment and proceed, what punishment, according to the occasion, shall be inflicted.

The Imperial Court of Appeal shall have the power to set and to laxify in the case of any superiority and of the same negligence.

61. After many bishoprics, high and other monasteries, also monasteries, have since our imperial outgoing edict been taken away, devastated and deserted, the bishops, prelates, parish priests, religious and ecclesiastical persons driven out of theirs without legal knowledge or cause, many bishoprics, high and other monasteries, also monasteries, have been taken away, devastated and deserted, The bishops, prelates, parish priests, religious and ecclesiastical persons have been expelled or driven out of their territories without lawful knowledge or cause, their bishoprics, monasteries, convents, castles, goods and chattels, interest, favors, ornaments or treasures have been taken, or they have been sold in whole or in part, arrested, detained and held up for trial; and in divine, ecclesiastical and imperial laws it is provided and forbidden that no one shall take, deprive and rob another of his own property, contrary to law, in an unseemly manner, and especially of property devoted to the Church and to God, much less deprive or extinguish an honest foundation made in praise of God, we decree and order that the bishoprics, monasteries, monasteries, and their properties, which have been unfairly taken for themselves by clergy or seculars, or wrested in the peasant revolt, shall be restored to those to whom they are entitled and rightfully due; or, where the monasteries or parishes have been devastated, demolished, or desolated, they shall be rebuilt and erected. Likewise, in bishoprics, monasteries, foundations, and parishes, singing, reading, mass, and the performance of other common, laudable Christian ceremonies, as well as their possessions and goods and the same administration, as they have been and continue to be from time immemorial, shall remain peaceful, all with the penalty of our imperial peace, attention, and disregard, as we will therefore issue and proclaim our special penalty mandate, with further content.

(62) And since we do not doubt in our imperial mind that there are still many steadfast Christians. We have no doubt that there are still many steadfast Christians who adhere to the old true Christian faith, and to whom the rebellious, seductive, and previously condemned doctrine is highly repugnant. So that they may be kept in their honorable, steadfast minds, as is right, and not be turned away from it by some oppression of others, we, as well as the princes, princes, and estates, wish that those who have sat in the authorities, cities, towns, and villages, who have not accepted this resignation of ours, be punished, who have not accepted this our farewell (as far as they persist and insist on their Christian opinion, and keep and live by this our farewell), with their possessions, wives and children, in our and the Holy Empire's but protection and defence.

and should enjoy and use them as other relatives of ours and of the Holy Roman Empire. For this purpose we want to grant by imperial power For this purpose, we, by imperial power, will allow and grant to the same citizens and inhabitants, who are still of the old Christian faith and persist in it, according to their opportunity, with their body, possessions and goods, a free departure from and immigration to the above-mentioned authorities, cities, towns and villages, without complaint of any additional tax or deduction of their goods, and unhindered male, and do so herewith knowingly. They also want that such shall not bring them any disadvantage or injury to their civic duties, city rights or civil rights, in any way or manner. And if some of the above-mentioned authorities, towns or villages have freedoms or privileges contrary to or in opposition to this, we wish to have them derogated and all of this hereby annulled in this case.

63 And because in many years no common council has been held in the holy Christian church, and it is of the highest necessity that it should be held, that the above-mentioned errors, abuses, and grievances in our holy faith, and what has been torn down in the meantime, may be reformed and corrected: Likewise, because many kingdoms and other things have been taken away by the enemy of the holy Christian faith, the Turks, and still more may be taken away, if this is not done in good time, so that, after the greatest need, salutary and fruitful action may be taken against them; and since all our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, princes and estates, and their embassies, have gathered here with us in Augsburg, without distinction, both those who have compared themselves with us and our old true Christian faith, as it has been held praiseworthily by the Holy Christian Church, and those who have made the above-mentioned and other innovations, in order to promote such a council, have humbly appealed to and asked us: We have therefore, for a Christian reformation and handling of the Christian faith, resolved, as we have now, with our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, principedoms and estates, to promote and decree so much by papal holiness, that by their holiness a common Christian council is to be announced within six months after the end of the imperial diet, and that it is to be started and held in the most beneficial way and for the longest time within a year after such announcement, in
finality.

Confidence that other Christian kings, princes and potentates will also allow them to appear at such a council and help to bring the common Christianity, for the sake of its spiritual and temporal matters, into lasting good unity and peace.

(64) Item, as we have herebefore in many established imperial decrees clearly expressed and provided that the ecclesiastics and seculars should have their interest, rent, remittance, and tithe paid and paid without objection or hindrance, also that due tithe should be given, and that it should not be prevented from being conferred and collected, we nevertheless find that in some places this has been little enforced, and that we, as Roman Emperor, are entitled to see that no one reserves his own by force against the law: therefore we decree that each of the ecclesiastical and secular classes shall have their interest, remittance, and tithe paid and paid without objection or hindrance, and that they shall not be prevented from conferring it. Therefore, we decree and will that each person, whether of ecclesiastical or secular status, remain with their pensions, dues, interest, tithes, rights, and justices, and that no one deprive the other of all of these, prevent them, or deprive them of all of these, but rather let each person pay, pay, and follow fine inheritance, perpetual and other interest, dues, tithes, and other rights and justices. In this also each authority shall assist the other; all with avoidance of punishment, comprehended in our peace of the land. If any authority acts contrary to our order, our Fiscal shall have the power and command to proceed against the same authority, by virtue of our proclaimed truce.

65. Since in some places the sovereigns have made special orders, statutes, and ordinances, and have obtained liberties, or still wish to make and obtain them, that they should have the power to redeem hereditary and perpetual interest, both ecclesiastical and secular, but which the princes, sovereigns, and estates complain of, for reasons that such is contrary to law, equity, ancient custom, and usage, and is detrimental not only to the sovereigns, but also to the justice of the people: Accordingly, we decree, order, will, and mean, out of right knowledge and imperial power and perfection, that all and every order, statute, charter, and liberty made, obtained, and issued for this purpose, or which may hereafter be made, obtained, and issued, shall be abolished, dead, void, and of no effect; As we also hereby, by Roman imperial authority, right knowledge, and our own motive, recognize them to be void, null, and unenforceable, and wish that, for the sake of such perpetual and hereditary interest, they shall remain in accordance with the above article, and be firmly held.

Sixty-six: and mean, and set, and will, that to this

We hereby declare that we have fully lived up to and complied with our agreement, and that it is to be carried out in all its contents, opinions and concepts, irrespective of all other agreements made at our previous imperial congresses, insofar as these may be contrary to or in conflict with our agreement and regulations for the sake of the faith. Likewise, without regard to all objections, oppositions, and appeals, which have been or may be made against them, and which, without a common council, have been or may be made against us or anyone else; All of which are null and void in themselves, and we wish to have them annulled and rescinded as null and void by our imperial authority and with the common counsel and will of our obedient Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, all of which we reserve the right to do according to the circumstances and as is proper.

67. We, the princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates who have accepted and approved this treaty, have unanimously agreed and promised and pledged to each other in good faith that no one, whether of spiritual or secular rank, shall violate or encroach upon the other's faith, nor deny his sovereigns rent, interest, tithe and goods, nor deprive his sovereign of rent, interest, tithe, and goods, nor shall any of the other's subjects and relatives, on account of their faith or other causes, take them into his protection and shield against their sovereign; All this under penalty and punishment of our imperial peace established at Worms, which shall remain in full force, be firmly held, and be enforced.

(68) And that there may be no lack of all this in administration or execution, we have promised and pledged to our and the Holy Roman Empire's princes, lords, and estates, and in turn to our princes, lords, and estates, in matters concerning the ancient Christian faith and religion, that we will faithfully hold our kingdom, land, and people, as well as our bodies and goods, to each other. And thereupon further agreed and united, if it should come to pass that one estate, contrary to all that has been reported above, should want to overrun the other with army force or otherwise violently, that then our Imperial Court of Appeal, upon the request of those or those who were concerned about the overrun, and who duly requested justice, should have complete command, power and authority, with penalty and punishment of the eight, from such his violent action, to those who were in trade and armour.

and to let himself be duly satisfied with the law.

(69) If, however, the person or persons thus commanded should disobey, our Imperial Fiscal shall immediately proceed and execute the declaration against the disobedient person or persons, upon the above-mentioned mandates, without delay and in the most favorable manner, and the same disobedient persons shall be judged and declared by our Court of Appeal to be in contempt and other penalties of the peace of the land, as is proper. And in addition to this, our Court of Appeal shall nonetheless issue a common summons against all and any helpers of the or those who, as is stated, are in armour and are taking part in the mighty attack, with a penalty of eight, also to the most beneficial effect. Likewise, the other neighboring imperial estates, with the penalty of the eight, must immediately demand and exhort the handling of everything, as mentioned above, to provide the one or ones who want to be overdrawn and raped with proper help, and to rescue them.

70 We, as Roman Emperor and Head, together with our hereditary lands, also want to draw and save the injured party against this parting.

(71) The rapist shall also be obliged to pay off and reimburse those who would be required and conscripted as a matter of urgency the war expenses they have incurred, and shall be at the will of the assistants to be able to bring the rapist to an end with the deed as soon as possible, to refuse the charge, or to bring him to the moderation of our Court of Appeal with a penalty of eight, for which he shall also be helped by our Court of Appeal in a conducive and unrefusable manner.

Philip Melancthon's Preface. The July 10, 1546.

(1) Since our Saviour Jesus Christ, the Son of God, sacrificed himself on the cross to his eternal Father for our sins, and Mary and John were next to him, he commanded his mother Mariam shortly before his death, indicating that he wished to command all men, and especially the rulers, his poor Church, which suffers contempt and persecution in the world.

2. Now all people on earth, and especially the members of the Church, from the beginning of the world to the end, should consider themselves standing under the cross, seeing and contemplating this wonderful work, that the Son of God has borne such terrible wrath of His eternal Father for us; and to accept the great grace that we have thereby obtained, to be grateful for it, and to know that all our life and death should be directed primarily to praising God, and especially to receiving right doctrine of this great work, and to giving thanks for this marvelous counsel of God; and therefore to help hold together His Church, which preaches, learns, and loves this right doctrine, and calls upon the true God in the knowledge of Christ. As Christ also said to Petro [Luc. 22, 32.], "And if thou be converted, thou shalt strengthen thy brethren."

(3) All these things are known among all men who are not crude godless men, but have a little Christian understanding and faith, namely, that a man should not live like a beast, seeking only his own gentle life, but serving for the knowledge of God, and for the preservation of the true church.

004 Let all God-fearing people in the German lands now seriously consider this, and remember what they have done to God in this terrible time.

of the armament of war. For since it is public that the pope is doing such great help for this war with money and men of war, there can be no doubt that the matter is primarily meant by him to eradicate the true doctrine preached in our churches, to reestablish and eternally strengthen his idolatry and error with bloodshed and murder, and eternal devastation of the German nation, and the tearing apart of the royal and princely houses.

005 Now what every honest man is bound to do in such a case, all godly men can easily remember, namely, that they owe first this to God, that they do not help to strengthen idolatry, as it is written [1 Tim. 5:22], "Thou shalt not make thyself partaker of other men's sins." Item, 2 Cor. 6, 14-17. "Ye shall not help unbelievers," understand idolatry to strengthen. "For how can Christ and Belial be joined together? And how is it fair that idols should be set in the temple of God? But ye are the temple of the living GOD, as GOD saith, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and will be their GOD, and they shall be my people. Therefore come out from them, and separate yourselves, saith the LORD."

006 Secondly, that every man, if he despise not God, may be known of his opinion of God. For this is the purpose for which the human race was created, that we should know God, praise Him, and testify of Him. And our Saviour Christ saith [Matt. 10:33], "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my heavenly Father."

007 And this confession shall be made according to every man's profession and ability. The preachers are to confess by teaching, the rulers by putting away idolatry and protecting right doctrine. And all who can help in such protection, with body or goods, should faithfully cooperate, as the saying 1 John 3:16 says: "By this we know love, that as Christ laid down his life for us, so we also ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." Let each one continue to consider this reminder, and read the following book diligently and take it to heart.

008 Now the people of the earth are unequal: one esteemeth the zeal of God, and the right invocation, and the right doctrine, to be the highest and most needful, and another esteemeth them not. And the godly are also unequal. One is firmer than the other. Because many others who do not know the reason for their evil deeds are brought to justice by the words of evil men, this warning is also to be given here.

9. it is said that the enemies of our church give they do not want to fight because of doctrine or religion, but they want to punish some disobedient people who have interfered with the bishops' and monasteries' justice, item, who have expelled monks, item, who have imprisoned the Duke of Brunswick 2c. There is also no doubt that some have been given this excuse: first, some hard heads should be cleared up, and then a good and harmonious order will be established.

010 But that this is only pretended, and that at bottom the destruction of right doctrine and the establishment of idolatry are sought, is evident from these sayings themselves. For what do they want to use the monks for but to establish their idolatrous masses and all false doctrine and hypocrisy? Item, that they may again insult the preachers, blaspheme true doctrine, and cause division in cities and countries. Whoever does not consider these things to be matters of religion, is not hard-hearted about religion. What concerns idolatry is great and is not to be regarded lightly.

011 But it is not only this appointment of monks that is meant, but the destruction of the whole doctrine, and the murder of many Christian priests and rulers, that is at bottom sought. For it is quite certain that the pope has practiced many things, until at last he has worked the matter to the point of stirring up this war, and has helped to do it with great money and people; which he does, indeed, not out of great love for the German nation, but, as every sensible man can observe, that this doctrine may be destroyed, and that this punishment may be an example and strengthening of all his idolatry among all nations.

12. if the principalities are given to the Hispanics and Italians, what religion will be in Germany, honest people will consider for themselves.

013 And, supposing that it were in earnest that they would not destroy the right doctrine, but that this war concerned only external regiments, it is nevertheless to be considered by the Germans whether they will accustom the Hispanics and Italians to learn to divide the principalities in Germany among themselves, as they have divided up Neapolis and Sicily.

014 But that some cry out, that the emperor would gladly make a good united order, but he cannot come to it, he must first clear up some hard heads, preachers, princes, and rulers: this is first of all a laudable beginning to a Christian reformation; and how the reformation will be, is easy to see from the former acts, from the burning, from the recent session of the Council of Trent, and from the articles, at Louvain, and from the other acts.

1) to be respected. The old errors will color them a little, and confirm the idolatry.

(15) For our doctrine is in the day, and all men of understanding, if they will not speak against their conscience, must confess that many high articles, necessary to all Christendom, have been declared right and pure, whereof great injurious errors have before been preached throughout the world. Because we do not want to deny this public divine truth, we must be called hard heads. But if our enemies adorn and color themselves as they please, there is no other reason why they thirst for our blood, except this alone, that we have done right, faithful work with a good conscience, to plant necessary, wholesome doctrine; and God, who knows all hearts, will be the judge.

016 But they say, we ourselves have much disorder and dissension, unruliness, vexation, and yet we will suffer no judge, no reformation; and this doctrine cannot remain, because no church government, no unity, no consistoria 2c. are preserved; therefore the high potentates must do it by force.

017 To this I answer, I will confess yet more; alas, it is true, that there is not only much disorder, but also much sin among us, unwittingly and willingly. And there are many tares among us, as always grows up in the true church of God; as next to David, Nathan and other true saints among God's people were Absalom, Ahitophel 2c. Nevertheless, we must not, because of our own and others' sins and grievances, throw away right doctrine and embrace idolatry.

(18) Nor do the high potentates seek to bring disorder into correction, for which we have often pointed out to them the way, that the bishops should accept right doctrine; and on the other hand they should have their authority, as bishops, over our churches, to keep them together, that thus a proper church government may be and remain. To which they have at all times given no other answer, than: EruoikiM euin, we should be murdered and exterminated. Nevertheless, in the meantime, with God's help, we have maintained Christian doctrine and other laudable arts in the studia, and in the studiis in the consistoria, and have maintained a fair church order and discipline with great labor, because they, the bishops and canonici, eat their rich prebends and work nothing for them.

19. it is not otherwise in this miserable life in all government, they are and remain sins

1) These are the articles against which "Luther's writing against the 32 articles of the theologians at Louvain" is directed, St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1808.

And sorrow for ever on the earth until the resurrection. But if all the sins and grievances of those who learn and love right doctrine were gathered together in one heap, they would still be much less than the idolatry of the persecutors, practiced in masses and worship, and their fornication and murder, which sins and grievances they still want to protect and strengthen for right and for worship.

020 And this difference between the sins of both parts is well to be remembered: in the true church there is and abideth in this life weakness, sin, and vexation. For the great saints, Aaron, David, have committed grievous sins and grievousness; but they do not persist therein, and especially do not guard idolatry, and are not knowingly persecutors of the truth, and murderers of the saints.

021 These abominable things, blasphemy and murder, are not in this company that learneth and loveth righteous doctrine, but are the devil's own works, who maketh his company to do them, and so poureth out and sheweth his fury and hatred against God, as it is written [John 8:44], Ye are of the devil, which is a liar and a murderer.

022 These sins let all men flee unto the highest, and pray God daily and earnestly, that he will mercifully preserve us, that we fall not into such rages.

023 Whosoever therefore shall set both parts before him, and consider where he will be and abide, and shall see much sin and offence on both parts, it is highly necessary for him to consider this difference at the same time, that he be not with this part, which practiseth and strengtheneth blasphemy and persecution of the right members of Christ.

024 And though thy life perish with Abel, yet thou hast this great consolation, that thou knowest that God will hear thee, and be gracious unto thee. For all other sin is forgiven, but blasphemy is not forgiven Match. 12, 31], that is, knowingly strengthening idolatry and murder.

025 Now God knoweth that there are many of us in our churches, which have no other cause, why they have not followed the doctrine of these churches, but that they have sought to flee these two things, for the glory of God, and for their salvation, which are blasphemy and murder. And it is public that they have not sought pleasure or money or violence, but have suffered much misery and shame. If such men die, as Abel died, they will much prefer such deaths, for Cain's life, and all the pleasure and violence of all the bishops and cardinals. All men are put to death. But this is to be considered how we will stand before God's judgment and the judgment of the whole church for eternity after this life. Thou seest that Abel, Jeremiah, John Baptist, Christ, Paul, are also eaten up by tyrants: let them be witnesses unto thee, that hereafter there shall be another judgment for ever. And let it be a great honor to thee that thou shouldest thus add thy present life in confession of the right doctrine of God; as Christ saith Matt. 10:28], "Fear not them which are able to kill the body only, but they cannot kill the soul." 2c.

026 Forasmuch then as it is certain that the chief cause of this war is that the pope, bishops, and monks desire to strengthen their idolatry and error, and for this purpose have first resolved upon war, are thus beginners, we are certain that the resistance is just. Let every man know this consolation.

027 And that, on the other hand, some say that the resistance is unjust against the authorities. Although one would answer without sophistry that the pope, the clergy, and the monks are primarily the instigators and leaders of this war, as it is known that the pope has ordered the people and the money in Germany, this is also certainly true; the regiments are a proper thing, in which the authorities as well as the subjects have a goal; and natural resistance is a right work that God has planted in nature. And there is a very wide distinction between resistance and rebellion. If a murderer in the street or in your house wants to attack you or your wife or child, then protection and resistance is a work rightly pleasing to God, even if the murderer is stabbed to death because of it. For the gospel, which preaches eternal righteousness, naturally does not want to annihilate law and orderly government in this bodily life, but just as it considers the married state, father and mother to be right godly states, so it also wants to consider orderly protection to be a work rightly pleasing to God. And how far such a thing extends between the orderly degree of the high and the lower power, that can well be judged by scholars and those of understanding. Abdias was right in keeping the prophets secretly in caves, against his king's prohibition. The Armenians were justified in protecting their church and country against the Emperor Maximianum.

028 Victorinus was a great prince, who had the imperial government at Cologne in the time of the Gauls, and he ruled laudably, but was deprived of his

A scribe, who took him to his wife, was stabbed to death. Marius acquitted a young soldier and put a wreath on him who stabbed his captain, who was a friend of Mario, because the boy had to protect himself, and all the soldiers thanked Mario for this judgment. Such protection is right, and in Christians pleasing to God; indeed, they are special testimonies of divine judgments against unjust violence and excessive arrogance of the powerful.

029 From all this every man of understanding can well remember what is right, even in the present case. For against this part, war has been decided, without all reasonable foreknowledge, and is public violence, marriage-breaking, and the erection of public idolatry. And it must be taken into account that if the Hispanics and Italians, and perhaps also the Turks, were to come into the German cities (which God would mercifully prevent), since until now, by the grace of God, discipline and honest rule have been preserved, they would practice no small disgrace and cruelty in them.

(30) But first of all, let all godly fathers of the house, with their wives and children, cry out to God with heartfelt sighs, that he may preserve the right doctrine for his knowledge and for his glory, and that he may not destroy these churches and lands where it is preached. And that such prayer may be made the more earnestly and without hindrance, let us all amend our lives in godliness, faith, and other virtues, and consider the saying [Zach. 1:3.], "Turn ye unto me, and I will also turn unto you." Verily, this thing is great, and whithersoever it may fall, nevertheless an everlasting change in temporal rulers and in religion shall follow; that is certain.

031 And I am much surprised that wise men should have been induced to stir up this war. But it is not only the work of men; the devils are raging and would like to cause even greater destruction and misery in Christendom. In time, the present disputes will peacefully come to Christian unity; therefore, it would have been better if the rulers had done so. But because the anger of the devils and the idolatrous crowd is so great, they will give rise to a change that will be difficult for themselves. But I ask all God-fearing people to earnestly pray to God that he will graciously preserve his church, in which true doctrine is preached, and Christian rule.

032 Secondly, let all the godly also remember that every man according to his estate and ability to serve the preservation of true Christian doctrine. This is the main reason why we live, and why we can do nothing better in this life. These things look very much like the time of the Maccabees, and they try cunning and violence; therefore every man of understanding may remember much from those histories.

Warning D. Martini Luther to his dear Germans.

(1) I have publicly sent out my diligent and faithful admonition to the clergy at this Diet of Augsburg, and have asked most earnestly that they should not let the Diet, for which all the world hopes and gazes with great longing, pass away without end, but should act so that peace may be made, some of their abominations changed, and room given to the Gospel, which I have also sought and sighed for with my prayer before God with all my strength, together with all pious Christians.

002 But that neither our diligent prayer to God, nor our faithful admonition to them, has helped, it is easy to reckon what it means, namely, that God, as the hardened and blinded, whom so much innocent blood, blasphemy, and abominable impenitent life oppresses, does not think them worthy to receive a good thought or sigh, or to obey some word of wholesome and peaceful admonition. And stand with them, as it was with the Jews in the days of Jeremiah, when God spoke to him, Jer. 15:1: "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet have I no heart toward this people; only drive them away from me, and let them go." And Jer. 7:16. "And thou shalt not plead for this people, neither lament nor supplicate for them, neither shall thou plead for them: for yet will I not hear thee."

(3) Such an answer 1) I and mine must now also let ourselves be considered and told, and have hitherto pleaded in vain for the ministers, because God bears mighty witness by the deed that he will not hear us for them; but let them go, and, like Pharaoh, sin in the Holy Spirit, until neither they nor their children shall be heard.

1) Original: "Solchs".

Repentance nor improvement is to be hoped for. For if something could have been obtained by praying before God, and something could have been obtained from the clergy by exhortation, supplication, humility, patience, offering, truth, justice, good things, it should certainly have been obtained now at the Diet, so earnestly (that I know) have the Christians prayed, and so high humility, patience, and supplication have been demonstrated there, and so good right things have they had before them.

(4) Now that they have not only let the imperial diet pass without end and peace, but have strengthened discord and resolved to be oppressive and defiant, I, together with my own, will also collect our prayers, according to God's command, and, as St. John [1 John 5:16] teaches, will not pray to death for sin, but will watch the stubborn Pharaoh as God will drown him in the Red Sea. For our prayer and supplication for peace, even if it is lost among the hardened, will help us all the more, and has already done great wonders enough, even at Augsburg, and shall also permeate to the end with God's grace. For we have been heard, and must be heard. We have not lacked this up to now, nor shall we lack it yet, I truly know, amen. And let it be according to the saying of Christ, that if the apostle's greeting and peace should not be found in a house, nor their peace quenched, then their peace should be turned again to them. So also here, because the ecclesiastics respect neither prayer nor peace, let both prayer and peace therefore be undestroyed, but return to us, and let the ecclesiastics, instead of prayer, have vile curses, and instead of peace, vile strife, and both the fullness, amen.

005 Therefore, because their nobles stand badly and stiffly on authority, and set their cause in their fists, against the public and known truth of God, let no man be afraid of them, and let every man be 2) confident, and

2) Walch: "quite joyful". - From this point on, Walch has a large number of unnecessary additions, the source of which is unknown to us; they are also not found in the Wittenberg and Jena editions. In the first Erlangen edition, all of the additions are appended in notes; we do not note them; they number more than two hundred.

unafraid against such angry gods. For they do not call and pray to God, nor can they pray because of evil consciences and things; out of arrogance and defiance, they go after flesh and blood, and are not allowed to ask God about it, nor are they allowed to ask him whether he wants what they think. There God takes great pleasure in it and loves it, and is very pleased with such defiance and disdain for His grace; He also gives great happiness and victory to such defiance and presumption, so that both horse and man lie in the Red Sea, and everything passes over and over, until not one remains.

006 But we are quite sure, that their furious activity is not in their power, but in the hand of God; and they have not yet so soon what they will. He will also want to be a Lord over them, as has always been the case up to now; they shall know this. So I will now make it as if there were no God, and think in vain, as if in a dream, that their thoughts and intentions will begin and continue by force.

007 And if it come to the worst, two things must come to pass, one war, or one riot; peradventure both at the same time. For it is certain (we are speaking now in a dream, since there is no God), if they begin a war, that an ensign will rise up and a mob will gather, even among their own people, that both they and we will perish with them. For in such a case they must not rely on our doctrine, as if they were sure that no one would stand against them, because we have written hard against sedition and taught that one should also suffer the outrages of tyrants and not defend oneself. It is well taught, but I cannot do it for the perpetrators, since all the other parts of our teaching are held and respected by few.

008 If then the people would not keep our doctrine, which we have taught against sedition, especially because that outrage and wanton war would give them such an unpleasant cause, the devil would throw them to the winds, and make a pretty and ridiculous nakedness of them. Now I speak always in dreams, but they may see that the dream come not true. The dream does me no harm; if it strikes them, they have it.

(9) Well then, if, as I have said, it should come to war or to rebellion (although God's wrath should pass away, as I must see to it), I will have testified here with this writing before God and all the world, that we, who are reproached by the Lutherans, have given neither counsel nor will, nor even causes for it; but have always and without ceasing asked and called for peace. And the papists themselves know and must confess that we have hitherto taught peace, and also kept it, and now at the Diet most earnestly desire it. For this reason, when war or rebellion is imminent, it cannot be said, nor can it be said: Behold, this is the fruit of the Lutheran doctrine; but must say, Behold, this is the doctrine and fruit of the Papists, who have not wished to have peace, neither for themselves, nor to suffer others to have it. For we have hitherto taught and lived in silence, have not drawn a sword, have not burned, murdered, or robbed anyone, as they have done and still do; but have borne their murdering and robbing, raging and raging, with the utmost patience.

(10) Moreover, now, at the Diet, when on the papists' side such dread, defiance, insistence, scorn, and mockery has befallen ours, ours have always humbled themselves most deeply, let themselves be trampled underfoot, and yet have always asked for peace, confessed, and offered everything that God may suffer. And if our part had been vain beggars, it would have been more than too much. I will keep silent that such high, great princes, lords, pious and honest people are, that I certainly think that such confession, such humility and patience have not happened much, because Christianity has stood, and my hope is to be the greatest before the last day. It does not help yet.

(11) The Muenzer and the rebels did not do this, but they did as the papists do now, neither wanting to have peace nor to give it, intervening by force, not allowing any means or offer to be accepted, and badly with their heads. They would not even let their doctrine be interrogated, as ours are now doing at Augsburg; but badly condemned all doctrine, and praised their own, in all measure, as the papists are now doing.

They also do not want to reveal their writings to the light, and yet they condemn our teachings; of which more hereafter. That, in short, neither guilt nor cause, neither war nor rebellion, may be laid to our charge, either before God or before the world.

012 If therefore our conscience be innocent, pure, and sure in this case, and the conscience of the papists be guilty, impure, and sorrowful, let us go on our way merrily, and be in the worst, whether it be war or rebellion, according as the wrath of God shall be visited upon them. If it be a tumult, then my God and Lord Jesus Christ is able to save me and mine, as he saved dear Lot from Sodom. As he also saved me in the next turmoil, when I was in danger of losing my life and limb more than once, and yet I earned such thanks from the desperate boys, I mean the papists. If he does not want to save me, let him be praised and thanked; I have lived long enough, well deserved death, and have honestly begun to avenge my Lord Christ on the papacy; after my death they shall first of all feel Luther right.

013 But now also, when I am slain in this papal and pope rebellion, I will take with me a company of bishops, priests, and monks, that they may say: Doctor Martinus be brought to the grave with a great procession. For he is a great doctor above all bishops, priests, and monks, therefore they shall also go with him to the grave, on their backs, that they may sing and say of it. They, the papists, to the abyss of hell, to their god of lies and murder, whom they served with lies and murder; I to my Lord Jesus Christ, whom I served in truth and peace. For it is well to reckon: He that killeth Doctor Luther in rebellion shall not spare many of the priests: so shall we go with one another: they, in all the devils' names, to hell; I, in God's name, to heaven. No one can harm me, I know that, no more than I desire to harm anyone.

014 But they shall not do so wickedly; I will make it worse with them; and they shall not have such hard heads; I will make it worse.

have a hard head. If they had not only this Emperor Carol, but also the Turkish Emperor for themselves, they should not make me despondent nor frightened, but I will make them despondent and frightened. They shall depart from me henceforth; I will not depart from them. I will remain; they shall perish; they have gone too far. For my life shall be their executioner, my death shall be their devil; this and no other. They shall know it, and let them laugh at it now.

015 But if there be war, I must suffer myself again with mine own, and wait what our God will counsel and judge, who hath hitherto faithfully stood by us, and never left us. And in this we again have great advantage, first of all, if we die or perish, we shall not be harmed, for it is written, "Blessed are they that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake" [Matt. 5:10, 1 Pet. 3:14]. He that saith this is not a liar, of that we are sure. Thus the papists themselves know and confess, and the devil thank them that they should say otherwise, that our doctrine is contrary to no article of faith, nor to the holy Scriptures, but is contrary to their church custom, and to the laws of the popes. Therefore they may not call us heretics, nor must they give the lie to their own hearts and mouths, because no one can be called a heretic who does not teach against the holy Scriptures or the articles of faith; Much less can they punish us or war against us as heretics, and have also hitherto, as liars against themselves, murderers and traitors, blasphemed, burned, murdered, and persecuted the pious Lenhard Keser and the like for heretics, whereof they have also yet no repentance or penitence, but remain obdurate in such blood and lies; who then should fear such warriors?

(16) Secondly, we know that they may not initiate such warfare in God's name, nor may they pray or call upon God for help. And in spite of them all, both universally and especially, they are commanded to say to God from their hearts, "Help us, God, to war in this matter, for their consciences are too heavily burdened, not only with lies, blasphemies, blood, murder, and all abominations, but also, above all of these, with obstinate, unbelieving, and unjust thoughts.

Repentant heart and sins in the Holy Ghost. For this cause, because they have an evil conscience for the sake of blasphemous things, they shall have neither happiness nor salvation.

(17) Let us therefore pronounce a blessing upon them, which shall be thus: As pious as you are in the sight of God, and as good a cause as you have to gain, so great happiness and victory may God grant you, amen. And let it happen to you as it happened to us Germans, when we also began to break the peace against Saint John Hus, and to wage war against the Bohemians, and the Pope also sacrificed us to the flesh bank, so that we had to atone for his lust with our blood and heads, and fought against truth and justice, as you are doing now; so that the Pope may once again have something to laugh about in his fist, when he has caused such a merry bloodbath among us, the most holy Father and kindest shepherd of our souls. But God can raise up a Judah Maccabee (though I and mine sit still and suffer), who shall smite Antiochum with his army, and teach us rightly to war; as he taught us to war against the Bohemians, and to keep the peace.

018 Neither will I celebrate with mine own, praying and supplicating unto God, that he will give them a desponding, a foolish, a cowardly heart, when they lie in the field; that here and there his conscience may stir, and bite him, saying, O woe! O woe! I am in yearly war! We have wicked things, and fight against God and his word! how shall we fare? whither go we? And when they see a Maccabean coming against them, they will flee away and be destroyed like chaff in the wind. Thinkest thou not that God is able to perform such arts? as he saith unto his people [Deut. 28:25], I will give thee a desponding heart, that when thou shalt flee out of the way against thine enemies, thou shalt flee back by seven paths, and a rustling leaf shall terrify thee [Deut. 26:36]. Verily so did he to the stubborn Egyptians in the Red Sea, who were as stiff and sure as the Papists are; yet when the hour came for their consciences to stir them, they said, "Alas! let us flee, God is contending against us" [Ex. 14:25]. He that knoweth not what it is, to war with an evil conscience and a desponding heart, let him try it now; when the If he gets the papists, he shall know it, just as our ancestors learned it from the Bohemians and the Ziska in the same case.

019 And our prayer shall not hide us, but we will shew it openly, even the seventh psalm, which smote all Israel in the first battle, that twenty thousand men with Absalom were slain in the field, slain by a small company [2 Sam. 18:7]. For he hath shotguns, and powder, and armour enough, that I know for a certainty.

020 Thirdly, because it behoveth me not to war, nor to counsel or provoke to war, as a preacher in the ministry, but rather to counsel from war to peace; as I have hitherto done most diligently, which all the world must bear me witness of: but yet our enemies desire not peace, but war. If it comes to this that a war begins, then I will truly keep my pen still and be silent, and no longer lie down as I did in the next uprising, but will also let go what is going on, and even if no bishop, nor priest, nor monk remains, and I myself also perish with it.

021 For their rebellion and their boasting are too grievous unto God, and their hardened hearts make them hard and too much. They have asked, and been admonished, and entreated for peace above all measure; they will bring it forth by flesh and blood: so will I bring it forth with them by the Spirit and by God: and henceforth I will not have one or two Papists, but the whole Papacy, brought upon me, until the judge of heaven shall draw three. I will not and cannot fear such wretched enemies of God. Their defiance is my pride, their anger is my laughter. They cannot take from me more than a sackful of wretched flesh; but what I can take from them, that they shall know in a little while.

(22) Further, when it comes to war, if God be for it, I will not rebelliously reproach or scold the part that sets itself up as a defense against the murderous and bloodthirsty papists, but will let it go and let it happen that they call it a defense of necessity, and will thereby point them to the right and to the lawyers. For in such a case, if the murderers and bloodhounds ever get and kill

In truth, it is no rebellion to oppose and defend oneself against them. Not that I want to provoke or arouse anyone to such opposition, nor justify it, for that is not my office, much less my judgment or sentence.

023 A Christian knoweth well what he ought to do, that he should give unto God the things that are God's, and unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; but not unto the bloodhounds the things that are not theirs: but that I make a distinction between sedition and other acts, and will not leave the bloodhounds the cover of shame, that they should boast, as against seditious men, and have good cause according to the law of God and of the earth, as the little cat would preen and adorn itself. Likewise, I will not let the consciences of the people be burdened with the fear and worry that their opposition is seditious. For such a name is too evil and too heavy in such a case; it shall have another name, which the righteous will well find.

024 Let not all that the bloodhounds call seditious be seditious. For with this they want to bind the mouths and fists of all the world, so that no one should punish them with preaching or defend themselves with their fists, and they should keep their mouths open and their hands free; thus, by the name of sedition, they want to frighten and see all the world, but comfort themselves and make themselves safe. No, dear fellow, the definition and interpretation would have to be put to you differently! Sedition is not when one does against the law; otherwise all transgressions of the law would have to be called sedition, but he is called a seditionist who does not want to suffer the authorities and the law, but attacks them and fights against them and wants to suppress them, and be master himself, and establish justice, as the coiner did (uliuä sst invasor, aliuä travsZroZsor): that is rightly called a seditionist. So that the opposition to the bloodhounds cannot be seditious, for the papists have looked on and want to make war and not keep the peace, nor leave it to others who would like to have peace; so that the papists are much closer to the name and virtue that is called sedition.

025 For they have no right at all, divine or temporal, for themselves, but act For wickedness, against all law, divine and temporal, as murderers and evildoers. This is easy to prove, for they themselves know that our doctrine is right, and yet they want to exterminate it. As a great bishop of St. Nicolas 1) in Augsburg himself said, he would like to see it held everywhere as in Wittenberg; but that such doctrine should begin and come out of the hole and the corner, that is not to be suffered. What do you think? Are these not fine episcopal words? Likewise the papal legate, Cardinal Campegius, has also confessed: he could well permit such doctrine, but it would become a great example, that one would have to permit it to other nations and kingdoms as well; but that would not be good. And another great bishop also said of their scholars, thus: Our scholars defend us finely; they themselves confess that our thing is not founded in the Scriptures. So that they almost know that our doctrine is not wrong, but is founded in the Scriptures; and yet they wilfully condemn us, and want to destroy the doctrine, contrary to divine right and truth.

26) But that they also act contrary to imperial and natural law is obvious, for they have first of all hardly allowed our part to be questioned. After that, when they made their slow, 2) lazy verbal rebuttal, they badly did not want to give a copy of it, nor did they let us be held responsible, as bats shun the light, until this day. Now it is both divine, imperial, and natural law, which the pagan Portius also held against the Jews through St. Paul, that one should not condemn, but first hear the answer of the condemned. For God did not want to condemn Adam either; he first asks him for an answer. We, however, have now appeared at Augsburg willingly, and offered to answer with all humility and diligence, and yet we have been refused with all iniquity and courage, and their answer, however much we asked for it, has not been granted to us, and we have been condemned.

yet condemned by the holy fathers in God, and by the Christian princes. O fine teachers! O beautiful judges! who compel all the world to believe, and are not allowed to declare what it is that one is to believe. I am to believe, and yet I know not what I am to believe; I must be called false, but they will not show why I am false.

027 O wretched men, all ye that have been on the side of the pope in Augsburg! All your descendants will be ashamed of you forever, and will not be glad to hear you say that they had such wretched ancestors. If we had shied away from the light, and had not wanted to answer, you would have been the ones who urged us to do so. Now we come, not only desirous of answering, but asking, crying out, crying out, that we may answer; consuming great goods, missing much more, and suffering all shame, mockery, scorn, and driving; and ye have shamefully and wickedly refused us all these things. So also, if we had not desired nor wished to have your bat or night-owl, that is, your back-talk, you should have been the ones who handed it to us without our will and left it out. Now we ask, complain, and demand with all perseverance, and ye refuse your answer, and deny us our answer.

28 O the shameful Diet, the like of which has never been held, has never been heard, and shall never be held nor heard! because of such a shameful act, which must be an eternal stain on all princes and the whole empire, and makes all us Germans ashamed before God and all the world. What will the Turk and his entire empire say to this when they hear such an outrageous act from our empire? What will the Tartars and Moscovites say to it? Who under the whole heaven will henceforth fear us Germans, or think anything honest of us, when they hear that we let the accursed pope with his larvae thus ape us, fool us, turn us into children, even into blocks and boulders, that for the sake of their blasphemous, sodomitical, shameful doctrines and lives we act so shamefully, even above and beyond shamefully, in public imperial diet against right and truth? It should be fair to every German to reue that he was born German, and should be called a German!

029 But I will well believe that they keep back their discourse and their little book from great wisdom, because their consciences themselves feel that it is a rotten, loose, cold thing, of which they should be ashamed if it came out, and should let themselves be seen in the light, or suffer answer. For I know the most learned doctors well, that have boiled and used six weeks over it, whether they can make a nose of the matter with chatter before the ignorant. But when it comes to paper, it has neither hands nor feet, but lies there in a desolate heap, as if a drunkard had spat it out; as one finds especially in D. Schmid and D. Ecken's writings. It will neither sound nor work when it is their turn to write; that is why they are more diligent in shouting and chatting.

030 I have also learned that, when the confession of ours was read, many of the opponents were astonished, and confessed that it was true, and that it could not be refuted by the Scriptures. Again, when their refutation was read, they bowed down their heads, and confessed with boasts that it was a rotten and loose thing against the confession of ours. But ours, and many more devout hearts, are greatly rejoiced and greatly strengthened, since they have heard that they, out of all their power and art, which they then had to prove to the utmost, knew how to bring forth nothing else than such loose contradiction, which now, praise God, a woman, a child, a layman, a peasant, is man enough to resist, on good grounds of Scripture and truth. And this is also the just cause, why they did not want to hand over such a rebuttal. The fleeting evil consciences were afraid of themselves, and would not wait for the truth to be answered.

031 And it is easy to perceive that they stood in such confidence, and brought about this Diet, that they certainly meant that our part should never be so bold as to appear, but that, if they brought the emperor in person into Germany, every one would be afraid, and say unto them, Gracious lords, what would ye have? Since the

and the Elector of Saxony was the very first to appear: help God, how their pants began to stink! how their confidence was lost! What a riding together and secret counseling and murmuring arose there! And yet no one had to know, Christ himself, nor I, what the things were, as little as we had known before this year of the Prince's rotteries. But that was the sum of it, how to find ways and paths, because ours appeared so joyful and happy the very first, so that they would not be interrogated. Since that could not be at all, they nevertheless at last did the honor that they were not allowed to hand over their loose rebuttal, nor to give room to answer.

32 For the impudent mouth and bloodthirsty sophist, Doctor Eck, their most distinguished counselor, has let himself be heard with public words before our people, that if the emperor had followed the counsel decided at Bononia, and had attacked the Lutherans with the sword swiftly and freshly, beheading one after the other, the matter would have been well advised. But since he would have let the Elector of Saxony speak and interrogate him through his chancellor, all this would have been prevented. How methinks thou of such doctors and holy fathers? How full of love and truth they are! So the secret counsel had to break out, so papal holiness had acted at Bononia with the emperor. But what game of his should have become of it, where the emperor after such papal and devilish counsel would have attacked the matter with murders? It would have been a Diet that neither bishops nor princes would have left a fingernail, especially in such perilous times, when everything was so busy and far away, and all the world was waiting for a gracious Diet; as the invitation to the Diet also indicates and suggests, but unfortunately it was not held that way.

033 But it may be said by some that the emperor intended to give such a rebuttal of that part to ours, provided ours would undertake that it should not come to pass, or ...would be made manifest. This is true, and so it is supposed of our people. But here let every man take hold and grope, though he neither see nor hear; what manner of men are these that will not, nor may not, let their things come to light? If it is such a good thing, and so well founded in the Scriptures, as they cry out and boast, why does it shun the light? What is the use of hiding such public things from us and from everyone, since they must be taught and kept? But if it is unfounded and loose, why did they let the Elector of Brandenburg proclaim in the first parting, and state in writing: if fei der Unsern Bekenntnis mit der Schrift und gutem Grund verlegt? If this were true, and if their own consciences did not themselves give them the lie in this, they would not only have had such a delicious, well-founded confession read, but would also have given it in writing, saying, "There you have it, in spite of him who is responsible for it, as we have done with our confession, and still do.

034 But Christ must remain true, for he saith [John 3:20, 21], "He that doeth evil hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, lest his works should be punished. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, as they were in God." According to this judgment of Christ, God has let ours come from this Kingdom Day with such eternal honors, that even the adverse must confess how we have not shied away from the light, but have most freely and cheerfully sought and waited for it, but have left them there with such and eternal disgrace, That they, like night-owls and bats, yea, like their father of lies and murders, have most grievously and evidently fled and shunned the light, and may not wait nor suffer their loose, foul, gloomy talk of answer.

(35) This is also a fine little Christian thing, that our people should undertake to be fine for it, so that such exquisite art and well-founded wisdom of their refutation may not fail nor be revealed. How God has blinded and deceived the papists!

that they have neither reason nor shame! How is it possible, I will be silent, how reasonable, to commit oneself to keeping secret such a writing, which had to come under so many hands, and was read once before the kingdom? And if it should come to pass through that part itself, it must be our fault.

(36) But the ungodly reason must look for such cleverness and pretty plots, because it does not like truth and light, and could not otherwise find a better remedy, that it may remain in darkness, and not have to utter its contradiction. Well then, let it remain in darkness as it is, and let it also remain in eternal hellish darkness, and yet at the last judgment, if it does not happen sooner, it will come to light all too brightly.

037 Yea, saith thou, though they have not given their answer, or their transfer, neither have they been answerable, yet they have made a committee for it, and have commanded some princes and scholars, both of them, to act kindly one to another in the matter. Dress thyself, adorn thyself, little kitten, we shall have guests! How foolish and foolish is the poor man Christ, that cannot perceive such deceit! The committee is held, it is true; but what has been done within? Nothing anywhere of their transfer, or of their opposition, which remained in darkness, and the committee had to make the noses help that their loose transfer, with about a glimpse, should remain, and not come out.

038 For in the committee they did not set forth their transfer, but made our confession, and dealt with ours as to how much of it we would relent and recant, or (as they interpret it) compare ourselves with them. Everything has been worked out and directed so that they may cry out with great joy: Behold, good people! hear, all the world! how obstinate and stiff-necked are the Lutherans! First of all, their confession is established with Scripture and well-founded reasons, and then they are dealt with kindly. What more can be done? They will not yield; they are overcome or kindly instructed.

039 Well, we must let go of the cry of lies: it shall not help them, I know it. So God has also prepared them in this way.

This is a lie to our boast. For when the Elector of Brandenburg proclaimed and declared that our confession had been changed with Scripture and good reason, our people did not accept it, nor did they keep quiet about it, but they openly contradicted it before the emperor and the empire and testified that our confession had not been changed, but had been established and founded in such a way that even the gates of hell could do nothing against it. Such a defeat they had to eat into themselves again. For so much is said in German: What the Elector of Brandenburg proclaimed in his farewell is not true, but a lie. That is right. For the well-founded transfer is not yet in the light, but perhaps sleeps with old Dannheuser [Tannhäuser] in the Venusberg.

40. Since it is now a fact that they have kept their refutation in darkness, and have not brought it out into the open, not only is this an impudent public lie, that they have pretended that our confession is laid down with Scripture and good reason, but this is the devil's own lying mouth, that they are allowed to boast, and to preen and shout themselves to their glory, that we are overcome, and will not depart; But their consciences are so convinced of such lies, that it is necessary to take hold of them at every turn, as they have done to glorify themselves, as all those who have wicked things do, and mend themselves so miserably, and seek all kinds of plots, so that their wicked cause may not come to light, and it is evident that they have despaired of their cause, and have provided for nothing less, than that ours should come and appear. So they have relied on mere force, and have not looked to any truth or light.

041 How kindly they have meant the committee, it is easy to see from this certain part, that, among other articles, they have allowed us to suppose that we should teach of both forms of the sacrament, that it is not unjust, but right, that one form alone should be given and taken. If we did this, then they would again admit us, and let us teach that we might give and take both forms. Is not this a great friendship? Who would have thought of such love to such men?

see? Hitherto they have persecuted as heretics all those who have enjoyed both forms, and they have inflicted all plagues on them. But now they want to call it right and Christian, and let it be so, when we again teach that with one form they also act right and Christian. That is, in German, to blow cold and hot out of one mouth: it is wrong, and yet it is right, what and how they will; nor must it be called false.

042 When therefore the Gentiles had granted and accepted these things, there should at the first have risen up a shouting and a crying in all the world, Behold, good people, the Lutherans revoke their doctrine; before they taught that it was unlawful to use the same form; now they teach that it is right. Now you hear that we have taught right, and that they have been found wrong in their own confession. So they have tried, the faithful, simple-minded people, with this one piece to confirm all their abominations and devilishness, and to blame us as revocers of all our doctrine. Moreover, they have established their poisonous doctrine in our churches through our own mouths, and at the same time they have violently propagated our doctrine in their churches, so that their mouths have not taught our doctrine in their churches; thus they have tried to penetrate and plant themselves in our churches through our own mouths, and at the same time to shut us out of their churches altogether. Are they not fine, friendly, equal means, which serve well for friendly action?

043 But as is the transfer, so is the committee: the transfer is a dark night-owl, and will not come to light; the committee is vain deceit and false deceit. And as true and praiseworthy is the glory that they have laid our confession with Scripture and good reason, so true and honest is the glory that they have pretended friendly action; both are vain lies and deceit! Of course they did not like that we should deal with them in this way. But I do not now intend to write about the business of this Diet, nor to attack their transfer, but, God willing, I will do so; 1) but this time alone I will have

1) As we think, Luther fulfilled this promise by the next writing: "Glosse auf das vermeinte kaiserliche Edict" (gloss on the supposed imperial edict), which Luther will have written and published immediately after this one.

how the papists want no peace, no truth, no tranquility, but will go through with their heads and either start a war or a riot, be it good or bad for us, nothing will help. But we must dare and wait. Because our entreaties, our pleas, and our cries for peace will not be heard, nor will our humility and patience count for anything, let what cannot remain be brought here.

44 But because I am the prophet of the Germans (for I must henceforth ascribe such a trustworthy name to myself, for the pleasure and favor of my papists and asses), it is nevertheless my duty, as a faithful teacher, to warn my dear Germans of their harm and danger, and to give Christian instruction as to how they should conduct themselves when the emperor, incited by his devils, the papists, offers to wage war against the princes and cities of our part. Not that I worry that the Emperor's Majesty will follow such poisonous blisters and start such an unjust war, but that I do not want to neglect my own, and that I want to keep my conscience pardoned and unburdened in all adventures. For it is much better for me to have given a remaining and unnecessary admonition and warning, and to have made a vain report, than to have neglected it, and, if it were otherwise than I had presumed, to have come too slowly after it, and to have no more to comfort me than the word: Nov. putassem, I had not meant it! It is (say the wise) also to be cared for, if it be sure; how much more is it now, in such strange courses, when the Papists' rage provokes God's anger so horribly, not to trust in any wind nor weather, let it be what it will, and Paul Rom. 12:8 also commandeth that they should care who preside over others.

(45) Now whichever German will follow my faithful counsel, let him follow; and he that will not, let him not. I do not seek my own salvation here, but that of you, the Germans. Nothing could happen to me personally that would be worse than for the papists to eat me, tear me, bite me, or how else they would help me out of the sinful, deadly maggot sack; yet I say, when they are extremely angry: "Dear lords, if you are angry, get off the wall, put on your bathing gown, and hang it around your neck; and in short, I want to be free of them, unpunished, and un-be defied. For I know where my cause stands, and where I shall remain; praise be to God! If they do not accept my service for their own good, the wretched devil thanks them when they show me a drop of love or mercy; if they may not accept my teaching, I may accept much less of their grace, and if they rage and rage in the name of the devil, I laugh in the name of God.

46. But this is my faithful advice, that if the emperor should rise up and want to war against our part for the sake of the pope's things or our doctrine, as the papists are now horribly boasting and defying (but I do not yet promise myself to the emperor), that in such a case no man will let himself be used, nor will he obey the Emperor, but be sure that he is strictly forbidden by God to obey the Emperor in such a case, and whoever obeys him, that he knows how he will disobey God, and his body and soul will perish eternally. For the emperor then acts not only against God and divine right, but also against his own imperial rights, oaths, duty, seals, and letters. And lest you think that such a thing is my poem, or that I am giving you such counsel from my own head, I will show you the causes and reasons so strongly and clearly that you will understand that it is not my counsel, but God's serious and manifold strict commandment, before whose wrath you should be justly frightened, and finally you must also be frightened.

(47) First of all, I must excuse the dear Emperor Carol on account of his person; for he has so far shown himself, even now at the Imperial Diet, that he has won the favor and love of all the world, and would be worthy that no harm should befall him, nor do our people know anything else to say of him but imperial virtue and praise.

(48) And that I have given several examples of all this, it is a strange, strange gentleness that his imperial majesty did not want to condemn our doctrine, even though it was vehemently urged and provoked by ecclesiastical and secular princes, with unremitting persistence, even before he came from Spain. But his majesty has stood like a rock, and has hurried to the Imperial Diet, and has issued a gracious proclamation, willing to deal with the matter amicably and kindly. Shall also said: it need not be so very evil doctrine, because so many great, high, learned, and honest men accept such.

49 Which also came to pass at Augsburg. When our confession was read before the emperor's majesty, they themselves found out that this doctrine was not so evil as it had been presented by their poisonous preachers and ear-blowers and hateful princes. Yea, they had not imagined that it should be so good a doctrine, and have declared it much themselves, that it is the true holy scripture, that it cannot be confuted with the scripture; that they had been much otherwise reported before.

(50) This was also the reason why it was hardly permitted to be read. For the envious princes and poisonous liars worried that, wherever it was read, their poisonous lies would be disgraced; they would have liked to see the imperial majesty condemn everything unread and unheard. But since his imperial majesty could not obtain that it be read publicly before everyone, she nevertheless did so much that it had to be read and heard before the imperial estates, however highly this was opposed by other princes and bishops and sophists, and bitterly annoyed them.

51. Although a great deal of money was consumed at the Diet, and it seems that nothing was spent, I say for myself that if two times more had been consumed, everything would have been amply paid for with this piece alone, and enough would have been spent that Squire Neidhard and Master Lügenhard have been disgraced in their envy and lies, And have seen and heard that our doctrine is not contrary to the Scriptures, nor to the articles of faith, which they have before made so abominable with lies and envy everywhere, by writing, preaching, and after-talk, as if no worse doctrine had ever come to light. Such envy, I say, has been defiled at the Diet, and such lies have been revealed. For this reason we should be grateful to our dear Emperor Carol, and give thanks for this virtue, that God, through him at the beginning, has adorned and redeemed our doctrine from the lying, blasphemous titles of heresy, and other shameful names, and thus has destroyed the liars and falsehoods.

Enviers are well struck on the mouth, though they have an iron brow, and are not ashamed. But it does no harm; we have had enough of the beginning, and it shall be better.

Item, the imperial majesty is also said to have said: If the priests were pious, they should have no Luther. What else is this said, but as Solomon says [Prov. 16:10], "The king's lips prophesy"? For by this his majesty wants to indicate that Luther is the ruthlessness of the priests, and they have well deserved it, and are not right in their nature. This is also sufficiently confessed by themselves. For the bishop of Salzburg said to Magister Philipp: "Oh, what do you want to reform us priests; we priests have never been good. Look and listen to the pious people! They know and confess that they are evil and wrong, and they want to remain so, to be unreformed, and not to yield to public truth; and yet they cry out and call on the emperor and all princes to defend and protect them. What else is this said but this: "Dear emperor, dear Germans, wage war, shed your blood, stake all your goods, body, child, and wife on it, so that you may protect us in our shameful, devilish life and nature, against the truth, which we know well, but still cannot stand, and also do not want to improve. How think'st thou? If you go to war for such men, and shed your blood, are you not a goodly martyr, and almost well invested in your blood and goods?"

(53) Item, when ours had wanted to hand over their answer to the imperial majesty against the Sophists' transfer, as much of it had been retained after the reading, and the imperial majesty now reached for it with his hand and wanted to accept it, King Ferdinand shrugged back the hand of the imperial majesty that such an answer did not have to be accepted. From this it once again appears who the people are who, under the name of the Emperor's Majesty, carry out their hatred and envy. name, when imperial majesty would be of a different mind and inclined to do otherwise.

54 Item, since the Elector of Brandenburg in his farewell had resolved with excellent, splendid, defiant words, how imperial majesty, princes and estates of the realm had united, that they wanted to put land and people, body and goods and blood on it, before which words ours should be frightened. But because it was not said, "if God wills," the words remained and passed with the reverberations; since they were over, no one was afraid. But Imperial Maj. Maj. had let himself be noticed here again, and did not call such a speaker a liar, but said: it was too much talk; and many other great princes and lords won here to create, how they would like to gloss over such words. Some pretended that the opinion should be: where our part wanted to attack someone of that part by force, they wanted to put together body and goods, blood, land and people; but our part never thought such, but always asked and cried for peace, as they themselves know all too well. Some, however, publicly testified before the emperor that they would never have consented to such a speech by the margrave, even if their opinion had been nothing everywhere.

(55) Though the land and the people are soon named with the mouth, yet whether one is so powerful with the fist of the same to put on blood, body, and goods, without necessity, moreover against God and right, that experience should well learn. I am sure that they will not be asked about it beforehand, and that they will not leave such a plan undisclosed. It is also true that God does not always have to give and do what we may think and say. The mouths of great men have lied wretchedly, and their plots have deceived them shamefully. But the best is, that they call not upon God, nor think on him, when they are thus defiant and insistent. But in this the emperor's heart is seen, that he is not such a mad bloodhound, and that such defiant words and deeds are not pleasing to him.

(56) But it must happen to the dear emperor as it does to all pious princes and lords. For where a prince is not half a devil, but wants to rule with a litter, it cannot be otherwise; the "greatest" scoundrels and villains come into the regiment and into the offices, and they do what they want under the prince's name. For they must not be afraid, because they know that the prince is pious, and is pleased to let him know. Now what shall this

How can pious emperors cope with so many villains and evil-doers, especially against the arch-villain Pope Clement, who is full of mischievousness and has so far proved himself honestly to the emperor? I D. Luther am more learned in the Scriptures than the emperor, and also more experienced in daily practice: yet I worry, where I should be among so many scoundrels, and always hear their poisonous tongues, and against them no other instruction, I would truly also be too pious for them, and they would drown me out in some things; as has often happened to me through some spirits and clever ones.

57 Therefore let no man be astonished or dismayed, if under the emperor's name prohibitions or letters go forth, contrary to God and right; he cannot prevent it; but let it be certain that all this is a plot of the chief rascal in the world, the pope, who causes such things to be done by his platitudinous stallions and hypocrites, whether he may cause a bloodbath among us Germans, that we may fall to the ground. And believe for me that if he does not end it with this emperor, he will go to the Turkish emperor and charge us with him; there we will find the money that we have given the pope for his indulgences and his haggling so many years ago for the treasure against the Turkish war.

(58) That is enough said this time about the emperor's excuse. Let us now give warning and indicate the reasons why everyone should be afraid to obey the Emperor in such a case, and to take action against our part. And say again, as above, that I will neither counsel nor incite anyone to war. My heart's desire and request is that peace be kept and that no part start war or give cause for it. For I will keep my conscience clear, and will not bear the name before God or the world, that anyone should make war or defend himself out of my counsel or will, except those who are commanded and have a right to do so, Romans 13:4. But where the devil has possessed the papists so completely that they neither want nor are able to have peace nor suffer, and want to make bad wars or give causes for them, that shall be on their consciences; I must let it happen, because my defense is neither valid nor helpful.

059 The first cause that thou shalt not be obedient to Caesar in such a case, and shalt not receive it, is this: that thou (as well as Caesar himself) didst swear in baptism to hold the gospel of Christ, and not to persecute nor to deny it. Now thou knowest that the emperor of this case is stirred up and deceived by the pope to contend against the gospel of Christ, because our doctrine is publicly invented at Augsburg, that it is the true gospel and holy scripture. And thou shalt therefore say unto the commandment of the emperor, or of thy prince, Yea, dear emperor, dear prince, if thou shalt keep thy oath and duty, which thou hast done in baptism, thou shalt be my dear lord, and I will be obedient unto thee, if thou wilt. But if thou wilt not keep thy baptismal vows and thy Christian covenant, which thou hast made with Christ, but wilt persecute them, then be thou obedient in my stead: for thy sake I will not blaspheme my God, nor persecute his word, nor run and leap with thee boldly into the abyss of hell.

(60) This first cause comprehends in itself many other great and terrible causes. For he that fighteth and contendeth against the gospel must also at the same time contend against God, against Jesus Christ, against the Holy Ghost, against the precious blood of Christ, against his death, against the word of God, against all the articles of faith, against all the sacraments, against all doctrine given, confirmed, and preserved by the gospel, as of the authorities, and temporal peace, and estates, and summa, against all angels and saints, against heaven and earth, and all creatures. For he who contends against God must contend against everything that is God's or that holds with God. But what the end of this would be, you will see. And, what is even worse, such fighting would happen knowingly. For it is known and confessed that this doctrine is the gospel. The Turk and the deceivers do not know that it is the word of God; therefore no Turk can be as evil as you, but you must be condemned ten times more deeply than all Turks, deceivers, Gentiles, and Jews.

011 Although it is a dreadful thing that [it] has come to pass among Christians that one must need such a warning, just as they themselves would not know what an abominable and terrible thing it is to knowingly fight against God and his word. This is a sign that there are few true Christians among the Christians, and that there are many worse Turks among them than in Turkey or in hell. But the true Christians, though they are few, know it well themselves, and must not be warned; but the Papists, who bear the name and appearance of Christians with all dishonor, and yet are ten times worse than the Turks, must be warned. If it helps, it is good; if it does not, we are excused, and their punishment is the greater. For the Turk is not so foolish as to fight or rage against his Mahomet or his Alkoran, as our devils do, the Papists, and rage and rage against their own gospel, which they know to be right, and so make the Turk a pure saint against them, and themselves true devils.

022 The other cause is, that though our doctrine be not right, (as they all know otherwise,) yet this alone should too much deter thee, that thou by such disputing charge thee, and make thee partaker of and guilty before God of all the abominations which are committed, and continue to be committed, throughout the whole papacy. This cause comprehends in itself innumerable abominations and all wickedness, sin, and harm. In short, it is the causeless hell itself, with all sins, of which thou must be a part, if thou art obedient to Caesar in this case. But we want to tell some of them and put them before the eyes, so that they will not be forgotten. For the papists would gladly cleanse themselves, and put such abominations under the bench, unpunished and unremedied, until the time when they might again draw them out and raise them up.

(63) Here thou shalt first bear upon thee all the shameful life which they have led, and still lead. For they do not intend to amend any of them, but you must shed your blood and risk your life to protect and preserve their cursed, wicked lives. Then let all the fornication, adultery, and fornication that have been and are still practiced in the cathedrals and churches be brought to your neck and conscience, and let your heart have such glory and honor that it has contended for the

The greatest and most whores and knaves that are on earth, to confirm their whores' and knaves' lives, and to make thee partaker of them all. O, then, this is a fine glory to thee, and a fine cause to venture thy life, and to serve God; for they mend not such lives, neither can they mend them, since it is impossible that so many thousands of persons should live chastely, as yet they undertake.

(64) Above this, you must also charge the papal and cardinal chastity, which is a special chastity, above the common spiritual chastity, and is called in German: Puseronen, namely, the Sodomitic and Gomorric chastity. For thus God had to blind and afflict His enemy and adversary, the pope and cardinals, before others, so that they did not remain worthy to sin with females of natural womankind, but, according to their wages, defiled their own bodies and persons by themselves (Rom. 1, 24. 26. 27.), and in addition got into such a perverse, hardened mind, that they considered such a thing no sin, but joked with it, as if it were a card game, at which they might laugh and be merry, without a ride. O to the four is given right, therefore doth it so lust and foam (as Jude saith) all shame and vice [Ep. Jude, v. 13. Proverbs 15:28.]. Go now, and lay thy life upon it, and contend for such impenitent, impudent puserons, as yet laugh and jest at such blasphemous sins.

Sixty-five: I lie not to thee here. He who has been to Rome knows well that, alas! it is worse than anyone can say or believe. When the next Concilium Lateranense at Rome was to be decided under Pope Leo, one of the articles was that people should believe that the soul is immortal, from which it must be taken that they have a loud prayer and mockery from eternal life. They confess that they have a public belief that there is no eternal life, but now they want to teach it with a bull. But this was still finer: in the same bull they had decreed that no cardinal should henceforth hold so much shame. But Pope Leo had hotly extinguished it; otherwise it would have resounded to all the world how freely and insolently the pope and the cardinals held Sodomam at Rome. I will

But because the wicked do not want to atone, but rather condemn the gospel, blaspheme and desecrate God's word, and clean themselves, they should also smell their filth again in the most shameful way. Such vice is so common among them that even recently a pope himself sinned himself to death in such sin and vice, and indeed remained dead on the spot. There, there, you popes, cardinals, papists, spiritual lords, pursue more God's word, now defend your doctrine and church!

Sixty-six: No pope, cardinal, bishop, doctor, priest, monk, or nun shall punish such a vile life, which is so manifest; but they shall laugh at it, and cleanse it, and adorn it; and they shall stir up kings, princes, countries, and people, to defend such wicked men with body and goods, with lands and people; and they shall defend them faithfully, that such vices be not atoned for, nor ameliorated, but strengthened, delivered, and praised. To this end you must risk your blood, life and limb, so that all this may fall on your neck and conscience. I would have told more examples of this abomination," but it is all too shameful and would have to ensure that our German soil would tremble before it. But if an impudent Pabstel comes, and screams against it, then I will meet and be found at home, that sess shall be called well met. If punishments and warnings help to repentance, they have been sufficiently admonished before and herewith. But nothing will come of it; it has now become a praiseworthy common custom, almost like a great virtue, that suffers no penance, but the emperor and you should protect and handle it, so that such an example may also arise and take hold in other countries, as unfortunately! is already all too much in sight.

(67) Then you must take upon yourself all the avarice, robbery, and thievery of the whole papacy, the innumerable money which they have falsely and fraudulently received with indulgences. Is it not vile robbery and theft on the part of all Christendom, the innumerable sums of money which they have brought to themselves by their falsified, lying purgatory? Is it not vile robbery and theft through the whole world, the innumerable money, which they have gotten by usury and sacrifice? Is it not vile robbery and theft through the whole world?

world, the innumerable money they have gained by butter-letters, pilgrimages, saints' service, and of the ulcer without number? Is it not vile robbery and theft through all the world? Whence have the pope, cardinals, bishops, principalities, kingdoms, and are worldly lords of all the world? Is it not a vile, immeasurable robbery and theft? What are they but the greatest robbers and thieves that the earth hath borne? There is no atonement or restitution here yet. Indeed, there is not so much good blood in their veins that they would exercise their office a little, so that they might possess such goods with some small semblance of honor; but instead they condemn, blaspheme, and persecute God's name, word, and work; now come, you shall defend such thieves and robbers with your blood, that they may not only remain unpunished, but also be strengthened to do all these things the longer the more. See what a great and powerful thief, robber and traitor you are and will be, if you strengthen and protect such robbers and thieves with your blood and your life, for you must bring it all upon yourself and be guilty of it yourself.

68. Then thou shalt bear upon thee all the blood which the pope hath shed, all the murders and wars which he hath wrought, all the miseries and heartaches which he hath caused in all the earth. But who will tell all the blood, murder, and misery which the pope hath inflicted on his own? Some have reckoned that for the pope's sake alone (since the papacy has exalted itself above the empire) eleven times a hundred thousand men have been slain; others reckon more. Where wilt thou bear so much murder and blood upon thy neck, if some murder be sure? and Christ also condemneth wrath in the heart to hellish fire, Matt. 5:22. What doest thou then, when thou darest thy life for such murderers? Thou makest thyself guilty of all these things, and helpst to strengthen and free the priest, that he may do these things for ever and ever. For there is no repentance; indeed, they count it all virtue and honor, that it is impossible to hope for improvement here, as they do not desire it, but thou shalt help to protect them, that they may murder without ceasing and without resistance, without fear, and bring blood down and fill the world with sorrow, as they have done hitherto, and still do. Behold, these are the most holy fathers, the holy cardinals, bishops, and ecclesiastics, who would be judges of the gospel, and teach and govern the world.

69. Here I will be silent concerning the other vices, how they deal in poison, treachery, and all that pertaineth to hatred and envy. Who can tell it all, the shameful life in the papacy? From the above-mentioned pieces and daily examples it can be taken. For he is said to be an antichrist, and to be against Christ in all things. Therefore it must follow that as beautiful, glorious, chaste, chaste, holy, heavenly, divine a life as Christ led and taught, so a shameful, blasphemous, lewd, cursed, hellish, diabolical life must his antichrist lead and teach: otherwise how could he be Christ's adversary or antichrist? And yet all would be to suffer, if they did not defend it in addition, and want to be right by force. But all this is still, so to reckon, shame and jest. We will now indicate the true basic scourges and chief abominations, all of which you must burden yourself with, whoever protects the pope, or helps to maintain and strengthen him in his impenitent, obdurate, end-Christian state and nature.

(Seventy) One could let life be evil, but to condemn doctrine and the word of God, and to exalt oneself above God Himself, no one can and should suffer, much less help to defend. Now they have brought so many abominations of doctrine among Christendom that they are not to be told, which they neither repent nor change, but want to defend all, to be free and right by force. All this should be on your neck and conscience, and you should be guilty of all such abominations, if you help to fight for them. And that we denounce some of them, how wilt thou bear on thy conscience the shameful, lying deceit of indulgences, so that they have so shamefully deceived and cheated so many thousands of souls, yea, all Christendom and all the world, and have cheated them out of their money and goods; and yet do not atone for it, nor think to desist from it, though they well know how great a wickedness they have wrought thereby. The people have taught them to put their consolation in indulgences, and to die upon them; which alone they have done. is terrible and horrible, that if they were otherwise so holy and pure as St. John the Baptist, yet for the sake of this piece they should be condemned to the deepest abyss of hell, and not worthy that the earth should bear them, nor that the sun should shine upon them, nor that they should be fought for and defended.

Seventy-one: for reckon thou thyself what a great folly indulgences are. He that is comforted and relied upon indulgences, and so died or lived, hath thereby forsaken, denied, and forgotten the Saviour Jesus Christ, and can have no comfort at all in him. For he that putteth his comfort in other things than in Jesus Christ, cannot have any comfort in Christ. Now we all know, and their books prove it mightily, that they have taught us to rely on indulgences; who else would have respected or bought them? And beside this, as the messengers of the devil and evil-doers, they have shamefully kept silence, and even suppressed and destroyed the faith in Christ. For he that knoweth that his comfort and confidence is in Christ, cannot suffer indulgence nor any other confidence. But when will they atone for and make amends for such infinite harm? Yes, they will atone for it; they are so stubborn in their wickedness that they will force you to defend them with body and blood, and they will lay everything on you. If they were not possessed and mad, they would be a little ashamed to desire such a defense, in such impenitent, insolent, blasphemous malice. That may be right for me: priests are not good.

Seventy-two: How wilt thou bear upon thy conscience the blasphemous deceit of the purgatory, that they also have deceitfully deceived and falsely terrified all the world, and have lied and stolen almost all their goods and riches? For in this way they have also purely extinguished the one consolation and confidence in Christ, and have taught the Christians to gape, wait, and rely on their subsequent pens. For he that gazeth and hopeth on his following covenants or works in death (as they have all taught and done), must put Christ out of his sight, and in the meantime forget him. Therefore, if God had not especially they should have died, like the Jews and the Gentiles, falling into the abyss of hell unawares, as when a man falls from a high mountain, thinking he is walking on a good path, and steps aside into the air, and falls down into the valley or the sea. O what murderers of souls are these! No human heart will understand until the last day how great a murder they have committed against souls with their purgatory. Much less can it be understood what damage and terrible blasphemy they have done to faith and trust in Christ. There is still no repentance or cessation, but rather a demand that you protect them in it and help defend them,

73. You must take upon yourself all the abominations and blasphemies which they have committed and still commit daily throughout the entire papacy with the Mass, with buying and selling, and with many countless other dishonors of the holy Sacrament, since they always sacrifice his Son to God as if they were better and holier than God's Son; since they do not let the Sacrament be a gift of God to be received with faith, but make of it a sacrifice and a work, that they may propitiate themselves and other people, and obtain all manner of grace and help. For they have made every saint his own mass, and every thing or need its own mass. In all their books and doctrines thou findest not one letter of faith. They all say and sing that the mass is a sacrifice and a work, but that in no other thing should faith be practiced and exercised so closely and diligently as in the mass or sacrament, because Christ himself instituted it in remembrance of him, that it should be preached there, and that we should remember and believe in him. But for this they preach their sacrifice and work, and sell them most mercilessly. There is still no repentance, but a stubborn, desperate wickedness to defend themselves, and to protect themselves by life and limb.

Seventy-four: it would be too dreadful enough the gross outward abuse, since the priests are on the
